them. Even the reporter seems to have felt that Dr. Newman's learning was almost too much for him, and there are passages of his report which strongly resemble the statements which we sometimes find in a report of a trial at law, that "a technical argument of no interest to the general reader here ensued between counsel." We do not doubt that Huxley, Darwin, "and other modern scientists" would have been, to use an Americanism, "considerably chewed up," if they had heard Dr. Newman's sermon. But the reporter only states that the preacher "thoroughly ventilated" the theories of these writers. Dr. Newman desires, or is reported to desire, that philosophers and theologians should find some ground of harmony on which both may stand "in the dignity of an intelligent manhood." We should like to know how many reporters are employed upon this kind of work, and whether the same reporter goes successively to all the various churches and chapels of New York, and what is the sum total of his religious convictions when he has finished the round. It is possible that by long practice one of these reporters may come to deal with sermons as cleverly as our own reporters deal with speeches in Parliament which, whether Liberal or Conservative, are neatly finished in the report, so that the speaker finds, sometimes much to his surprise, that he has said exactly what he ought. But the Transatlantic artist is most completely master of his work when he describes the accessories of a sermon. Thus we are told that on Sunday, the 19th of May, the gentle rain descended copiously and refreshingly on the thirsty earth, and diminished the attendance at Mr. Beecher's church. We wish by the way that the earth could, with any approach to accuracy, be described as thirsty in London. In consequence of the rain there were several vacant chairs and a prevailing "masculinity" among Mr. Beecher's congregation. The places usually occupied by ladies in smart dresses being vacant, a reinforcement opportunely arrived of "Methodist strangers" whose "religious enthusiasm" was not damped by a wet day. The sermon which they heard from Mr. Beecher on "Christian Life as a Battle" contained a curious enumeration of the trials with which the Christian is exercised. There are trials of temper. How hard it is to be commanded by "a man who slopes the wrong way." It is lucky that the reporter has given us Mr. Beecher's explanation of this remarkable phrase, for certainly we never should have found out its meaning for ourselves. We have heard of "sloping" in the sense of departing secretly after incautiously backing the wrong horse for the Derby. But in this sense of the word there can be no such thing as sloping any but the wrong way. However, we will not keep our readers in suspense, but will explain that Mr. Beecher means by "a man who slopes the wrong way" a man "who is very large on his feet, and goes narrowing up until he gets to a cone at his head." In view of these things the preacher a-ks, or is reported to ask, whether anybody expects that he is going to be a Christian without fighting? We cannot help thinking that Mr. Beecher takes a too limited and special view of the trials of Christian life. Men who slope the wrong way are surely rare caprices of nature, and an exceptional arrangement of circumstances would be required to place one of us in a position to be commanded by a man of such abnormal configuration. We can indeed conceive a form of Christian trial which would consist in repressing a desire to punch the sloper's exceedingly small head. But perhaps Mr. Beecher intended this passage of his sermon for the ladies whom the wet weather kept away from Church. A wife is supposed to be commanded by her husband, and it might be very irritating to be commanded in this sense by a man who sloped the wrong way. But another of Mr. Beecher's examples will be readily intelligible. He supposes that a man who has just been admitted to membership of a Church goes home and finds his "maiden aunt" sitting in his favourite plush chair. Perhaps if we substitute "mother-in-law" for "maiden aunt" we shall more vividly realize the trial to which this newly-made Church member is exposed. However he leaves the maiden aunt in possession of the plush chair, and goes to bed, but unfortunately his Christianity does not appear to have improved by a night's rest. He gets up and he "serves" at breakfast. Well, there are many ways of serving at table; "he cuts the meat so that other people get but the indifferent pieces, and he reserves the tender bit for himself." It is probably our fault that we do not know to what variety of Christianity Mr. Beecher supposes himself to belong, but, waving minor difficulties, we boldly proclaim ourselves and Mr. Beecher to be holders of a common faith. It is abundantly clear to our minds that a host who helped us, being his guests, to an indifferent piece of meat, while he kept the tit-bit for himself, could not be a Christian. It appears to be a peculiarity of American Methodists, at least when they desire to keep up their spirits on wet days, to interject "glory" at the most telling passages of a sermon, just as in the House of Commons the Junior Lords of the Treasury cry "hear, hear" to the Premier. If any imitation of a guest or his were permitted in Plymouth Church, it would surely have been evoked by Mr. Beecher's picture of this new fall of man under the temptation of a tit-bit at the breakfast-table.

A curious testimony to the vitality of the Roman Catholic religion in New York would be furnished by a statement which is made by one of the reporters, if only we believed it. We are told that the attendance at each of the twenty-six Catholic churches of Brooklyn at the morning masses of 19th May was not perceptibly diminished on account of the rain, as the weather rarely influences the numbers of worshippers at mass. There are people who will believe almost anything that a newspaper tells them, particularly if it is stated in large type; but still it would tax the credulity of the most constant reader to be told either that a reporter visited twenty-six churches in a morning, or that a newspaper employed twenty-six reporters in visiting churches of one particular denomination. The statement was evidently inspired, and, if so, may be received with as much qualification as the reader chooses. We observe, however, that these reporters describe the frescoes, the vestments, the processions, and, above all, the music, at Roman Catholic churches, but do not in general tell us much about the ladies' dresses. Indeed, if we were guided by these reports, we should infer that there is some occult affinity between Methodism and millinery.

We can only hope that the reporter out of work who was willing to write sermons "in the flowery style" at three for five-and-twenty shillings may be induced to abandon ungrateful Liverpool and cross the water to New York, where his talents are certain to be appreciated. He might set up a church of his own, preach in it on Sunday, and report his own sermons with improvements on Monday. We do not know whether his reverend employer ought to be quoted as an authority as to what is suitable for the Church of England, but we have no manner of doubt that he would be an enormously popular preacher in New York. Let him make a permanent arrangement with his late assistant, and let them emigrate together to New York, where one could work a church on Sunday, and the other a newspaper on Monday. The undertaking would certainly be profitable.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

V.

THE late John Phillip was one of the very few English painters who can be said to have formed a school, and yet strictly speaking he was himself only a scholar. At the present moment two or more artists can be named who, following in the wake of Mr. Phillip, might compete for the distinctive title of our English Murillo. Foremost this year stands Mr. Long, who, in a style eminently brilliant though somewhat trite, awakens sympathy on behalf of picturesque and charming "Suppliants" (64). The mind is carried back more than two centuries to the famous city of Toledo, at the time when the decree had gone forth for the expulsion of the gipsies from Spain. Like the family of Darius at the feet of Alexander in the great picture by Paul Veronese, the suppliants on bended knees crave for mercy. But instead of the dazzling colour of Venice, we have the sombre shadow and the lurid hue of the school of Seville at the time when Murillo might be seen in the cathedral square sketching flower girls and beggar boys. Yet it cannot be said that Mr. Long, in following the footsteps of the great master of Andalusia, has forsaken nature; it must not be forgotten that Spain has been for the painter singularly exempt from change, that up to this very day are seen in the streets of Seville, Granada, and Toledo figures which might have served for models to Murillo, and that this permanence of type, costume, and manners is especially maintained among the gipsies here brought by Mr. Long vividly on the scene. Inasmuch, then, as characters long dead still survive in their descendants, the painter does not need to turn to imagination for his facts or to tradition for his treatment. The stern ecclesiastic, the stately noble, the voluptuous maiden lavish of her charms, are here thrown upon canvas to the very life. The drawing and modelling are careful, the whole composition has been sedulously brought into unity of light, shade, and colour. And yet the work is wanting in that impulse, passion, and dramatic action which may be rightly considered as the pledge and the measure of artistic genius; it thus falls short of the first order of merit. In like manner somewhat less than superlative praise is all that can be accorded to Mr. Burgess for his nicely painted, happily composed incident, "Kissing Halles in Spain" (466). The children, however, could not possibly be better; indeed Mr. Long and Mr. Burgess have from time to time brought from Spain boys and girls with heads of the beauty of cherubs, and limbs supple, graceful, and agile; the hands move to the castanet, the feet fly to the dance at the sound of the tambourine. Each race has its distinctive beauty in childhood; "heaven lies about us in our infancy"; but the joyous light on life's opening days was darkened in the dirty beggar boys of Murillo. Mr. Long and Mr. Burgess have done well to discard dirt and rags; indeed our domesticated Spanish school has been sometimes dreary to a fault; it has cast over Southern life Byronic sentiment and colour, it has painted up to the romantic and rapturous strain of "The Dark-eyed Girl of Cadiz," a style which alike in poetry and painting is well nigh worn out. Yet another painter, Mr. Halswelle, has been enrolled among the disciples of John Phillip. This artist, following up the success of former years, is more conspicuous for size than for subtlety, for power than for refinement, delicacy, or finish. "The Elevation of the Host" (936) is a composition in perfect keeping in its component parts; the figures correspond in style to the architectural decoration. The artist seems to paint up to the pitch of what is most flaunting and pretentious in the Renaissance of quaint growth. In conclusion we may observe that this Anglicized Spanish art has nothing to correspond with it in the contemporary art of Spain and other Continental States. England follows Murillo, while Spain aspires to emulate Velasquez, Zurbaran, and Herrera.

In this travelling age, when painters become more and more cosmopolitan, home and homish themes give place to distant climes and peoples; indeed the four quarters of the globe may be said to congregate in Piccadilly. Among artists who have gone far afield, among students of nature who show themselves sensitive to Southern or Oriental spell, and absorb or reflect heat from the tropical sun, Mr. Lewis, R.A., and Mr. Goodall, R.A., have long been conspicuous. Of Mr. Lewis, indeed, the complaint is heard that his art has no more serious purpose than to make a sun-beam dance and dazzle, and we incline to think that the theme which he now chooses, "The Prayer of Faith shall Save the Sick" (242), is little else than the exception which proves the rule. This cunning manipulator would seem to inculcate the doctrine that faces are subordinate to draperies, that human beings are shadows and nonentities, while textile fabrics, ceramic wares, metal work, and wood lattice-windows are the only realities which have true worth in life or in art. Flowers also are permitted to enter the painter's magic world of beauty; thus, in a work perfect of its kind, "The Lilium Auratum" (465), poppies and roses and lilies, as tall as the figures, vie with gold-embroidered sashes and robes; the flowers live, the faces are but the semblance of life. The opposite manner of Mr. Goodall was never seen in greater force than in "The Head of the House at Prayer" (201). The praying Arab stands in grand isolation; Allah alone is present to the rapt contemplation of the soul; the tent, the sheep, the camels, and the sandy desert sink into fitting pictorial subordination; the setting sun lights up the distant hills, the quiet of evening overshadows the plain. And withal the great charm of the work is its verisimilitude. Mr. Goodall has sometimes thrown around Eastern scenes an artificial halo; he is now unusually strong because he does not depart from sober truth, and yet never has he planned a composition with more consummate art.

The Academy, it has been said, shows a growing proneness to what is sometimes termed common nature; indeed many of our artists, instead of addicting themselves to the once favourite study of the beautiful, seem devoted disciples of the philosophy of ugliness. We do not wish to make any serious charge against Mr. Nicol, A.R.A.; the vocation of painters is fortunately various, and to this uncompromising student of nature has been fitly committed the task of depicting trenchant character. He gives us heads rudely modelled by the conflict of circumstance; men who, though often begrimed in dirt, are not absolutely disgusting—who, though shrewd and scheming, need not be dishonest. We may account it a mercy when this painter does not make an exorbitant demand of space for his unsavoury models; indeed the most fastidious tastes will have little repugnance to studies so broad in humour as "His Da'bees" (11), and "Bothered" (356). The handling has power and mastery; the expression is enhanced by concentration of purpose upon the one ruling thought. In the naturalistic category we may also place the vigorous, but not always refined, contributions of Mr. Watson, Mr. Marsh, Mr. Barwell, Mr. Chester, and Mr. Opie. Mr. Watson for once is not too large for a small plain idea; "A Tiff" (21) is a composition which commends itself by vigour and colour. Mr. Marsh, who in the Old Water Colour Society has shown kinship to Mr. Watson, surpasses himself in "The Signal; Breakers on the Bar—Keep Outside" (982). Here at all events may be commended the resolute study of sturdy tars; but the draperies want definition, and the figures fall into a disorganized mass or mob, instead of being resolved into a well-ordered composition. Such slumminess, such lack of art treatment, severs this rude naturalism from the pastorals and idyls which Mr. Hook evokes from land and sea. Mr. Barwell, also following in the track of common nature, has lost that place on the line which was accorded to early works of promise. But to urge want of beauty or lack of æsthetic sense were perhaps wholly to mistake the purpose of "A Sister of Mercy" (370). It is strange as it is lamentable that when a painter has nothing more than the tritest of pictorial ideas at command he cannot be content with a few square inches of canvas. Many are the works pardoned in duodecimo which could not be tolerated in quarto. "A Love Spell" (142), by Mr. Chester, is yet another example of size at the expense of refinement, a telling title is here used as if to disguise common materials and a trite composition. As a matter of course, the artist interlards the catalogue with verse; pictures destitute of a single spark of poetry are usually thus interpreted and adorned. As a rule, the best works speak for themselves; on the other hand, signal failures in the Academy and elsewhere strive, by pretentious titles or long quotations from great authors, to escape contempt or oblivion. Pictures which perspicuously and pleasantly tell their own story are usually the most popular; such, for example, as the well-painted "Poison Test" (1037), by Mr. C. Green, and that clever composition in the happiest mood of Mr. Hicks, "Letters from Home; Post-Office and Store at the Australian Diggings" (332); also may be added "From Generation to Generation" (415), by Mr. Calthrop, and "Le Malade imaginaire" (992), by M. D. T. White. The last two painters have profited by French training. We never willingly ignore the name of Opie, even though now recalled to memory only by "A Travelling Tinker" (445). Mr. E. Opie, a kinsman of "the wondrous Cornish boy," and himself a Cornishman, has that rough and ready talent which in outlying districts almost of necessity takes a naturalistic turn. It is fortunate when fowls of the air do not devour seed which falls by the wayside.

Love of country, clanishness, love of home, affection for house and family, continue to yield congenial motives to our painters. Scotch artists, of whom Mr. Thomas Faed, R.A., may be taken as a type, are powerfully strong in home affection, and it is interesting to observe how, in such themes as "God's Acre" (347), a naturalism which otherwise might be rude and common is elevated by emotion and sanctified by religion. For melting sorrow, mingled with wonder and awe, nothing can surpass the two little children at the open grave. The mourners with the coffin labour up the hill; sorrowing friends and neighbours stand at reverent distance; the day is wet and cold, clouds shroud the hills as the peasant is borne to his last resting-place among the mountains. The story is told with heart-felt simplicity. Perhaps the technical qualities are not quite satisfactory; the forms are rather blurred, the touch is muddled, even to rottenness. Yet we are not sure how far these seeming defects are intentional; we have to take into account that a sharp sparkling touch would dispel the solemnity and dissipate the gloom. Mr. Holl may have found himself in a like dilemma when he laid heavy hand on his brush and toned down his colours with funeral shadows. Scenes of this excess of melancholy, if not beyond the region of art, can hardly be otherwise than painful. But the execution is downright and earnest; the faces, too, are close studies of sorrow in its divers phases—the blank which death has left, the hour of nothingness when all is taken away, the stunned stupor of the senses. Yet the delineation is realistic rather than imaginative. The "Raising of Lazarus" in the National Gallery may tell with how much sublimity Sebastian del Piombo, Michael Angelo, and others of the olden time encompassed death and the resurrection. Our modern art fails in imaginative insight.

The genre pictures in the Academy—compositions of the Teniers, Ostade, and Wilkie type—from the smallness of their size and the comparative insignificance of their subjects, may scarcely obtain the consideration which their art merit deserves. In this humble department the number of practitioners is large; thus we have marked for excellence seldom below the first degree Mr. Webster, R.A. (189), Mr. Le Jeune, A.R.A. (195), Messrs. George Smith (405), F. D. Hardy (525), O. Hunt (1028), J. Clark (156, 357), J. Faed (979), A. Provis (154), W. Weekes (375, 672), and E. Mulready (316). Pictures of this class, when they reach the fair average merit implied by a good place in the Academy, are seldom provocative of criticism, hostile or other; they are apt to be all much alike; they conform to the elementary grammar of art; they follow in so beaten a track that they seldom deviate into originality. The first rank in this order of merit is usually accorded to Mr. Webster, R.A., an artist who may be said to have taken good schoolboys under his special charge, at a glance we recognize habitual finish, refinement, quietude, in a schoolboy game, called "Odd or Even" (189). Apparently Mr. Banks is of the Webster school. "A Winter-day Recreations" (1063) gains a conspicuous place on the line, and "Marbles" (593), by Mr. J. Morgan, is equally favoured. Mr. Le Jeune, A.R.A., is distinguished from his fellows by a beauty, grace, and sweetness exceptional in the sphere of genre; a group of little anglers of "Great Expectations" (195) may teach us how the smallest page in the book of nature is written with a poetry which in art becomes beauty. Mr. Le Jeune's children are clean; it were well to oust boys wallowing in mire from picture-galleries and drawing-rooms. Mr. John Faed errs in the opposite direction; he continues clean and smooth to a fault. "Lady Betty Germaine" (978), is as a pretty miniature framed in a neat landscape. Mr. Hayllar, seldom over-refined, makes a happy hit—"Links in the Chain of Life" (907). Boyish frolic runs on all fours along the floor; in a corner a courtship is far advanced; the artist has an effective way of throwing light and colour into faces; he knows the tricks which arrest the eye. We name, as the best example of what may be termed the Wilkie school, "Paying the Legacies" (409), by Mr. George Smith. We would also direct attention to some capital little works, especially "Our Good-natured Cousin" (316), by Mr. A. E. Mulready, son of the late Academician. This young artist makes a hopeful beginning; in drawing and execution he is scarcely a novice; he seizes the points in a story, he enlivens his narrative with wit and humour. Wit seldom ventures to enter a place so grave and decorous as the Academy; perhaps, indeed, the sportive faculties of the mind express themselves more freely in crayon or pencil than in the heavy vehicle of oils.

The paucity this year of foreign pictures admits of easy explanation:—First, the space within the Academy is barely sufficient to satisfy the just demands of our native artists; secondly, other Galleries, especially the International corridors at South Kensington, serve to draft off surplus foreign populations, the worthless superfluities of Continental art. The aim of the Academy should be to weed out coarse and rampant growths, and to plant in the midst of our English school the rarest products only. It may seem a little discouraging that the creation of "Honorary Foreign Academicians" proves a failure; again out of a total of six only one cares to contribute. M. Gallait, already notorious for that bloody horror, Counts Egmont and Horn decapitated, now perpetrates pictures equally sensational and revolting. He commences with "La Paix" (1005), a happy group—a young mother with children nestling on her knee. Then in the companion composition, "La Guerre" (1006), this same mother is killed, the child is dead, the faithful dog also has been shot; there only survives a little boy, who, terrified into sudden consciousness of the dread reality, rushes with heartrending screams to his dead mother's arms. Such unveiled horrors have been rightly accounted low and vulgar. It may be remembered that a Greek painter covered with a mantle a character beyond the limits permitted to tragedy in art. It may also be worthy of remark that Sir Edwin Landseer in "Peace" and "War" moves the spectator not so much by horse and man waltering in blood as by a little lamb eating a leaf and flower from the cannon's mouth. M. Gallait during a long residence in Paris may have acquired that thirst for blood which is a crying vice in French art. We will pass over contributions by M. Israels, M. Alma Tadema, M. Legros, M. Tourrier, and M. Tissot (the last four, domiciled in London, almost cease to be foreign) in order to speak of a small work, which, calm as it is intense, indicates the line of deparkation between drama and melodrama, between noble passion and ignoble spasm. Madame de Saux, better known in exhibitions as Madame Henriette Brown, has, like M. Gallait, dwelt on the terrors of war, yet not in the carnage of the battle-field. She takes us to a retired room where orphan sisters hold sacred a sorrow too deep for the world to witness. The simplicity and earnestness of the treatment are in keeping with the deep sincerity of the thought. The artist, known throughout Europe by her "Sister of Charity," is said first to master a subject mentally, to grasp the conception strongly, after which she works out from nature each figure and detail with the truth of a portrait, the reality of actual life. It is not surprising that her pictures at once carry conviction to the mind.

REVIEWS.

HOOK'S LIFE OF ARCHBISHOP PARKER.*

(Second Notice.)

IN coming to a more minute examination of the contents of this volume, we will begin by congratulating Dean Hook on an improvement of a physical kind which makes the Life of Parker much easier to read and understand than the Lives of any of his predecessors. The earlier Lives formed each an unbroken chapter, an arrangement which became serious when a chapter, as in the case of Pole, filled a whole volume, or, as in the case of Cranmer, more than a whole volume. Parker also fills a whole volume, but he is happily divided into several chapters, to the great comfort of his readers. Dr. Hook has made another great improvement by bringing in a certain amount of marginal analysis and of marginal dates. We are however greedy enough to wish for some more of both, especially of the dates. They are specially wanted in some of the chapters towards the end, where Dr. Hook does not follow strict chronological order, but deals with particular aspects of Parker's life and character in separate chapters. And again, in the early part it is still a little perplexing to look up to the top of the page and see "Matthew Parker, 1559-75," when one is reading about some part of Parker's doings long before 1559. Dr. Hook has in these matters improved the Parker volume so much that we hope to see further improvement still in the Grindal volume.

And now for some notice of Matthew Parker himself and his biography as given by Dr. Hook. We fancy that Parker's name is less known to the "general reader" than it should be. If "the Reformers" or "the Reformation" is spoken of, people at once cry out "Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer." If this is simply because they were burned, it is unfair to Hooper and Farrar; if it is because they are believed to have been specially prominent in organizing the Reformed system, Latimer at least has no business on the list. But, if the Reformation of the Church of England is to have the name of any particular Bishop attached to it, it should clearly be that of Parker rather than that of anybody else. It was in his time that the Church took, after the shiftings of the reigns of Henry, Edward, and Mary, the form which, with little change, it has kept ever since. Perhaps if Parker had been burned, he might have been as famous as the others. But then it was unluckily inherent in Parker's peculiar position that he should not be burned. If the Reformation was to be finally set up, it was needful that some people should live through the persecution to set it up. This particular duty fell to the lot of Parker and those with whom he acted. They could not be Marian martyrs, because they had to be Elizabethan Reformers.

Parker did not rise to any high place, or take any prominent part in affairs, till he had reached a mature time of life. In no man's life is it more needful to remember, what we all sometimes unconsciously forget, that men are not born at the time when their names first appear in history. Parker plays no important part in history till the reign of Elizabeth; but he was born in the reign of Henry the Seventh. Born in 1504, he was four years younger than his predecessor Pole, twenty years younger than his predecessor Cranmer. When those questions began to be discussed which led to the changes which he had a hand in bringing to their final shape, Parker was a young man at Cambridge, taking his degrees, being elected to his fellowship, being ordained deacon and priest. He thus saw the whole thing with his own eyes, and he saw the beginning of it at a time of life when men are apt to be carried away with that fashion of thought and teaching which has been last set forth, whatever it may be. But there is nothing to show that Parker was one of those who suddenly or eagerly took up the new teaching. He was a friend of Bilney, and he attended him at his execution; but there is nothing to show that he shared Bilney's opinions, which, after all, were political or social rather than theological. He went on during the reign of Henry the Eighth, distinguished as a scholar and preacher, keeping together, after the fashion of the time and of times long before and long after, a number of smaller ecclesiastical and academical preferments, but more than once declining a bishopric. He was chaplain to Anne Boleyn, and he was chaplain to Henry after her death. As Queen's chaplain, he was appointed Dean of the College of Stoke by Clare in Suffolk, a foundation of the House of Mortimer, but which seems to have somehow got into a special relation to the Queens of England. This was in 1535. Nine years later, in 1544, he was chosen, after no uncommon fashion, by royal mandate, to the post in which, next to the primacy of all England, he did most to make himself remembered, the Mastership of Corpus Christi or Bene't College, Cambridge. In the mode of appointment, as we have sometimes before remarked, there was nothing wonderful. Kings freely interfered with the rights of patronage and election in all ways; the practice prevailed as an invariable custom in the election to Old-Foundation Deaneries down to the present reign; in the case of Bishoprics it is legalised. The interference with the rights of the College was just as great when Henry the Eighth recommended Matthew Parker to the Fellows of Bene't College as when James the Second recommended Anthony Farmer to the Fellows of Magdalen College; only Parker was legally and personally qualified for the office, and Farmer was neither. On his College Parker has left his mark, both in the increase of its foundation and in the creation of that precious library of which so many scholars have felt the benefit. Of his Deanery at Stoke Dr. Hook gives a pleasant account; Parker seems to have used it as a sort of country house to withdraw to from Cambridge; but he did not treat it as a mere sinecure; by his preaching, by his care for education and the general well being of the neighbourhood, he seems to have won general respect and influence. On the establishment of secular canons at Ely, Parker received one of the first prebends, and he held, together or successively, several parochial benefices. But Dr. Hook remarks that all his preferments lay in one district, as if he were anxious that none should be altogether beyond his power of at least occasionally looking after them. We know not whether Dr. Hook has any authority for the surmise that Parker declined any higher office because he designed to marry. But it is certain that he did marry, and that before clerical marriage was strictly legal. The time of his marriage with Margaret Harleston was significant; it was in June 1547, five months after the death of Henry the Eighth. There was now no danger in such a step, but clerical marriages were not formally legalised, and then somewhat grudgingly, till the Act of 1549. This should be remembered when we come to the story of Queen Elizabeth's famous speech to Mrs. Parker years after at Lambeth; "Madam I may not call you, Mistress I would not call you." Of this speech Dr. Hook hardly brings out the full force. The word "Mistress" makes it uglier to a modern ear than it was meant to be. "Mistress"—now cut short into "Miss"—was, then and long after, the common title of an unmarried lady. The Queen's meaning in modern language would be, "I cannot quite call you Mrs. Parker, and I don't like to call you Miss Harleston." And we cannot wonder at this, when Parker had married before the law allowed him to do so, and when, years afterwards, as Archbishop, he found it prudent to have his children specially legitimated. And it is worth notice that there was no married Archbishop of Canterbury between Parker and Tillotson. Grindal and Whitgift, Abbot and Laud, were alike in that matter.

When the collegiate churches were first placed at the mercy of Henry, Stoke was saved by the intercession of his last Queen. But of course it fell, along with all kindred foundations, in the first year of the new reign. This suppression of Colleges was a mere job, which, it should be remembered, Cranmer and Bonner opposed side by side. It is hard to see how Church or State was profited when the College estates passed from Parker and his prebendaries—teachers and preachers as they were, at least under him—to Sir John Cheke and Walter Mildmay, subject to a pension to Parker and, we suppose, to the other members of the College. The only thing to be said is that they might easily have fallen into worse hands. A few years after this Parker reached the highest preferment which he reached at this stage of his life, namely, the Deanery of Lincoln. During this whole time he seems purposely to have kept himself in the background, and Dr. Hook quotes several letters in which he is pressed to take a more prominent part in the affairs of Church and State. Once or twice during Henry's reign he seems to have been suspected of heresy, but nothing was ever proved against him, and he went on through the reigns of Henry and Edward conforming without scruple to all successive changes, though Dr. Hook assures us he preferred the First Prayer Book of Edward to the Second. Twice his name is mentioned in connexion with public affairs. At the time of Kett's rebellion Parker was at Norwich, and he was popular with the insurgents. On this Dr. Hook comments that "it is further to be remarked, that through his preaching, and the preaching of his associates at Stoke College, this was the only place in which the Reformation was received by the common people without opposition, and, we may even say, with some measure of favour." At any rate, Parker ventured to go out to Kett's camp at the Oak of Reformation, and to exhort the people to strive after a peaceful instead of a violent redress of their grievances. The other time was when Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, came to Cambridge to proclaim Queen Jane. Parker seems to have trimmed; he supped with the Duke, but he did not afterwards come forward on either side, so that, when the tide turned in favour of Mary, he had, according to an obscure story, to fly from Cambridge in haste, when he fell from his horse and broke his leg. At the accession of Mary he was deprived of all his preferments, not however at once, but gradually, and to most of them he was allowed to name his successors. He remained in England during the whole of Mary's reign, and there is no evidence that he was in any way molested. In a passage which Dr. Hook marks with inverted commas Parker describes himself as "living as a private individual," and enjoying "delightful literary leisure." We do not doubt as to the fact, but we confess to be a little puzzled as to the language, for such phrases as "private individual" and "literary leisure" do not seem exactly to belong to the age of Parker. But the fact that Parker lived quietly through all Mary's reign is worthy of all the importance which Dr. Hook gives to it. It seems not to have satisfied the class whom Dr. Hook speaks of as "Protestant hagiologists," who have invented divers persecutions for him. But it seems plain that he suffered nothing beyond the loss of his preferments. Dr. Hook takes this opportunity to enlarge in his usual way on the state of parties at the time. With his classification of them we generally agree, though we wish that he would not talk about "Medievalists with Protestant proclivities." And we do not understand when, after giving a generally correct, though perhaps a little exaggerated, picture of the secular clergy as accepting, and the regulars as rejecting, the successive changes of the Reformation, we come to the following passage:—

* Life of the Archbishop of Canterbury. By Walter Farquhar Hook, D.D., F.R.S. Volume IX. Reformation Period. London: Bentley & Son. 1872.

Some of the Regulars, by assuming the character of secular priests, occasionally obtained possession of preferments in the Church; but these were exceptional cases, not noted by the historian.

We really do not know how to reconcile this with Dr. Hook's own account, in his Life of Cranmer (vii. 23), of the way in which, on the reconstitution of Canterbury Cathedral, a very large proportion of the members of the dissolved monastic body received stalls and other offices on the new foundation.

We have dwelt at some length on Parker's earlier life for more than one reason. It is important to see what manner of man it was whom Elizabeth picked out to receive the highest office in the English Church. The earlier life of Parker throws more light on this than the latter. Elizabeth first offered the primacy to one or more men who had been actually employed by her sister. She then offered it to a man of known learning and singular moderation, who had never taken any extreme part, and whom her sister had not thought fit to molest further than by loss of his preferments. This clearly points to a wish to change as little as possible. And this really proves more as to the character and objects of both the Queen and the Primate than the events of their actual administration. Circumstances made both of them go further in the way of change than either, if left alone, would most likely have wished. The middle position which Henry kept, and which Elizabeth no doubt wished to keep, could not be kept. Thirlby and Parker had once held the same position; the events of Mary's reign made that position an impossible one, and they parted off in opposite ways. The moment when Elizabeth offered the primacy to Wotton, possibly to Feckenham, and, failing them, to Parker, marks the last moment when the middle position even seemed to be possible.

For this reason the early life of Parker, when he acted more directly according to his own opinions and feelings, is in some points more important than his administration as Primate when he had to act as circumstances made him act. And we also think that this earlier part is the better part of Dr. Hook's present volume. We somehow seem to care more for Parker in his Decestry at Stoke and in his College at Cambridge than we do when he gets to Canterbury and Lambeth. One thing is that, though Dr. Hook's division of his volume into chapters is a great improvement, yet he has divided them too much by subjects and too little by periods, so that we sometimes lose the chronological thread of the narrative. On the whole, we are not very sorry that we have run on so fast about Parker's early life, and still more about the important and often misunderstood position which he represents, as to leave us little space to talk about the actual events of his primacy. But in one point of his character, spreading over both periods of his life, we must join with Dr. Hook in doing him honour. Parker had very odd notions of the duty of an editor, but it is owing to him, more than to any other man, that there is anything to edit and anything to read about the early history of England. In this manner his biographer, who has had such opportunities of testing the value of his services, does him full justice. To the great preserver and reviver of English historical learning we can even forgive that, in defending the independence of Canterbury against Rome, he partly rested his argument on the independence of the early British Church. Under a Tudor reign there was perhaps special temptation to do so. The worthiest monument of Parker is his College at Cambridge and its renowned Library.

We have mentioned that in this volume there are several great improvements in what we may call the editing, as distinguished from the actual composition of the work; but there are things new and there which puzzle us, and which seem to go beyond any bounds which we can allow to the vagaries of the printer. What can be meant, for instance, when we read in p. 237 that "it was the bestowal of ecclesiastical preferments that knovers sought to remunerate their servants"; for "lawyers" we should rather have expected to find Kings and Queens, for no one has taught us better or more clearly than Dr. Hook, that when we find a man at once Bishop and Chancellor, the truer state of the case is that the Chancellor became Bishop than that the Bishop became Chancellor. When in pp. 381, 382 we read, "Some administer the communion with surplice and cap, some with surplices alone, some with neither," for "cap" we should surely read cope. It is most likely the printer who in page 404 makes Pope Pius the Fifth call Elizabeth a "vassal"—surely it should be a vassal—"of all iniquity." But we do not understand how, when "in the latter churches the chief minister was obliged to wear a cope, two other ministers, called the Deacon and Archdeacon, were to assist him in the reading of the Epistle and Gospel." We cannot make out this peculiar form of "archidiaconal functions," and we might have suggested sub-deacons: only did sub-deacons go on so long? We doubt whether knighthood was (p. 562) "considered a high distinction" on King James the First's "arrival at Westminster in 1603." Lastly, Dr. Hook tells us in page 391 that

Dr. Sampson had been attracted from the peaceful deanery of Chichester to the deanery of Christ Church, which placed him at the head of society in Oxford.

We had hardly thought that this peculiar duty of the Dean of Christ Church was so ancient; and, as Dr. Hook has found much to tell us about Mrs. Parker, we are anxious to know something about Mrs. Sampson also, if there was such a person.

Dr. Hook must not think that, because we point out two or three things of this kind, we value his book the less. Some parts we think might be better arranged, but he has done real service in pointing out the true position of Parker, and all that Parker represents, more clearly than it has ever been pointed out before. We wish him all health and strength for the lives of Grindal and his successors.

DR. ANGUS SMITH ON AIR AND RAIN.*

A GREAT stride in advance has been made in the theory and practice of chemistry since Dalton, in the last year of his life, declared it impossible to distinguish by chemical experiment between the air of Manchester and the air of Helvellyn. To no one in this country is the progress since made in this important department of hygiene more to be attributed than to Dr. Angus Smith, who in his paper read before the British Association in 1857 was the first to propound a solution of the problem pronounced impracticable by one whom he allows to be the father of meteorology, no less than of scientific chemistry in the strict sense. A pupil of Liebig, to whom he appropriately dedicates the matured fruit of his studies upon this new and important branch of inquiry, Dr. Angus Smith has won his way to the point which he pronounces "the beginnings of a chemical climatology," not so much by the use of novel methods or analytical tests beyond those ordinarily available, as by concentration of his powers of observation, by multiplication of experiments and careful correlation of the best known modes of analysis. In the series of papers of which the volume now presented to us is made up will be found abundant use of the analytical methods of Liebig, Bunsen, and Nessier, together with the improvements upon the plan of Forchhammer for applying to the air the process of decomposing organic substances which we owe to Messrs. Wanklyn, Chapman, and Smith. The greater portion of the facts which are embodied in his most recent conclusions were accumulated by the writer whilst acting for the Royal Commission on the Ventilation of Mines, or as Inspector under the Factory Acts, and were to a great extent incorporated in his printed Reports. The earlier part, forming the foundation of the whole, was, he tells us, put together many years ago chiefly for the information of the Board of Health. Eight years since a work upon Air and Water was advertised by him, and the part on Water actually written, but kept back by other pursuits until the advance of science put it rather out of date. To write a new book from the beginning was a task from which the author naturally shrank, with so much material ready to hand, besides being in effect new to the public, buried as it was in reports and blue-books. The result of all this is, from a literary point of view, far from satisfactory. The volume is disjointed and utterly wanting in order and method. The discussion upon Rain, one-third of the book, is thrust in without rhyme or reason, in the very middle of that upon Air. Repetitions abound over and over again. There are no divisions into chapters to make reference easy; and, beyond all, the style of writing is ungainly and confused to a degree which makes the book not only difficult, but distasteful to read. At best it calls for notice as a summary of experiments and statistics of the highest value for further differentiation and analysis, and as a record of labours carried on in a spirit of patience and devotion to science well nigh approaching to heroism.

The most original and important of Dr. Angus Smith's experiments were made at the expense of a voluntary martyrdom. In the course of the inquiry for the Mines Commission, the need of a closed chamber for testing the principal agents in atmospheric deterioration was forced upon his mind. In such a laboratory, better than in the mine, could he hope to analyse and determine the amount of impurity engendered by candles, by gunpowder, and by the human breath, as well as that due to the haziness organic substances, such as tallow, tobacco, the human skin, and putrefaction of minor bodies. These manifold sources of miasma mingled in a manner defying separation, but intensely disagreeable even when a smaller volume than a cubic inch of air was inhaled. Upon the ground-floor of a house, fitted to bear the weight, a chamber was prepared of sheet lead, fused into one piece by the application of the hydrogen flame to the edges of each sheet. This chamber was 6 feet long, about 4 feet in breadth, and 8 feet high, its cubic contents amounting to about 170 feet. The half of one end and part of the side opposite was made of glass, which could be broken in case of danger. The door was of lead, except where of glass, hung on heavy pivots, and made to fit closely by means of caoutchouc, though it was not needful for the chamber to withstand any great pressure of air. Through the wooden framework and leaden casing holes were bored at one end, through which passed tubes of glass, continued with vulcanized india-rubber for the extraction of specimens of the air. In this room, accommodated with a chair and small table for apparatus, the contriver, sometimes with a companion or two, spent hour after hour in studying by the test of his own feelings, as well as by chemical analysis, the impurities induced by respiration or by chemical agents artificially admitted. Without claiming to be peculiarly sensitive to evil airs or odours, his love for keen, fresh air is perhaps beyond the average, as he feels an actual pleasure in east wind. Still, in the pursuit of science he could "bear anything in the way of air," and thus kept from him all such evils as might arise from imagination, even under the pressure of actual and long-continued discomfort.

* Air and Water: the Beginnings of a Chemical Climatology. By Angus Smith, F.R.S., F.C.S. (General) Inspector of Alkali Works for the Government. London: Longmans & Co. 1874.

The first trial of the chamber was made by simply sitting down for an hour and forty minutes. The result was about one per cent. of carbonic acid. The air, though very moist, at  $45^{\circ}\text{F}$ ., felt dull and cheerless, with an unpleasant smell of organic matter, especially felt when moving rapidly through the room. By persons entering as the author left it the air was pronounced extremely bad, though to him it seemed no worse than what we are frequently exposed to. He has not, however, found in ordinary life any air reduced like this to no more than twenty per cent. of oxygen. The second time, after 160 minutes, the oxygen was reduced to 19.61. A series of tables compiled from successive experiments exhibits the results of prolonged combustion both by the test of personal feeling and of objective trial. In Table II., with four miner's-candles, no person being inside, the candles went out after 5 hours and 10 minutes with 18.80 of oxygen and 2.28 of carbonic acid. Table III., with eight candles, one paraffin lamp, and one spirit lamp, shows the different effects of position and of height in the room. The candle nearest the roof went out in 50 minutes, as did one next the window at the height of the table, and one on the floor near the side. One on the table and two window candles went out 8 minutes later, one on the table in 75, one on the chair in 90, and, finally, the last one on the floor in 93 minutes; the paraffin lamp burned 98 minutes, and the spirit lamp 150, the oxygen being then 18.40, and the carbonic acid 2.45. Two or three persons then entered, with candles and a spirit lamp, which were at once extinguished, nor could matches be made to ignite. Still the party could breathe without difficulty for a while, till a gradual and indescribable feeling of discomfort arose, partaking of restlessness and anxiety without pain. The breathing, as in all similar experiments, increased in rapidity, while the pulse fell. Afterwards gas was lighted and burned with brilliancy. On entering after the gas had gone out—he does not say that it went out of itself, so we presume it was turned off—Dr. Angus Smith found candles extinguished as rapidly and completely as if they had been plunged into water. Nevertheless, he and his friends still breathed, though every one felt anxious to go out. Standing upon a chair he felt an incipient faintness; but the senses were not annoyed beyond a feeling of closeness, which he describes as by no means so unpleasant as a schoolroom. And this he considers, with reason, a very significant fact, as it shows the influence due to organic matter, of which there was little here, but much in the schoolroom. "The lungs seemed to refuse expansion, without the senses being able to indicate a reason." The minimum amount of oxygen was not taken, but after the door had been opened for the admission of these persons, it stood at no more than 17.45 per cent. Our faith in the senses as indices or guides is shaken by these experiments. The senses are quite unable to measure and raise an alarm at a degree of closeness represented by 0.1 per cent. of carbonic acid, though they may when there is as much as 4 per cent. The approach of fainting in the instance quoted shows how little the air becomes worse to the senses, while the lack of oxygen or increase of carbonic acid was telling upon the vital act. No room is wholesome, the author considers proved, with less than 20.7 per cent. of oxygen; yet so more is present in many a workshop. A faintness is indeed produced when the oxygen falls to 17.4; but is there no corresponding injury, it may be asked, when the numbers range between these, imperceptible as it may be to the senses? If a man lives when a candle goes out, is it a proof that he is little affected?

Upon the subject of simple and popular tests for carbonic acid in houses, workshops, or mines, Dr. Angus Smith supplies many hints which, if not wholly new, have the merit of being thoroughly practical, as well as of being worked out by careful experiments. The baryta or lime-water test having, after many stages, become accurate in the ship heads of St. Lawrence, has also been simplified and made theoretically complete by Dalton and Mr. Haddfield. Edinburgh, working our author believes, independently of either, has imparted to the instrument used by him a scientific refinement which has made its employment difficult in mines, where there must be little to carry, little to do, and little to think of. Dr. Angus Smith found his own earlier test valuable in such places, whilst the comparison of precipitates of lime recommended by Dr. Baswell Reid failed long ago, the precipitate changing in physical appearance. Nothing better suggested itself than greater exactitude in the use of baryta or lime. By combination with an oxalic acid solution, a basis was formed for a new method of analysis to which our author has given the name "minimetric." Although carbonic acid is far from being the only impurity in air, its presence and quantity may be taken as the readiest chemical test for the purification of rooms. We have however by the same method the means of determining the presence of hydrochloric acid, sulphuric and sulphurous acids, sulphuretted hydrogen, and other deleterious gases. Dr. Angus Smith's tables give the amounts and strengths of precipitates corresponding to definite amounts of carbonic acid. As their practical result, the order may be given for any degree of purity required in a dwelling-house or working-place, and an uneducated man can tell at a glance when the amount of carbonic acid is too great. A bottle holding 5.43 ounces is filled with the air of the place, to which is added half an ounce of baryta or lime water, no matter of what strength. On shaking the bottle, if there is no precipitate the air is not worse than .04 per cent. For finer quantities a bottle holding 7.06 ounces is recommended. In private houses not more than .07 should be allowed. But should we be satisfied with .06 or .07 per cent. we must take a bottle of 3.78 ounces; if with 10 per cent., which many houses will contain on some evenings, a bottle of 2.46 ounces is enough. If in workshops as much as .25 per cent. is allowed, which ought never to be the case, then a 1.29 ounce bottle will suffice. The use of this simple method would enable us to say, "This is 6-ounce air, that is 4-ounce air, that is 2-ounce air," meaning that 6.4 or 2 ounces of it cause a precipitate in baryta water, or more readily still in lime water, simply prepared from burnt lime slaked with water, and dissolved by shaking, then left to stand in a bottle till clear. "No weighing is called for, no measuring, and we may almost say no thinking." Half the work of sanitary reform is done if in any cottage where a vial and a little lime are at hand it is enough to act on the rule "Let us keep our rooms so that the air gives no precipitate when a 10-ounce bottle full is shaken with half an ounce of clear lime water." Less simple tests are proposed where greater accuracy is required. Rosolic acid has been used by our author, as well as the manganates and ferrates, further particulars of the methods employed being given in a later part of the volume.

Of at least equal importance to healthy ventilation is the amount of organic matter in the air. Upon the presence and action of organic germs, the tests of their numbers, and even of their individual bulk, Dr. Angus Smith gives details which will be fresh and striking to most readers. It is a speculation whether germs of animal or vegetable matter in the air are the cause of disease. But to this he offers a counter speculation, whether germs do not also bring life and vigour. Is it certain, he asks, that the operations of life could go on without those organisms? There is much reason, he thinks, in the suggestion of a scientific friend, that the presence of organic bodies in the air may influence very strongly and strangely the germination of all animals, including the human being. Nor does he see any objection a priori, save that of the long and intense cold to be traversed in their passage through space, to the notion of organisms of meteoric origin peopling the earth, wherewith Sir W. Thomson last year startled the British Association. Into these more abstract and abstruse portions of his inquiry we have neither time nor scope to follow our author. Nor can we do justice to his ingenious and painstaking observations upon Rain, the result of twenty years' accumulation and analysis of facts. Few people have any idea how complicated a substance what we call rain practically is. Fully a hundred tables are taken up with the analysis of samples of rain-water collected from various districts of the United Kingdom. The researches of MM. Robinet and Bobierre, supplemented by our author's own experiments, are brought to bear upon the chemical constituents of rain at different altitudes, inland or by the sea, in country districts or in towns most widely differing in conditions. Not only chemical tests, but the microscope, and even the spectroscope, are employed to determine the acid and other elements of impurity. In the series of illustrations the reader's eye is shown the variety of crystals deposited by the rain of Manchester, London, and Newcastle, in contrast with the less contaminated Row Rain from the Gareloch, on the Clyde. To imitate the action of rain, by the process of artificial washing applied to the air, formed a natural sequel to an analysis of this kind. The author was himself surprised to see the figures of the comparative results stand out in such beautiful order. Here are reproduced, from the interesting reports under the Alkali Act, the quantitative measurements of hydrochloric and sulphuric acid, together with ammonia, inorganic or albuminoid, ranging from the pure standard of Innellan, on the Frith of Clyde, to the atmosphere of the Underground Railway. Anomalies slight in degree are at times to be met with in analyses of this delicacy and minuteness. But there is solid satisfaction in seeing matters of so much importance to the public well brought to the positive test of number and figure, as well as entrusted to hands so thoroughly qualified for the task.

HERMANN AGHA.*

"GOD in his mercy preserve me from ever falling in love," says a philosophic Moslem in this story, and no doubt there are a good many readers who will be inclined, as they reach its conclusion, to echo the philosopher's prayer. But, after all, there are worse things than a love-story; and at a time when novel-writing seems to vibrate between the sensational and the commonplace, there is room for a revival of the older painting of human passion, above all when the background is a somewhat new and unexpected one. We must confess to a little sympathy with the general indifference to "tales of the East," to the monotony of their social life, the extravagance of their plots, the medley of coarse passion and low intrigue which, in spite of its Oriental colouring, smacks of little but Holywell Street and the Seven Dials. It is some little comfort to find our indifference justified by Mr. Palgrave, and to learn that the common Eastern novel bears "a hardly nearer resemblance to the realities of Eastern life than the Cato of Addison or the Count Robert of Scott do to the times and persons which they profess to represent." Even Anastanius, perfect as it is in its true field of the Levant, "becomes unreal when venturing into the regions of unalloyed Oriental existence." It is on the ground of reality, of a distinct truthfulness in its revelation of this unknown page of Eastern life, that Hermann Agha bases its claim to public attention. Its apology, says its author, is "that it is not fiction, but reality; not invention, but narrative." We need not examine the theory of novel-writing which these words seem to embody, for, instead of pinning us down to the boredom and humdrum which they promise, Mr. Palgrave simply uses them in self-defence against the reader's inevitable start of surprise at the strangeness of his story. The refinement of sentiment, the ecstatic purity of affection, the chivalrous devotion, the inviolable truth, the arrow-flight of passionate verse, even the "lilies and langours" which have vanished with the troubadour from the fields of Languedoc and Provence, live on still—if we are to trust Hermann Agha—in the Arab tents of the Mesopotamian plain:—

To make love with much warmth, yet more self-restraint; to be content to give and receive the assurance of longing love alone, without hope of attainment, as though the mind were everything and the body nothing; and thus to remain through every vicissitude of life, constant to honour in spite of opportunity, to virtue in spite of passion, and to attachment in spite of separation, however prolonged; and all this till the hour of death itself, an hour welcomed as the seal of inviolable fidelity. This is a thing, I believe, of no rare occurrence among Arab youths and maidens; at least it was so before the gross lessons of Mahometan materialism. Indeed those lessons have been but partially learnt even now, thank Heaven, by the Arab tribes in their own native land; though thoroughly appreciated and practised by Turks, Koordes, Persians, and the like.

Whatever may be the merits or demerits of this representation of ideal passion, there is a distinct gain at any rate in clearing our minds of the common notions of Lulu's pouting over the Pacha's new favourite, and Zuleika plunging in her sack to the bottom of the Bosphorus. The truth is, that so far from Mr. Palgrave looking down from the standing-ground of Western purity on the coarseness of the East, his contempt looks just the other way. "The wonder to me," says the sagacious Tantawee who plays the part of Oriental Chorus to the tale, "is not that your Zahra should have been such, but how her refinement and self-command communicated themselves to, or at least subdued, your coarser European nature." It is the fault perhaps of our "coarser European nature" that there are scenes between Zahra and her lover which recall the smiles of our youth over the delicate refinements of Lord Orville's wooing, or the superfine modesty of the Minerva Press. But the character of Zahra has in it a force at which Evelina would have shrunk aghast, and there will probably be as many critics who will stare at the intensity of her passion as there will be coarse European natures who will smile at its idealism.

With Zahra, in fact, the interest of the story begins and ends. Of Hermann himself we may have a little to say presently, but his character is faintly etched beside that of his lady love, and the general tenor of the tale is as wearisome as, to our minds, the tenor of an Oriental tale generally is. It is the usual story of a renegade, in this case a Transylvanian young fellow who had been carried off into slavery by a band of Turkish marauders, who falls in at Constantinople with the inevitable Pacha, accompanies him by tiresome stages to Bagdad, is mixed up with the ordinary plots and intrigues which rage round his master, takes his part in Oriental murders of the most approved raw-head and bloody-bones type, does a little horse-stealing and fighting on his own account, and finally whisks off the stage in a desperate Bedaween tournament, and is found long after the date of the conclusion of the story smoking his pipe and telling his pitiful tale on board an Egyptian transport in a position of high dignity. But at one moment in his life of adventure young Hermann finds himself looking down from the roof of a summer-house into an adjacent garden, and catching glimpses through the foliage of girl figures moving beneath in some girlish sport. The appearance of a dusky-brown Abyssinian countenance soon cools his courage, but "the very next face that came, as though in a framework of foliage and flowers, was as fair as the first had been dark"—it was the face of Zahra:—

Everything else disappeared around me. I was still gazing,—and how could a lad of scarcely eighteen years of age refrain from gazing?—on that perfect face,—praise be to Him who created it,—forgetful in my eagerness alike of caution and concealment; when by chance,—if, indeed, chance it was, and not rather destiny, hers and mine,—the girl's eyes turned in the direction where I half stood, half crouched forward on the narrow roof, and looked full into mine. An instant after she had moved away, and was hidden from my sight among the trees. A pause followed; then I heard a voice, her voice I was sure,—a clear, bright voice like that of a singing bird,—calling out something, but what I could not understand, to the companions of her play. Whatever the words may have been, their meaning was soon made evident by the result; for, after a few moments of seemingly capricious hurry and bustle, betrayed by the irregular movements of the shaken sprays overhead, there was a pattering sound as of many footsteps retreating in the direction of the house.

When every one else was gone, and all was quiet around, she, the game, came gently, almost stealthily, forward to an opening among the trees, and fixed her gaze steadily on me, scanning me with calm, deliberate inquiry; while I, emboldened by I knew not what hope, leaned towards her from the low roof-parapet, with a look undoubtedly expressive of the admiration I felt. When she had well surveyed me, she smiled,—not passingly, but with a purposed smile of satisfied good-will; then waited till I, recovering in a measure my dazed perceptions, acknowledged with look and gesture the meaning of her smile.

Passion of this sort is no doubt a puzzle to the "coarser minds" of the West, but the social severance of the sexes throughout the East leaves no choice between a passive acquiescence in the family arrangement which hands over a girl to her husband like a parcel of goods and the sudden arousing of dormant passion in presence of some casual rencontre. "Then it is that the one meeting, by the very fact of its being unpremeditated and fresh, makes its entire impression at a blow." Certain it is that, however startling it may seem as an incident, the whole of this garden scene is told with a delicious freshness of colouring. Even through the interviews which follow, tedious and superfine as the love-making occasionally is, the impression of Zahra's character is deepened and intensified. We smile now and then as the Arab girl talks of Hermann as her brother, and reduces him to abject penitence for any mention of so earthly a thing as love; but there is a quiet grandeur about the calm force and resolve of her passion which soon raises it out of these little affectations. All the difficulty and danger of the situation she takes on herself. She is betrothed to an Arab chieftain, who is already on his way to Bagdad, and she banishes her lover that she may meet the emergency alone. Her plan, in effect, is to delay her formal union with the Emeer Daghfel till she has reached his home, and on her journey thither to contrive an escape which shall unite her with her lover. Unhappily all is foiled by the precipitate action of Hermann, who endeavours to carry her off in a night attack on the Arab camp. He penetrates to her tent, but at the moment of their interview his presence is discovered, and the fierce fight which follows leaves Hermann wounded and baffled to learn that Zahra has disappeared. Whether such a character is possible in real Arab life, or whether Mr. Palgrave is unconsciously reproducing a purely literary type, the heroines of such love-legends as that of Jameel and Botheina, or Mejnoon and Leyla, we can hardly presume to decide. But it is certain that in its union of passionate impulse with calm and serene self-control, of a maidenly and poetic purity with practical force of temper and intelligence, he has given us a type not only striking in itself but new to our conceptions of Oriental life.

Hermann Agha, on the other hand, in spite of his wonderful adventures and hairbreadth escapes, remains little more than a sketch. The contrast of the new religious life with the old, of the new love for the social existence of the East with memories of the Western home from which he had been torn, the gradual purification of the coarser Transylvanian temper by its contact with the ideal passion of the Arab maiden, might in the hands of George Eliot have produced a Tito of nobler nature and with a nobler end. But Mr. Palgrave has missed the great opportunities which his own creation afforded him. Hermann is from his first introduction the devoutest of Moslems, but we see nothing of the transition by which the renegade passed from the faith of the Cross to that of the Crescent. In one of the most striking scenes of the first volume the almost passionate enjoyment of the new Eastern life into which he is plunged battles with a cooler and saner judgment of its inferiority to the life of Christendom; but the thought is never followed up, and for all the purposes of the story Hermann might have been born in Bagdad. Nor is the treatment of his passion more artistic. From the first moment he is swept away by a resistless tide of feeling which, save in one or two moments of sickness or depression, never ebbs. Of the "coarser nature" which Zahra is supposed to subdue we see hardly a trace. As a lover Hermann is one of the most passionate and best-behaved we have ever had the good luck to meet. But we cannot say he is a person to excite any great interest. The sketch of the Bedaween Moharib, on the other hand, slight though it is, has in it great life and power. The young Arab swears to his friend Hermann just such a friendship as David swore to Jonathan, a friendship which only ends in his laying down his life for his sake. To the Bedaween nature, indeed, Mr. Palgrave pays a chivalrous tribute of admiration singularly in contrast with the general estimate of it by travellers in the East. Nothing in his book is finer than the way in which, by touch after touch, he brings out the narrowness of its range, the pettiness of aim imposed on it by the actual necessities of the life of the desert, the silence and simplicity, the greed and craft of the sons of the desert; but with these lower qualities a nobler side of their nature, too—nobility, a chivalrous affection and respect for women, or such a capacity for friendship as that of Moharib. On the eve of their last meeting the delivery of Zahra' Mobarib faces and conquers one of those strange presentiments which warn an Arab of his death. "When in after days," he says to Hermann, "you revisit the place that is already prepared for me, and the heap of stones which will soon be piled over me, salute me by name, the brother of Leyla, the lover of Hafsa, and wish me peace. I shall hear you, though I make no answer. She too will visit me, and will be with me before long." The troop ride silently across the desert, but the silence of the Arab is, as Mr. Palgrave points out in a powerful passage, not merely a matter of precaution against danger, but the result of an unconscious sympathy with the silence of nature around:—

* Hermann Agha: an Eastern Narrative. By W. Gifford Palgrave. Author of "Travels in Central Arabia," &c. 3 vols. London: King & Co. 1872.

Silent overhead, the bright stars, moving on, moving upwards from the east, constellation after constellation, the Twins and the Pleiads, Aldebaran and Orion, the Spread and the Perching Eagle, the Balance, the once-worshipped Dog-Star, and beautiful Canopus. I look at them till they waver before my fixed gaze; and, looking, calculate by their position how many hours of our long night-march have already gone by, and how many yet remain before daybreak; till the spaces between them show preternaturally dark; and on the horizon below a false eye-begotten shimmer gives a delusive semblance of dawn; then vanishes.

Silent; not the silence of voices alone, but the silence of meaning change, dead midnight. The Wolf's Tail has not yet shot up its first silent har-binger of day in the east; the quiet progress of the black spangled heaven is monotonous as mechanism; no life is there. Silence; above, around, no sound, no speech. The very cry of a jackal, the howl of a wolf, would come friendly to the ear, but none is heard; as though all life had disappeared for ever from the face of the land. Silent everywhere. A dark line stretches thwart before us; you might take it for a ledge, a trench, a precipice, what you will. It is none of these; it is only a broad streak of brown withered herb, drawn across the faintly gleaming flat. Far off on the dim right rises something like a black giant wall. It is not that; it is a thick-planted grove of palms; silent they also, and motionless in the night. On the left glimmers a range of white ghost-like shapes; they are the rapid slopes of sandhills shelving off into the plain; no life is there.

Some men are silenced by entering a place of worship, a grave-yard, a large and lonely hall, a deep forest; and in each and all of these there is what brings silence, though from different motives, varying in the influence they exert over the mind. But that man must be strangely destitute of the sympathies which link the microcosm of our individual existence with the macrocosm around us, who can find heart for a word more than needful, were it only a passing word, in the desert at night.

The attempt, as we have said, fails, and with the failure the book abruptly closes. We see Hermann slowly recovering from his wounds; we hear that Zahra' has availed herself of the confusion to make her escape. But that the two lovers have no happy end to their love we are left to guess from finding Hermann some years after bewailing his misfortunes to the friendly Tantawee. It is a little tantalizing at the very crisis of the story to find the two story-tellers go quietly to sleep on deck, and to be told as a sort of explanatory farewell that the ship has arrived at Jaffa. The close is, in fact, the great blot on the book, but the most "irritating" feature of it is the perpetual interruption of the story by the talk between Tantawee and Hermann. No doubt a good deal of Tantawee's talk is clever and entertaining enough; we are inclined, in fact, to think his description of the philosophical indifference of a great Moslem thinker one of the best bits in the book; but we demur altogether to the practice in which Mr. Palgrave has followed Mr. Helps and others, of keeping, as it were, a tame critic of their own, and perpetually stopping the story to chat with us about it. There are traces of haste about the style of the book, which is often surprisingly careless and loose, and all Mr. Palgrave's objection to false Orientalism has not saved him from lapses into that most vexatious of affectations, the use of Arabic or Turkish names for things which are just as familiar to the West as to the East. It is a little provoking to be sent down to a note to learn that "kahya" means a clerk, or "kahwah" a coffee-shop. There are of course words which have no European equivalent, and in such cases their Eastern names are indispensable; but our patience gives way when a blow of a dagger becomes a blow of a "khanjar," and the chins of the Bedaween are wrapped, not in handkerchiefs, but "kaffeeys." These, however, are little faults, and in spite of its defects of style and story, we may fairly expect that Mr. Palgrave's tale will break the spell which has of late seemed to doom the novel of Eastern life to popular neglect.

BOGUSLAWSKI'S TACTICAL RESULTS OF THE WAR.*

MANY readers who will hardly care to face the labour of wading through the mass of personal and historical literature which the Continental press is pouring forth with reference to the late war will yet be eager to know what special lessons may be deduced from it. It is not likely that we shall have another Retrospect equal to Captain May's in honesty of purpose and brilliancy of style. Indeed the fate of that lamented writer may well deter any Prussian officer from rashly following his example, and holding up to the light every imperfection of his fellow-soldiers. But even a humbler work of such a class must have a special interest for all professional readers, now that the breech-loader has been tested from a fairer point of view than was possible in 1866. For it must never be forgotten, in considering the Austro-Prussian War, that all estimates of the causes of the success which changed the face of Germany agree in assigning a large share to the effects, physical and moral, of the then new weapon which the soldiers of King William carried. The proportion of this share to the whole can never be exactly known. Some critics of weight have gone as far as to say that the needle-gun made Benedek's chances hopeless from the first; and, if this be an exaggeration, there can be no doubt that it would have made them comparatively small had he matched his adversary better in strategy than was the case. But affairs were altogether different in this respect four years later, when the Prussians, with their needle-gun unimproved, found themselves face to face with an enemy that had taken deliberate pains to outdo them in the weapon of the foot soldier, and had succeeded probably beyond the expectation of either. The Chassepot had proved its excellence sufficiently in the skirmish at Montana. But the Prussians, as a rule, refused to accept the reports of De Failly's cheap victory over the Garibaldians as any real test, and went into the contest of 1870 as confident as ever in the excellence of their needle-gun—a state of feeling which even their striking tactical successes wholly failed to maintain. They admitted almost from the first that they had at length met a weapon superior to their own. Breech-loader was now fairly and fully tested against breech-loader, and the losing side was confessedly the better armed of the two. Naturally the professional student looks eagerly for a work which shall enable him to understand two important questions which are here raised; first, the general modifications of tactics which the use of the breech-loading small-arm may be considered certain to impose on all armies; and, secondly, the special causes that made the better weapon of so little practical weight in the great struggles of the Franco-Prussian war. Captain Boguslawski's work is the first attempt to expound these matters from a scientific point of view, and, despite a very unpretending preface, it has a thoroughness in its treatment which atones for some excess of patriotic zeal, and for a certain tendency to run into irrelevant matter in the effort to bring the whole subject completely before the reader.

Thus, though designed to set forth, as the title indicates, the tactical results of the war, large sections of the work are devoted to the former histories of the armies engaged, and to what Continental writers call the logistics of the struggle—the general arrangement of the forces—as well as to the strategy, strictly so-called. These, as well as certain considerations as to the respective reinforcing powers at the call of the two nations, we shall purposely pass by, in order to glance at the chapters which refer specially to the subject of tactics proper.

Captain Boguslawski takes great and not unnecessary pains at the outset to point out clearly the difference which we have already indicated as underlying all proper comparison between the wars of 1866 and of 1870. The undoubted superiority of the Prussian weapon, as admitted in general terms by the well-known Tactical Instructions issued by Benedek to his Northern Army, induced the Austrian commanders to try systematically a plan the opposite of that on which their opponents had been trained—a decided and sharp attack with the bayonet en masse being over and over again repeated at the very commencement of an engagement, and being met and repulsed on almost every occasion by steady defensive firing with the breech-loader, often maintained chiefly by the skirmishers. The counter-attack of the Prussians came later, and was usually made in looser order than the Austrian charge. In fact throughout the Austrian commanders followed literally to rashness the teaching of Benedek's instructions, hoping, as their chief had promised them, fairly to surprise, and as it were run down the enemy by the fierceness and rapidity of their onset. It need hardly be said how completely Benedek and his followers were undeceived. The needle-gun showed itself, in steady hands, quite superior to any such attacks, however desperate; and where any success was bought by Austrian valour, as at Trautenau, it was purchased too dearly to affect the general course of the campaign. Throughout the brief contest, however, the general features remained of a decided distinction in the national modes of fighting, due plainly to the difference of weapons. But all this was quite changed in the struggle of four years later, in which, as our author shows, the infantry contest on both sides almost invariably took the form of scattered, and frequently individual, fighting. The dissimilarity of formation came into little notice, he adds, but there were very great distinctions observable in the manner of firing, and in the general conduct of the action. And none was more remarkable than the contrast between the apparent timidity of the French generals, keeping them constantly to a mere defensive, and the boldness and independence with which the German chiefs of divisions or brigades threw themselves at once into the attack, availing themselves of all the circumstances of the moment to forward its efficacy, and especially keeping in mind the general maxim adopted in their service, to try by all means to gain the enemy's flank. Very possibly, it is fairly said by our author, the apparently timid tactics of the French were forced upon them by their being strategically surprised at the outset, and that by much larger numbers. He conjectures that to these causes may have been superadded a false calculation as to the effects of the breech-loader when defensively used, and as to the special value of the field intrenchments which they were disposed from the first to resort to. The fact remains certain that, adopting generally the loose form which the Prussians had already found so effective, they employed it in a very different spirit, as though bound to cling altogether to the defensive—the easiest part to copy of the example of 1866.

They showed this over-caution conspicuously even at Mars-la-Tour, where, as Boguslawski very justly says, they had every possible reason to take a bold offensive. The remarkable audacity which the Germans had acquired proved itself here especially when the IIIrd Corps actually took and held open ground from a far greater force of the enemy, though at the cost of losing 7,000 of its numbers. For, as the author in a later part remarks, direct attacks in front, except with overpowering force, cannot succeed, if they succeed at all, without great expenditure. How dangerous they are likely to be to those who try them he illustrates very forcibly by the well-known circumstance of the first and fruitless attempt of the Guards on St. Privat. How dominant the notion of outflanking was in the minds of the German generals is clearly shown by the success of the later advance on this position, and not less by the general disposition of the united Third and Fourth Armies at Sedan. The French, on the other hand, appear to have held to the older notion of making decided attacks on the enemy's line when once extended to thinness; but their attempts to carry out this theory of counter-attack against the outflanking foe were too partial and ill-sustained to have any weight. The army, says our author, is in very evil case which in these days permits itself quietly to be outflanked or surrounded in hopes of breaking the enemy's line with a counter-stroke.

* Taktische Ergebnisse aus dem Kriege 1870-71. Berlin: Mittler, 1871.

The chief peculiarities observable in the German attack during the war he sums up at the close of a very interesting chapter under four heads:—(1) offensive movement against the flank of the enemy, followed afterwards by attack upon his centre; (2) powerful co-operation of artillery in preparing the way for the infantry; (3) great development of the use of skirmishers; (4) and a limited action on the part of the cavalry. When on the defensive the Germans chose their ground more carefully than the French, making, for example, much more use of wood as cover; they concentrated their artillery fire more completely, and made a more suitable and careful use of their musketry fire. The French, on the other hand, in their usual defensive attitude, had also marked peculiarities, in (1) the deliberate manner in which they allowed themselves to be outflanked; (2) their isolated and partial counter-attacks; (3) their constant use, like their adversaries (the italics are our own), of heavy swarms of skirmishers; while (4) their artillery had its effect weakened by being constantly broken up, and showed plain want of good handling on the part of the chiefs. To these remarks it is added that the cavalry, however brave, showed little judgment in acting as though breechloaders did not exist. The features of the French offensive, where it was tried in the earlier part of the war, were bold and sudden advances made with large masses, firing a great deal too much and keeping themselves back in so doing, and the opening of fire at absurd distances. In the second period of the struggle the want of good leading and inferiority in technical efficiency were constantly manifest as the causes of the awkwardness and early failure of the French attacks, wherever made. Having given this résumé, it is only left for us to add that the chief deduction to be made from it has not been as clearly brought out as it might be by the author. It is that all infantry actions are now become actions of skirmishers. We have no space to enlarge on this truth. We can only recommend those who doubt it to study the facts of the late war closely, as set forth by such writers as Captain Boguslawski. He who is not then convinced is either incapable of conviction, or unwilling to resign a cherished tradition, wrongly understood; we allude of course to the historic steadiness of our British infantry, a quality which may be either used or abused according to its application to the conditions of modern warfare.

It is not our purpose, even did our limits permit, to give a detailed criticism here of a work so important as that under notice, which happily is now made generally accessible by an authorized translation. We shall rather transcribe, as a single specimen of the valuable lessons it contains, the author's account, subject to some needful compression, of a kind of action repeated over and over again during the later part of the war between two isolated battalions—the one of the highly trained Prussian infantry, the other of the raw levies that vainly tried to face them:—

Our Prussian battalion [says Captain Boguslawski] formed into company columns, and apparently on the defensive, is placed behind a swell of the ground, the approach to which is probably partly screened from view by other undulations. Three companies are in first line, one in reserve. The enemy, very possibly twice its numbers, extends his skirmishers when about 1,200 yards off, and advances as a double to within 800. Opening at first a moderate fire to cover the movement, he is sending some of his companies, screened by a dip of the ground, to turn the left of the Germans. But these, beginning to answer his attack with dropping shots, at once draw a rapid rolling fire from the whole militia line, which their officers vainly strive to check, and which is given with such haste as to do little harm. The Germans now in their turn make a sudden movement forward, the supports keeping close to their skirmishers, and the whole moving at a double to clear an open space lying within 300 yards of the foe, beyond which they have dispersed a new line of cover. The suddenness of this advance disconcerts their adversaries, who forget in their excitement to lower their sights, and shoot wildly over the heads of the Germans. These from their new position now fire heavily on the line close to which they are planted, and at the same moment the left of this line finds itself threatened by a flank attack, a counter-stroke to that at first attempted by its own detachment. This disconcerts the nearest files at once. A small reserve of the militia which is in hand is ordered up to meet the danger, but its insufficient training causes a bungling delay in the necessary movements of wheel and extension, during which it receives a murderous fire from the hostile skirmishers close at hand, and falls back presently confused. Just then the line is attacked in front by the advance of the main German body. The rest may be left to the imagination.

In this typical case the German battalion has been shown making the offensive. But if the process be reversed, the result would be altogether different. For the disciplined soldiers will not throw away their ammunition wildly on an enemy 800 yards off. They will, on the contrary, reserve it, and so shatter his attack when he attempts to pass the open plateau 300 yards in front. And the reserve company will wheel sharply at the word in just the fit direction to meet the flanking movement of the adversary, and will send its skirmishers so deftly forward against the partially developed attack as to check it at once, and enable the threatened flank to be cleared by a smart charge. For, adds Captain Boguslawski in closing his comparison, the discipline of militiamen cannot be relied on to teach them how to use their fire to advantage in the most serious moments of an action, whilst their very moderate power of manoeuvring will surely, when a crisis suddenly comes on, cause just the false movements to be made which will create a decisive turn of events against them. We may leave our readers to point the moral for themselves. To us it seems too obvious to be missed, even did the author not give his picture, as he avowedly does, as showing the general character which an action would be certain to assume between the battalion organized on the German system and that of any nation which meets it with mere militia or other partially trained troops, under whatever guise. For if there is one deduction which more than any other can be made certainly from the late war, it is that the looser and freer the tactics of the mass become, the more necessity there is for insisting on the thorough training and discipline of the individual unit.

NOAH'S FLOOD—AN OPERA.

PERHAPS the chief curiosity in this very curious opera is its date—1679. Had a drama entitled "Noah's Flood" been produced some two centuries earlier, it would have been set down among the Mysteries; were such a work published now, it would be traced to the increased familiarity of Englishmen with the Passion Plays of Ober-Ammergau and Spain. But a grave Scriptural "opera," beginning with Noah's completion of the Ark, and ending with the destruction of the Tower of Babel, will, with the date 1679 attached to it, appear to many like an insolent anachronism. Of course Mr. Ecclestone's piece was never acted in any theatre; but it must not be therefore looked upon as one of those "dramatic poems" which are written without any thought of scenic representation, for the author had evidently in view a possible if not an actual stage. With his directions respecting decorations and ballet he is just as careful as with his dialogue; and if Mr. Chatterton, weary of Walter Scott, can overcome the scruples of the Chamberlain (and perhaps his own) so far as to attempt the production of Scriptural drama, here is a book which may be placed at once in the hands of Mr. W. Beverley without further instructions.

Noah's Flood, it may be observed, did not, as might easily be supposed, stand quite alone in its age; it represents a tendency which arose in the days of Charles II., to take portions of the Bible as subjects, not of tragedies or comedies, but of operas—that is to say, works not necessarily lyrical, but nevertheless illustrated by music and such scenery as the age could afford. The classical type of this tendency is Dryden's opera, the State of Innocence and Fall of Man, which Nat. Lee pronounced superior to Paradise Lost, whence the idea of it was derived, and which was first published in 1674, shortly after Milton's death. Dryden gives stage directions which look as if he had an eye towards Dorset Gardens; but still these are subordinate to his dialogue; whereas Noah's Flood is to all intents and purposes a spectacle which requires much employment of machinery, and the effects in which the dialogue is mainly intended to connect.

Mr. Ecclestone, of whom, it seems, nothing whatever is known beyond the fact that he is the author of this opera, derives his inspiration immediately from Dryden; and it may be safely said that, if ever disciple avoided the beauties and exaggerated the defects of his master, that disciple is Mr. Ecclestone. There is a certain grandeur about the State of Innocence, small as it may look when placed by the side of Milton's epic; but nothing can be conceived more paltry than Noah's Flood, when read after the State of Innocence. Something, indeed, like an appearance of impiety is produced by the poet's utter disregard of the Iloratian precept, "Sumite materiam," &c.; and had the name, say, of Mr. Bradlaugh been printed on the title-page, the opera might be condemned as a profane burlesque; but the innocence of his intentions is too clear to be mistaken. Even the stupendous adulation with which he dedicates his work to the Duchess of Monmouth, and which surpasses the servility shown by Dryden in his dedication of the State of Innocence to the Duchess of York (Mary of Modena), shows his conviction that he has been engaged on a purely religious exercise. The beauty of the lady is briefly touched upon; but Mr. Ecclestone is convinced that, if her Grace had lived in the old world, she not only would have made an addition to those who were saved in the Ark, but would even have prevented the destruction of "the whole," and so comfort himself with the assurance that, so long as her seraphic form guards the door of the Ark, he need not fear what the malice of a "hell of critics" can do against it. It is to the amatory of the Duchess that he appeals for protection. It is about the anachronisms which occur in his opera that Mr. Ecclestone is most uneasy. For he does not sin through ignorance, being somewhat of a scholar, familiar, like most poets of his age, with the current Roman classics, and competent to quote Plato in the original—Latin. His personages, he is aware, refer in their discourse to things that are supposed not to have existed till long after the days of Noah; but he justifies this eccentricity partly by authority, partly by the ingenious theory, rather hinted than enforced, that, as many arts deemed modern were probably known before the Flood, the question whether it is right or wrong to make antediluvians talk about parchment, as they do in a tragedy which was censured by some critical friend, becomes extremely hard to solve. The use of this theory, which, if enlarged and judiciously applied, may help many a vague historian out of a mess, is incalculable. When it is once granted that we know nothing of Methuselah, or of the towns and villages that existed in his day, who shall venture to say that he did not eat whitebait at Blackwall?

* Noah's Flood; or, the Destruction of the World. An Opera. By Edward Ecclestone, Gent. Printed by M. Clarke and Sold by R. Taylor at the Ship in St. Paul's Churchyard. 1679.

We proceed to a description of Noah's Flood. The "scene being opened"—or, as modern usage would have it, the curtain rising—Hell is represented with spirits, several of whom are seen flying across the stage, while hideous lamentations are heard. Before a word is uttered there is a change, which seems to be without a difference; for we read:—"The scene on a sudden shifts, and represents Lucifer, Beelzebub, Asmodeus, Moloch, and Belial, at which songs of joy and triumph are heard, all advancing" (the fiends, we presume, not the songs) from a howling lake of burning brimstone. The fiends, of whom Lucifer is the chief, Satan being only a subordinate personage, are in high glee at the prospect of the Deluge which is to destroy the hated world, and all agree to lend their aid to the work of destruction:—

"Tis joyful news [says Lucifer] now the great period's come,
And all must wallow in the wat'ry tomb;
The birds and beasts with man confus'd must lie,
And fish in their own element must die.

The last line, by the way, touches on a point which has not been largely discussed by physico-theologians. The great object of the fiends, however, is the demolition of the Ark, which has just been completed, and of all its inhabitants. Moloch proposes to enter the sacred vessel in some borrowed shape, and stir up an intestine war; Lucifer suggests that this operation shall be seconded by an attack from without; and Asmodeus, timidly arguing that the Ark which is abruptly put down by Satan, with the pertinent rebuff,

Cost a hundred years to build with pal
Was never sure designed to be in vain,

Still with fond reason you our acts debate;
Sure we that rule the world can conquer eight.

The action is diversified by the entrance of several pious men, who are allured from their piety by divers fair women, "dressed in wanton garments"; the third man, a pedant in his gallantry, remarking, as he points to the charmers:—

All arts and sciences in them appear;
View but their eyes, Astronomy is there.

The prediction of Lucifer, who has observed the unholy proceedings, that a race of tyrants will be the result of these "ill hymens," shows that the author had in view the association of the Sons of God with the Daughters of Men, briefly mentioned in Genesis and largely described in the apocryphal book of Enoch. Delighted with the contemplation of triumphant sin, the fiends lie down to repose themselves, and "a song is sung, expressing the joy they take in destroying the world, and how their pains are lessened in having made so brave a revenge." This finished, several antic dances are executed, and the departure of the fiends brings the first act to an end.

At the commencement of the second act Noah and the Angel Gabriel enter discussing the subject of the coming Flood, in front of a decoration which is curiously described as representing a "glorious sun in its full meridian." This is soon changed to the view of a "billy country," and two monstrous giants, Abaddon and Agon, doubtless the progeny of the pious men and fair women, make their appearance to express the violence of their intentions:—

AN. How calm's the air! What, is his thunder gone?
Nay, then, I'll mount the sky and seize his throne.
AG. The trembling moon I'll into pieces rent,
And twist the stars out of his ornament.
AN. The sun himself, that doth so bright appear,
I'll drag about the sky by's golden hair,
Then spurn him in the sea, and quench him there.

These aspirations they reduce to practice, and, observing that the sun apparently leans on the top of a hill, they resolve to assail him without delay, heaping up little mountains "to raise Olympus higher." The sun "being overshadowed with a cloud" stimulates their hopes, as they ascribe the phenomenon to fear; but they are grievously deceived, for some "great flashes of lightning are seen breaking from the cloud that covers the sun, after which dreadful claps of thunder are heard, the cloud breaks in two, and a shower of fire falls on 'em and destroys 'em." The sun recovering his light, the fiends emerge from the earth to rejoice at what has happened, and to derive gratification from other sources; for at this juncture Despair, personified, stabs himself and dies; a "man-lover" throws himself from a precipice into the sea, and a "woman-lover" drinks a cup of deadly poison. These horrors are relieved by a gentle comedy scene, in which Ambition vainly wooes Pride; and then the scene opening discovers an extraordinary spectacle, comprising "several horrid spectacles, drinking to excess, quarrels, brawls, rapes, &c.," whereby the joy of the devils is increased, the act terminating with a view of the infernal regions, enlivened by dancing "in extravagant postures."

In the third act, which opens in "a pleasant garden adorned with various walks and close bowers, and ornamented with purling rivulets," an attempt is made to introduce a domestic interest; Japhet, influenced by the powers of evil, being unreasonably jealous of the innocent affection of his wife, Phalthoea, for his brother Shem. His gloomy meditations come however to nothing, being immediately followed by the appearance of several altars, the sacrifices on which are consumed by a fire from Heaven; and our attention is now directed to Noah, who is highly elated by the favourable omen, and in this happy mind is deceived by Lucifer, who, clad in robes of light, informs him that Heaven has abandoned the project of the Deluge, and commands him to disperse the gathered troop of beasts and birds, confirming the authenticity of his mission by a shower of fire. The imposture does not last long; for "a clap of thunder is heard, Noah and the rest return as affrighted, Gabriel flies down, and Lucifer sinks at the same time," to rise immediately afterwards in his "horrid shape," and to hear Gabriel announce that his aggression will be punished by an increase of torment:—

—For this deed thou shalt Heaven's vengeance feel,
And on thy head shall fall its painted steel,
And sink thee down into the deep abyss;
Where, whirling headlong with a dreadful hiss,
The damned themselves shall wonder how you fall,
And you in hell shall find a better hell;
For you such torments shall endure, even all
Hell's mighty pains shall seem to yours but small.

Moloch is not more fortunate than Lucifer; for, having attempted to enter the Ark disguised as a beast, he has been repelled by "an angel's mystic charm" that did his "soul and spirits both alarm." Stratagem having failed, force is to be essayed; Moloch concluding the soliloquy which ends the act with the declaration:—

By strength alone our force we must declare,
And 'gainst the Ark proclaim an open war;
We'll the whole pow'r of the four winds let go;
They east and west, and south and north, shall blow,
Till by their blasts the Ark they overthrow;
Then we'll rejoice over this conquer'd ball,
With dreadful hollows (sic) triumph in its fall.

The fourth act opens with the horrors of the Deluge, the scene presenting men and beasts of all sorts promiscuously swimming together, and the Ark floating on the surface of the waters, while one hill remaining above the waves affords a footing for some of the survivors—namely, three men, who meditate on the vanity of human greatness, and a woman with children in her arms, who touches up her maternal expressions of despair with this pretty conceit:—

My ah, dear children, you in vain implore;
I've given you all, and now can give no more,
Unless I do anticipate your fears,
And drown you all in deluges of tears.

Evidently not thinking this situation strong enough, Mr. Ecclestone changes his scene, and discovers a throng of women and children on the highest mountains, who on a sudden are all overwhelmed with the waves. The scene again changing before a word is uttered, we have Pandemonium, with the principal fiends in council. They are speedily joined by Moloch, who, scoured by disappointment, commences the narrative of his defeat with blasphemy of a kind that smacks less of Pandemonium than of Billingsgate:—

Hell and Damnation seize this mystic scene,
And curse upon the eye of Providence.

One almost misses here the cautious "H—" and "D—" Force is then unanimously resolved upon, and the devils vanish to reappear in another scene, representing all destroyed but the Ark, which is swimming on the surface of the waters. According to Lucifer's instructions, the Ark is literally to be attacked on every side:—

Ho, Moloch! loose the Eastern wind; let go,
Belial, the West; both shall together blow.
You, Asmodeus, must rule the Southern wind;
Ho, Beelzebub! the stubborn North unbend;
Whilst I and Satan, like two mighty whales,
Toss up the Ark with our impetuous tails.

The Ark is nearly overturned by the fiends, but angels descend in flaming chariots, and, amid thunder and lightning, drive them into the deep; a brief speech uttered by Noah, who is shown in the interior, expressing the confidence of the good men in the care of Heaven. The Miltonian Sin and Death now make their appearance—we cannot precisely say in what place—and display in their discourse a subtlety of thought which faintly adumbrates the debates on Free-will and Predestination in the State of Innocence. At a first glance it might be supposed that these two evil beings would naturally desire the destruction of the Ark. On the contrary, they are acute enough to perceive that at this particular juncture their own interest coincides with the will of heaven:—

SIN. So, monarch-like, you reign o'er everything, Except the Ark; you're universal king;
That Ark, which, like the world, if it should be Overthrown, you, next to that, will ruin me.
Then shall your empire end; so soon as I
Do leave this world, you too—yourself—must die.

DEATH. Since I have had such plenty and such store
Of all varieties, what need I more?
Therefore ne'er fear I will mankind pursue
So far, as to be fore'd to prey on you.
You are forbidden fruit, and if I try
To taste of you, I, when I taste, must die,
And lose this earthly paradise, and be
For ever lost in vast eternity.
So, for your sakes the Ark shall safely sail,
And on the waves, as they o'er all, prevail.

With the descent of the chosen family from the Ark, after the waters have subsided, the fourth act terminates; the Archangel Gabriel expounding to Noah the brief universal law which preceded the Decalogue, and saying in reference to the rainbow:—

'To confirm his promise he hath bow'd
His royal signet in yon torrid (torrid?) cloud.
In such a form the painted arch appears,
As moaning Heaven seems e'en to smile in tears.

Whereupon Noah remarks:—

But in such pleasant moaning, such a shroud
It seems to be an hieroglyphic cloud
Of grief and joy, and intermix'd so fine
The artist Nature shows her pow'rs divine;
And in the bow no death nor arrows seen,
But the whole scene is peaceful and serene.

The drunkenness of Noah, followed by the curse on Ham, opens the fifth act, the story being told with more decency than might have been expected from a writer under Charles II., blessed with such dubious taste as Mr. Ecclestone. The consequences of Noah's trespass to people in general are shown in a more lively manner; for Sin, in a "rich, gaudy, loose attire," heads a jovial party of devils in human shape, who are especially delighted when "a fair vineyard arises, laden with beautiful grapes." One of the guests lyrically observes:—

Since then nature doth show
Which way we must go,
We'll squeeze out the liquor and call the juice wine.

Whereupon Sin, in somewhat ambiguous language, caps him with the distich:—

Though flat on the grape, though thick on the vine, See how it doth sparkle; see how it doth shine—

afterwards encouraging the revellers with the lively stanza:—

Here's a palm for those souls
That drink off most bowls,
And so let the goblet go round;
For he that drinks most
Shall the victory boast,
While his head with this garland is crown'd.

In spite of Mr. Ecclestone's indubitably pious intentions, we strongly suspect that this was his favourite scene. Elsewhere he merely indicates the place for a song, and leaves to another bard the task of supplying the required article; but he is determined that the Bacchanalian effusion shall be his own. Of his private life biography, as we have stated, says nothing; so in the absence of information we may be allowed to conjecture that a certain sympathy with Noah's one weak point had something to do with his choice of a subject so manifestly beyond his powers.

After it is just beginning to become lively, the opera ends dismally with the abortive attempt to build the Tower of Babel. Noah and all connected with him have resigned possession of the stage to Nimrod and his associates, who have the unthankful mission of bringing about a most lame and impotent conclusion.

Though this notable work does not seem to have answered the expectation of its publishers when it appeared in 1679, it was evidently a fertile source of hope; for in 1685 it came out again as the Cataclysm, and still again as the Deluge in 1691, when an attempt was made to render it palatable by the addition of engravings. Even in 1714 it had not quite slipped out of notice, for some adventurous booksellers who clubbed together, and who seem to have thought that Mr. Ecclestone's name was its only drawback, restored the original title, Noah's Flood, but asserted that it was a new work by an unknown author. The present article refers to the first edition only.

COLERIDGE'S LIFE OF ST. FRANCIS XAVIER.*

IT is curious that the two most widely known and popular Saints of the Roman Calendar should have the same name. Next to Francis of Assisi, Francis Xavier bears not only the most familiar, but the most highly revered, name among Protestants of the whole number. Both have been commemorated by the Protestant hagiographer, Sir James Stephen, and the life of Xavier has also been written by Mr. Venn, of the Church Missionary Society, who speaks of him personally with admiration and respect, if he is somewhat disposed to depreciate the success of his labours. His present biographer is not of course likely to err in that direction, and in one respect he is certainly inclined to over-credulity. But, on the whole, he has done his work with critical discernment, and gives us, as might be expected from a first-classman and late Fellow of Oriel, not only an interesting, but a scholarly, sketch of a life remarkable alike in itself and in its attendant circumstances. And we quite agree with him that there was room for such a work. There is no Life of St. Francis, at least in our language, which at all "satisfies the requirements of our own time," either in critical sifting of the mass of heterogeneous materials, or in the important point to which Mr. Coleridge has called special attention, of presenting us with a full and vivid picture of the personal character of the Saint, as gathered from his own letters and from well authenticated anecdotes of his sayings and doings. It is quite true that we of this age "value above all things the minute points of character and shade of feeling which can only be discerned by close and faithful study of the mind and heart of some one in whose history we are interested, and we set the highest store on such biographies as make this study most easy to us." And this leads us to add that what might perhaps at first sight appear a disqualification is really a recommendation of the author for the task he has undertaken. It is hardly a paradox to say that the life of a Jesuit missionary could only be adequately written by a Jesuit; certainly not, as experience has clearly proved, by a Protestant. No doubt a biographer ought not to be a mere blind panegyrist—and Mr. Coleridge's Oxford training is some guarantee for his discrimination in this respect—but, on the other hand, he must have that hearty sympathy with his hero which implies a kind of hero-worship, or he will lack the capacity for bringing out those delicate shades of character and feeling whereby alone the man himself can be revealed to us in flesh and blood. This is peculiarly important in the case of a nature "tender, sensitive, sympathetic, prodigal of affection to an extraordinary degree," and it is the object which Mr. Coleridge has had in view, as well in what he has himself written as in his selection of Xavier's letters. So far as the present volume enables us to judge, it is only fair to say that he has succeeded. We get a clear view, not only of the outward incidents of the Saint's career, from the time when he first met Ignatius Loyola at the University of Paris, but of the development of his character under the influences brought to bear upon it, and the secret of the wonderful influence he exercised over others.

In his first chapter Mr. Coleridge is led to notice the origin of the Jesuit Society at the University of Paris, which he compares, mutatis mutandis, to the Tractarian movement at Oxford in our own day; and he very rightly calls attention to the peculiar facilities for such a purpose afforded by what was then the great centre of the learning and intellectual life of Europe, frequented by many thousands of students in the prime of life from every Christian country. "The severe orthodoxy of the Spanish seats of learning," he candidly admits, if it saved them from heretical teachers, also suppressed the stir of mind and conflict of argument necessary for the starting of any great movement. In our own day Universities have become national rather than cosmopolitan institutions, and the system of clerical seminaries introduced by the Council of Trent has in most cases withdrawn or greatly diminished the supply of Roman Catholic students of theology. Mr. Coleridge does not add that the seminary system, though decreed by the Council of Trent, was mainly the creation of the Jesuits themselves, who were by no means willing to trust their disciples to the liberal atmosphere of a University where their Order had its birth. We are glad, however, in view of the strenuous efforts made by a powerful Ultramontane school to suppress the study of Greek and Roman classics, to find him insisting that "the Catholic Church has from the first sanctioned their use in the education of her children." The great instrument of Ignatius in gaining his first recruits, as it was afterwards one main weapon of Francis, was not so much preaching as "spiritual conversation," which naturally suggests to his biographer the analogy of Socrates. Xavier evidently possessed in a rare degree that charm of manner which seems to have been an heirloom in the Stuart family, and which is of course an inestimable advantage to men who are the apostles of any great movement, religious or social. It is clear also that he made full use of another, we will not say less legitimate, but less direct, means of influence in his missionary enterprises. The great national conversions of the middle ages were in large measure effected through the influence of the ruling powers, and the baptism of Clovis or Vladimir was naturally, if not necessarily, followed by the baptism of the great body of their subjects. Francis was by no means slow to avail himself, whenever opportunity afforded, of similar aid. When he arrives at the Court of John III. of Lisbon he is never tired of praising "the religious disposition and zeal of this excellent King," who gave strict orders that the pages of his household should go every week to confession, because, if the young nobles grew up what they ought to be, the common people were sure to follow their example. On similar principles the Portuguese bishops urge Francis being sent to India, "because they think that in that case some Indian King will be converted;" and he congratulates himself, in two of his letters to the Society at Rome, on being despatched with the highest recommendations and favours from the King of Portugal, on account of the facilities thus offered "for carrying the name of Jesus Christ before the native Kings of India, with whom, as every one knows, the authority and influence of the Portuguese governor is supreme." We find, accordingly, that the conversion of the Paravas was effected by a judicious "mixture of religion and policy." The Portuguese helped them to throw off the yoke of their Mahometan conquerors, on the condition of their accepting baptism, "and the whole people was rapidly baptised." It would be very unjust, however, to Francis to suppose, as he sometimes been hinted, that he was content with the mere mechanical process of baptizing the children or the whole population, and took no care for the Christian instruction of his converts. Far be it from us to enter here on the thorny controversy about "baptismal regeneration," but it is only natural that a believer in that doctrine should attach a high importance, as Francis clearly did, to the baptism of infants, a large proportion of whom were of course sure to die in infancy. But this was a part only, and a small part, of his work. The following extract will give a fair idea of his usual method of procedure, and this must be our excuse for its length:—

* Life and Letters of St. Francis Xavier. By Henry James Coleridge, of the Society of Jesus. Vol. 1. London: Burns & Oates. 1872.

The circumstances under which the Paravas had embraced Christianity naturally directed the attention of Francis Xavier to the children, in the first instance, as the best hopes for the future, and it was his principle, as we have seen in his work at Goa, to attach immense importance to elementary instruction, catechising, and the like. His first occupation, however, was the simple act of charity to go about and baptize the infants who were as yet unbaptized; and to this, and to the care of the sick, the dying, and the dead, we find him afterwards recurring when he found himself from time to time unable to communicate with the people around him on account of ignorance of their language. Then came the great labour of translating the Catechism into the Malabar tongue, which he tells us occupied him and his catechists for as much as four months. The next step was to learn the new Catechism by heart, and to go from one village to another teaching the simple elements of Christian doctrine in the native language. We may well imagine with what bright affectionateness and gentle condescension the Saint made his way to the hearts of the swarms of Indian children who gathered around him, who soon began to take so important a share in his missionary work, and whose prayers he constantly solicited when about to incur any extraordinary danger. After a little time, as he tells St. Ignatius, the children would not leave him alone; he had no time after his daily rounds and course of teaching to say his office, take his slight repast of rice and water, or the scanty rest which he allowed himself. They were never tired of learning prayers from his mouth. His evenings were also devoted to receiving visits of persons who had any questions to ask him or wished to consult him, and it was then too that he attended to such matters as bringing about reconciliations or rectifying irregular marriages.

The account given in the letters which we have last inserted of his method of catechising tallies exactly with a paper drawn up by him for the instruction of the catechists of the Society in India, which was long preserved in the archives of the College of Goa. The catechist is to begin with the sign of the Cross, the two boys are to repeat in a loud clear voice the Pater Noster (in the native language) after him. Then he is to invite the people to profess their faith and make acts of the three great theological virtues—Faith, Hope, and Charity. The exercise of faith consists in the Credo, which is to be gone through, the people being asked whether they firmly believe each truth, and then praying to our Lord and His Blessed Mother to give and obtain for them the grace to do so, reciting the Pater Noster and Ave Maria. In the paper just mentioned the Credo is summarized, rather than simply repeated article by article, the truths about our Lord and the Incarnation being grouped together, and at the end, after the people have professed their belief in the existence of Hell, Paradise, Purgatory, the sacraments, and all that is taught by the Church, the catechist instructs them to pray to the Holy Ghost for His seven gifts, those especially which can help them to believe the Catholic faith. Then follows an act of hope and an act of love and contrition. After this preliminary service, the catechist is to proceed to the explanation of some particular truth, or of some virtue, or one of the sacraments, or the doctrine of prayer, and the like, speaking very plainly and simply, and adding an "example," a story at the end to illustrate the argument. Then he is to rectify with the boys the form of general confession, bidding the people meantime make interior acts of contrition or sorrow for sin for the love of God, then three Ave Marias are to be recited, one for the absent, the others for any particular intention.

The catechist on these occasions was generally a layman, and he was instructed, in the absence of any priest, to baptize new-born infants, publish marriages, preside at public prayers, and perform other religious offices. The supply of clergy for these missions seems always to have been very inadequate, and that not merely from the difficulty of getting men of mark to enter on so uninviting a field of labour, as from the pressing need for their services at home. The clerical standard of the day was very low, especially in the matter of preaching. The number of priests who devoted themselves to the active duties of their calling was, we are told, comparatively small, and even in Rome it was unheard of for sermons to be preached except in Advent or Lent; and, as a result of clerical laxity, "it was strange to go often to communion" for the laity, and "in many places the frequentation of the sacraments had died out." In India the small European population had become utterly corrupted by the influences of climate and other surrounding circumstances, and the vices of their Mahometan neighbours; so that their evil example, as so often happens—there being "no exception to this lamentable truth in favour of Catholic nations"—was one main impediment to the conversion of the heathen. This was perhaps one reason which inclined Francis to turn instinctively for relief to "the multitude of children, who did not know their right hand from their left"; but he also had that peculiar attraction for children which is not uncommon in men of simple and pious character, and which has often been observed, though it might not a priori have been looked for, in the celibate Roman Catholic clergy. "The young boys," he says, "would never let me say office, or eat, or sleep, till I had taught them some prayer." And the same feeling shows itself in the frequent references in his letters to Francis Mancias to "the boy Matthew," who had evidently been a favourite of his, but whom Mancias, a stern, stolid, unsympathetic kind of man, was unable to manage, and was constantly making complaints of. We have another illustration of the simplicity of his character in his sweeping indictment of the "class of men among the Pagans called Brahmins" who are sumptuously disposed of as "cheats and liars to the very backbone"—a somewhat hasty generalization from the more prominent specimens that came under his notice, which, as his biographer observes, were principally of a low caste, and his information on the influence of caste generally in India was very imperfect.

We have already said that in one particular Mr. Coleridge appears to us to be over-credulous. He says, indeed, what is no doubt true, that "the standing miracle which seems to have broken down all opposition was the heavenly character and charming sanctity of Francis himself." But nevertheless he makes very large demands on our credence in the matter of miracles of a more direct and physical kind. He freely admits that these are never, or hardly ever, referred to by Francis himself, the one exception specified here being what certainly cannot be called a miracle at all in any strict sense of the word. And he replies, reasonably enough so far, that we have no right to deny details which "not only a person of singular holiness, but of ordinary modesty and good sense," would be unlikely to talk about, simply on the ground that he makes no mention of them. We may further allow that it is impossible, as repeated experience has proved, to draw any hard and fast line which shall cover all the miracles of Scripture, and exclude the existence, or even possibility, of any later miracles in the Church; and it is very difficult, to say the least, to reconcile the denial of their possibility with any intelligent belief in theism. Still it is only reasonable, considering the many temptations to self-deception or fraud, that the evidence alleged for such occurrences should be vigorously scrutinized in each separate case. This the author promises to do "further on"—we presume in the second volume—as regards the gift of tongues, which is claimed for Francis by all his biographers, though not by himself, and which Mr. Coleridge seems to understand in his case, as in that of the Apostles on the day of Pentecost, in the sense that "the same sound fell in many languages at once on the ears of his hearers." We will therefore say no more of that at present. But he certainly does not give us any very convincing evidence for the numerous miraculous stories of other kinds, including several instances of dead persons raised to life, which we are asked to believe. One of these stories, said to have been related many years afterwards by an eyewitness when eighty years old, is so very quaint, reminding one of some of the mediæval legends about the earlier St. Francis and his control over the animal world, that we must be pardoned for quoting it as it stands. Francis had dipped a favourite crucifix into the sea, "to appease a storm," but dipping was apparently insufficient, and, like Polycrates' ring, it went to the bottom. Next day they landed, and Francis, who was much grieved at his loss, was walking along the shore with Fausto Rodriguez, who thus relates the sequel:—

When they had walked half a mile, and were now many miles away from where the crucifix had been lost, "behold a sea crab runs out of the sea on to the shore with the aforesaid crucifix, holding it in his claws on either side, upright and lifted up, and so ran to Xavier and stopped in his sight. And Xavier flung himself on his knees, and the crab waited until he had taken the crucifix from its claws, and then ran back again into the sea whence it had come. And Xavier kissed and embraced the crucifix, and crossing his arms on his breast, lay prostrate on the ground in prayer for half an hour, and his companion, who was by his side, did the same, thanking the Lord Jesus Christ for so strange a miracle."

We may be reminded, of course, of the prophet's axe which floated on the water, but it must be allowed that the intervention of the crab adds a picturesque element to the tale. To most readers, however, the miraculous colouring of the narrative will form a very small part of the interest of the life of Francis Xavier, whatever precise amount of credence they may be disposed to attach to it. The "standing miracle" of his unselfish devotion and indomitable energy constitutes his truest and abiding claim on the reverence of later ages. And the proofs of that miracle, at least, do not depend on the Processes of Canonization, or the hearsay testimony of partial or ignorant admirers. We hope Mr. Coleridge will continue to labour in a department of literature for which he has here shown his aptitude. To find a Saint's life which is at once moderate, historical, and appreciative is not a common thing.

THE BOOK OF SUN-DIALS.*

OF the three successive chronicles of time commemorated in a passage of In Memoriam—

Every grain of sand that runs,
And every span of shade that steals,
And every kiss of toothed wheels—

the hour-glass, the dial, and the watch—the second in order, if not in date of invention, is the second also in point of ingenuity. The "garden god of Christian gardens," as Elia has it, is so subtle and exact a measurer of the sun's course that until, in the seventeenth century, clocks superseded it, it is no wonder that it occupied the serious attention of mathematicians, a great branch of whose studies was dialling. With the scientific history, however, of this venerable device, the clever and popular author of the work before us wisely refrains from meddling. Her own judgment, confirmed by that of a learned friend, Mr. Naumyth, has prompted her to keep clear of the astronomic, and confine herself to the romantic, aspect of dials—their poetry, namely, and their moral teaching. Readers might resent being gravely told that a sun-dial is "an instrument for measuring time by means of the motion of the sun's shadow cast by a style or gnomon erected on its surface," or that dials may be horizontal, vertical, equino-that, as it is, and they might instruct that such knowledge is nowadays more curious than useful. So she confines herself to the definition of it as "a timepiece of shadows"—a definition, as she shows, still applicable, though instead of shadows being thrown from trees, pillars, or buildings requiring a large extent of space, we have, as it were, gathered them up into the small compass of a foot or two of level boards, producing them by a bar of iron or wood raised at a proper angle from the surface. These dial plates are marked round by regular lines of division, which show the places in which the shadow will fall at each successive hour; and, indeed, agreeably to the need of the times, the sixty minutes of each hour were soon marked off also.

* The Book of Sun-Dials. Collected by Mrs. Alfred Gatty, Author of "Fables from Nature." London: Bell & Daldy. 1872.

On the history of the sun-dial also Mrs. Gatty bestows only secondary attention, though she devotes an introductory chapter to this and collateral matter. It seems to have been in earliest use among the Chaldees, from whom it was borrowed by the Jews and the Greeks, from the latter of which nations the Romans copied this, as they did most other things. A glance is given at the palm-dial and the pillar-dial, primitive contrivances of Egypt's early-ripe civilisation. Mrs. Gatty's matter may be compared, without discredit, with that collected by Sir G. Cornwall Lewis in pp. 177-83 of his Astronomy of the Ancients, and it will be found that she has reproduced in her preface, in her own pleasant way, the chief facts noticed by that learned inquirer. We have, for instance, Thornton or Warner's translation of the fragment of Plantius preserved by Aulus Gellius, wherein the parasite denounces the invention of sun-dials because they disconcert his hours of eating, and disestablish that best of all time-gauges, his stomach. We also find the later reference in the epigram of Lucian to the dial of the Greeks, on which the letters of the alphabet representing the Greek numerals six, seven, eight, nine (i.e. from noon till four o'clock), spell the Greek word ΖΗΤΗΙ, or "Enjoy thyself," and suggest to dwellers in a warm climate the fitting time for siestas or other congenial relaxation. This and other allusions remind the reader that the dial must always have been most at home in the sunnier climates, as indeed is indicated by the fact that it abounds in the towns of Italy and the South of France, and is still in vogue in the mosques of Turkey and the gardens of China and Japan. There is yet another interesting aspect of sun-dials—that connected with archæology—on which Mrs. Gatty leaves nothing worth saying unsaid in an appendix of "further notes," touching upon the most remarkable dials at home and abroad from remote ages until now. But it is impossible not to feel that the real and enduring interest of these devices centres itself in the legend or motto which in most cases points a moral to the loungers, in an instructive sic ut viator style. We agree with Mrs. Gatty that it is not handsome on the part of one of her correspondents to describe these mottoes, which many find "more touching than tombstones," as "a compendium of all the lazy, hazy, sunshiny thoughts of men past, present, and in posse," and to say that "the burden of all their songs is a play upon sunshine and shadow." To such an assertion the Book of Sun-Dials is itself the best of answers, for it is full of wisdom and instruction, at the same time that it enshrines not a little wit and drollery. The dial motto is, as it were, a sister or cousin of the proverb; and as "the voice of proverbs is the people's voice," we cannot doubt that these quaint sayings will find welcome and acceptance long after the more prosaic uses of the dial are a thing of the past.

Not seldom indeed, if people spill out the legend round a sundial, they will find an old familiar friend with a new and learned face. On an old dial on Guilsborough school-house, in Northamptonshire, is inscribed the hexameter, Fronte capillatâ, post est occasio calva.

Opportunity has hair in front, but is bald behind.

And, as Mrs. Gatty notes at No. 221, the tag of the line stands for a motto on two churches in Hampshire and Dorsetshire. The Latin line is as old as the second Christian century, but we all know more intimately its English correlative, "Take Time by the forelock"; and though Bacon in his essay on Delays, quoted by Mrs. Gatty, may have had the Latin in his mind, we feel pretty sure that when Shakespeare wrote, in All's Well that Ends Well, "Let us take the instant by the forward top," he thought of Old Time as personified in our vernacular adage. It is curious to find the advice on early rising which begins "He that will thrive must rise at five," inscribed in the centre of a dial face in front of an Elizabethan house near Baschurch, Salop, with the Corbet crest, and the date 1560—an early occurrence of a very English proverb. Another motto not seldom to be met with on dials is Martial's beautiful thought, "Parent et imputantur," referring to the days or suns that are lost for ever, yet are nevertheless counted in our reckoning. As Cotton says of them in his To-morrow:—

They post to heaven and there record thy folly;
Thou shalt be made to answer at the bar
For every fugitive.

This last instance indeed is one that answers well the description of a proverb or a dial inscription. The merit of both is much the same. A dial's admonition should be short, terse, and pregnant with reflection. Of this character is one which is said to have been inscribed on the dial of the Vicar of St. Petrox, Dartmouth—"Allez-vous," or "Pass on," which our matter-of-fact English reproduces at High Lane, near Disley in Cheshire, as well as on a Yorkshire church, in the form of "Begone about your business." According to the industrious Mr. Timbs, this was the motto also of the dial that ornamented the east-end house of the Inner Temple Terrace, and was removed in 1828. Mrs. Gatty quotes from Notes and Queries the Temple account of the origin of the motto in this collocation. The Benchers had fixed a day and hour for furnishing the artist with a motto for their new dial, and the audience was to be given in the library. When he kept his appointment there was only a pre-occupied old bookworm to meet him, and he, ill brooking interruption, cut matters short, and unconsciously attested the end and object of the visit by the churlish coups "Begone about your business." But the briefer French motto seems to us, as indeed to Mrs. Gatty, to have more right to the parentage of this inscription than the surly Templar's rejoinder. One of the prettiest and most speaking of these mottoes is on the circular dial over the porch of what was the church of our author's father in Yorkshire, "Fugit hora, ora"; another in the garden at Hall Place, Berks, "J'avance," is the more happy as the owner's crest is a "horse." Others of like brevity are "Moneo, dum moveo," "Orimur, morimur" (the former word over an increasing, the latter over a decreasing, series of figures), and the curious canting motto, "Mox pax," which is an exceedingly neat abridgment of the Greek Ἐπεὶ γὰρ πᾶς, adopted from the New Testament for the dial at Abbotsford. As good as the Latin, and better than the Greek, is the heraldic motto of Sir Walter Scott, near where he lies by the ruined arch of Dryburgh Abbey, "Watch weel"; and a kindred inscription elsewhere seems to suggest the same wholesome warning, "Venio ut far." More original, without being much less terse, is the motto on a Nottinghamshire church-dial, "Now is yesterday's to-morrow," à propos of which Mrs. Gatty appositely quotes Macbeth's famous words. But we must not seem to imply that there can be no merit other than brevity in these sermons on stones or in metal. The motto on the dial in the Nuns' Garden at Poleworth, near Tamworth, having reference to the Tree of Life and Knowledge in Eden, is not amiss:—"Hortus utranque tulit; nos et meditemur in horto"; the death's head and cross-bones, and the apple, which serve to embellish it, sufficiently fix the allusion. Again the couplet on a Tuscan dial (No. 132) is remarkably neat and happy:—

Ista velut tacito cursu dilabitur umbra,
Transit in æternos sic tua vita dies.

Nor, indeed, can merit and appropriateness be denied to some of our lengthier English inscriptions. Here is one on a pillar in Shestons Churchyard, near Lichfield:—

If o'er the dial glides a shade, redeem
The time; for, lo! it passes like a dream.
But if 'tis all a blank, then mark the loss
Of hours unblest by shadows from the Cross.

And here is another from the library window of Arley Hall, in Cheshire, which is engraved on the same dial as the favourite motto, "Horas non numero nisi serenas":—

May the dread book at our last trial,
When open spread, be like this dial;
May heaven forbear to mark therein
The hours made dark by deeds of sin;
Those only in that record write,
Which virtue, like the sun, makes bright.

An acrostic epitaph on a favourite dog named Neptune, on a dial's eastern and western sides in the Vicarage garden near Sittingbourne, is given in p. 67. It runs (for the acrostic is repeated) to the length of fourteen lines, and is therefore too long for quotation, but those who turn to it will agree that it is not a word too long for perusal, nor too commonplace to be worth preservation.

One or two of the dial mottoes cited by Mrs. Gatty have a claim to notice on the score of historic interest. On one fixed on Tutbury Church, in Staffordshire, the place where Mary Queen of Scots tarried last on her way to Fotheringhay, is inscribed "Dies nostri quasi umbra, et nulla est mora." In New Palace Yard, just where the old clock-house stood, according to Strype, a dial is inserted in the second pediment of the new buildings inscribed, "Discite justitiam moniti." Blackstone tells us that Chief Justice Hengham had to pay the cost of the clock-tower, in the reign of Edward I., for having lowered a line out of compassion for a man's poverty. The motto, which by the way should have been noted as coming from Virgil, Æn. VI. 620, obviously alludes to the mulcted judge. Another inscription (No. 199, p. 74) on a dial in the gable of a house in Priestgate, Peterborough, breathes at once the piety and loyalty of a broken-down Cavalier, whose initials are W. H., and point to one of the Hakes, who long held the mansion. The date is 1665, and the loyal legend ends with "Vivat Carolus Secundus." Of some mottoes the flight of time has made enigmas—e.g. the inscription in the cloisters of Chambéry, "Dum proficit d—t," where "deficit" is the supplement or complement suggested by a friend of Mrs. Gatty. A mutilated inscription in Malmesbury churchyard, on the dialled top of an old mortuary cross, has two legible words, "Hinc—disce." Here the moral would be obvious, had we not reason to know that there was a context, which might enhance or qualify its point. In the dial motto of the church of St. Pierre, in Switzerland, the requirements of metre lead us to suspect an ellipse at the close of the first verse and the opening of the second. It is given as follows:—

Hora flit, culpa crescent, mors imminet;
Nunc, vitæ corrigi facit tunc.

To make an hexameter of v. 1 there is only needed the imperative "ora," which points the moral; to make a pentameter of v. 2 there is nothing wanted save the reinforcement of the word "impatient" from the first verse, which would, in such a collocation, be very effective. An instance of critical acumen and innate skill of interpretation is given in the amended reading of a motto in Fiedmont. It stood thus:—

Sol tempo di Saturno il dente elaco
E del pallone il gioiello talaco;

and obscurely pointed to Saturn's devouring his children, and to the Italian game of pallone, which is a sort of tennis. A Venetian gondolier, well read in Dante, when asked to interpret the couplet, suggested "temo" for "tempo" and all was plain. The translation then ran, "I only fear the devouring tooth of Saturn, and the inept players with the ball"; and the allusion meant that the style or gnomon fears alike Saturn's wat weather, which corrodes iron, and the bad ball-player, who may throw his ball against it and break it (pp. 102, 103). In the motto of the dial near Notre Dame, Paris, either the artist or the copyist has made a faulty hexameter; for obviously "Machina, quæ bis sextas juste dividit horæ" ought to be rearranged "Machina bis sextas quæ juste dividit horæ" (No. 153); and in the clock and dial motto of a Florentine convent, "Fugit et non recedit Tempus," we would suggest that "recedit" is very canine Latin for "comes back" (p. 35). The false quantity which Mrs. Gatty detects in the couplet (No. 292) may be remedied by reading "gressum" for "gradum"; and it is comforting to find that we English are keener to detect flaws than our Continental neighbours. To return for a moment to elliptic mottoes, a not uncommon one in England is the device of "We shall," which finds its complement in the thing whereon it is engraved—i.e., dial, or dis-all. A various reading in some cases is "We must"; whence the good story of the simple parson who, when a clock was ordered for his church, thought he could not do better than copy "We must" on its face from the condemned dial—cf. p. 133. There are indeed not a few good stories connected with dial mottoes. Such is that of the Welwyn garden dial, the truth of whose words, "Eheu fugaces," was proved by thieves or wags absconding with it shortly after its setting up. Such also is the suspension, by a wag, of an old edition of Præcise in Chancery on the gable of a dial in Lincoln's Inn, which bore the inscription "Ex hoc momento pendet æternitas." Now and then they become food for punsters—eg., when the punning Fellow of Worcester proposed as a motto for a mulberry-wood snuffbox the words "Memento inori" (162); and when the Oxford undergraduate, with some glimpses of analogies for his perverse translation, translated for the lady he was lionizing, "Perseus et imputantur," "They perish and are not thought of."

Our remarks and extracts represent but a tithe of the amusing and instructive matter collected with much skill and tact in the pages of a clever and attractive book. It is enriched with ungraved sketches of some of the most curious dials at home and abroad, and is turned out by the publishers so handsomely as to be in form, as well as substance, a drawing-room book. Not, however, that it is this and nothing more, for we are sure there must be few readers who cannot derive profit, as well as pleasure, from its pages.

MICHAEL TRESDIDER.*

OLD songs can be set to new tunes, and each composer makes his own melody; so in like manner an author can take up an old plot and work it into a new pattern by his individual method of treatment. Indeed there is very little that is novel in plots at all; and the changes to be rung are necessarily on themes well worn, if not always worthy. The ordinary crimes of an undisciplined and passionate humanity breaking away from restraints and violating law, and the crossness of social circumstances in relation to natural rights and personal love, make up, as a matter of course, nine-tenths of the plots of novels. If pity has to be excited, some one must be made to suffer; if horror, some one must be made to sin; and, after all, human action has its limits, though certain of our authors seem inclined to wander into totally untrodden paths in the walks of wrong-doing, and to refashion the possibilities of crime according to imagination rather than fact. Still, as a rule, the Decalogue stands as a finality; and we know pretty well all that can be made to result in a man's history, or a woman's, when the Commandments are broken, and when conscience on the one hand, and society on the other, have to be avenged before the drama is played out. And human nature is pretty well known, though sometimes we come upon descriptions of strange beings who are as little like the men and women we know as if they were anthropophagi, the men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders. But on the whole fiction, like everything else, has its terminal points, and is confined within boundaries that are not easy to overpass.

Michael Tresdider has no claim to originality of plot, nor to the tragic power of extraordinary crime; nor indeed to much stir or passion anyhow. It is a simply written book, with a very transparent story; the work of a thoughtful man whose dramatic power nowhere rises to the height of genius, though his conceptions are good and his work conscientious. The story is quietly told even where the events are most stirring, and the author's familiarity with the scenery of the place he has chosen for the head-quarters of his characters gives a certain truthfulness and naturalness. The makes up for his somewhat cold and constrained method. Any one who knows the north coast of Cornwall will recognise at once its main features, and to those who love it the evident fondness of the writer for the scenery he describes will be a pleasant point of sympathy. This scene lies on the line of that wide and perilous bay which is enclosed between Hurland Point and Pentire Head; the boldest bit of coast line in England and the most dangerous, but one which has a special charm for those who live by it, and which even visitors learn to love as they learn to love the Lake country of the North or the Welsh mountains. And the tender appreciation of this writer for the nature which he evidently knows so well is one of the most charming characteristics of the book.

The opening of the story is very full of dramatic promise. The bitter quarrel of a proud and resolute father with as proud and resolute a son, on that old, old subject, love, and the voluntary self-banishment of the latter from his home and his very name, rather than give up his beloved; the father's death, still unyielding, but still loving, and his son's obliteration, lead us to hope for stirring work and powerful emotions as we go on. But the pitch is not sustained so evenly as might have been; and the strains that follow the opening chord often fall flat. Yet there was good material for a highly wrought episode in the discovery by Philip Turnwell of his father's connexion with the great Tresdider family, and his heirship to the fine Portuan estate; and the idea of Nicholas himself was too good not to have been made of more account and received more thorough development. Proud, sensitive, loyal, and self-willed, accepting his fate with the dignity of voluntary submission, as one who has made his choice and manfully abides by it whatever the bitter end to which it leads him—eating out his heart in silence, yet never forgetting and never ceasing to suffer—there were elements of tragic passion and infinite pathos in the man, which the author might have used to greater advantage than he has done. His life and sorrows were in themselves sufficient for the staple of a three-volume novel if they had been dilated in the ordinary way; and even in the concentrated form in which we have them, we can without any great stretch of imagination forecast some of the scenes and circumstances which must have presented themselves to the author's mind as available material while he was relating the last supreme event, and which would have added greatly to the interest of the book had they been given, however rapidly. It was perhaps a little out of nature that the father should have written the letter we quote:—

"Nicholas Turnwell,

"I write to you by the name, which you tell me you have adopted, as the act being accomplished, which you have persisted in performing contrary to my express commands, it is impossible for me to consider you any longer as my son.

"Although you have chosen by this marriage to degrade the position to which you were born, I am willing to believe that you have still some of the feelings of a gentleman, and as such I hold you to your promise. You have assured me, that strange as I cannot but think it after your conduct, you still hold the honour of my family and myself in some esteem, and you have given me your word that you will never resume my name, that you will never divulge to your children, should you have any, nor allow your wife to do so, your connexion with me, and that you will never put forward your claim to the succession to my property.

"By carrying out these obligations faithfully, you can make the only reparation now in your power to the father you have disobeyed, and the family you have disgraced.

"As this is the last communication which will ever pass between us, and as I do not wish you to disgrace us still further by starving, I enclose a draft for five thousand pounds. In the sphere of life, which you have chosen to prefer to that wherein you were born, this sum will be sufficient to enable you to start with respectability.

"Portuan Manor,
"February 4th, 1830."

"ARTHUR TRESDIDER.

Moreover, granting the natural possibility of such a letter on the father's part, it seems inconceivable that the son should have consented to an arrangement which not only cut him off from his rights, but destroyed those of his children after him. Still, however, there is a certain novelty in the suggestion which has its value; and in these days of threadbare plots and foregone conclusions almost any kind of novelty in a story is welcome.

If the episode of Nicholas Turnwell might have been enlarged and improved upon, so might many other parts of this book had the author given the reins to his imagination and allowed himself free scope. But he has a curious way of checking himself, and only glancing off where we might have expected an enduring impression; and we fancy that towards the end he got tired, and hurried over scenes and events which, had they occurred earlier, would have been more elaborated. The freshness and vigour of the prologue are sadly wanting in the last scene of all, where Lord Ellerton performs his act of Happy Despatch with so much ease; and the graphic indications of Nicholas Turnwell's character and career are lost in all that relates to Ruth. Yet Ruth had a part to play that would have been sweet and pathetic beyond all others had it been either largely treated or suggestively indicated. Although, however, we find ourselves judging the book almost as much by what it might have been as by what it is, we are very willing to recognise its actual good qualities; and Michael Tresdider has a fair share of literary merits, though we cannot agree with all its pictures of life. Thus, when Lord Ellerton gives up Lady Margaret Charteris to his friend, with no more compunction and no more passion of regret than if she had been a toy-terrier that Michael might have fancied, and when the pair accommodate themselves to the new arrangement as quietly as if it were the most natural thing in the world for a * Michael Tresdider: a Cornish Tale, a vol. London: Bentley & Co.

Sanctus to be handed over by her lover to his friend, we think the incident strained and unnatural; and the passionless manner of narration makes it appear even less like life. That Lord Ellerton should retire was only right and manly; and that Michael and Margaret should marry was only proper and natural; but the lord might have waived his claim less oddly and more after the manner of ordinary men, and Lady Margaret herself might have objected to be drafted off into the hands of even the man she loved and who loved her, before she had been asked. So when Philip's illegitimacy is discovered, we are tempted to ask why more suggestive play was not made with old Borlase beforehand. He comes too suddenly on the reader. No one expects him. He was made dead in the beginning without a hint at resurrection, and it is not pleasant to have a dead man come suddenly up from his grave and give witness in a court of justice like a ghost. What could be expected after such an announcement as this?—

He thought of her history. Her father had been a clergyman, and came of a good race, but they were very poor, and when five years before, Ellen had fallen in love with—though he was some years older than herself—and married the still handsome sailor Richard Borlase, who had worked his way up to the ownership of one or two small coasting vessels, she had met with little opposition from the scruples of family pride.

Eighteen months after the marriage, her husband had been tempted to earn more for his wife, by undertaking a distant voyage, which promised great profit. Unfortunately, a great storm had overtaken him on the coast of Africa, and for three years and a half Ellen had lived a widow in this lonely cottage.

Certainly one could not expect that he would reappear as an octogenarian when his testimony was the one thing wanted for the rearrangement of affairs; and we cannot help feeling that our author has got himself out of a difficulty more by sleight of hand than by the natural growth of circumstances. Old Borlase is too much of a deus ex machina to carry with him vitality or probability, though the fact might have been made good use of if differently treated. There is always life in suggestiveness. A thing that has to come as a surprise comes with best effect after the reader's mind has been in a manner unconsciously prepared for it. Hints, allusions, circumstances the meaning of which is seen now only darkly, but which, by after illumination, are understood clearly and distinctly enough—all this kind of preparation gives a cumulative value and a sense of artistic growth, which the sudden and unprepared introduction of a surprise misses. If Borlase's possible existence had been hinted at and kept before the reader's mind as a thing that might be some day proved, there would have been the additional interest of speculating whether it was so or not, and, if it was, whether it would be brought to light in time, which is now wanting. All good work hangs together in this manner; and the sense of growth we have spoken of before is as necessary to perfection in art as in nature. Nevertheless, with all its shortcomings, Michael Tredder is a pleasant and readable story, and, if not powerfully dramatic, is at least pure and tender.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsagent, on the day of publication.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Communications relating to Advertisements should likewise be addressed.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 867, JUNE 8, 1872:

- |   |  |                                    |
|---|--|------------------------------------|
| France.                                     | Public Health and Public Business.         | The Kooka Executions.              |
| Spain.                                      | The Scotch Education Bill.                 | Mr. Frederic Harrison on Monarchy. |
|   | Mr. Justice Keogh and the Galway Election. |                                    |
| Planning Holidays.                          |  |                                    |
| Pagan Aspects of Christianity.              | Novels and Novellists.                     | The Return of the Goths.           |
| Dramatic Literature in France.              | James Gordon Bennett.                      |                                    |
| Corporal Punishment.                        | The Builders' Strike.                      | Bormons.                           |
|   | The Royal Academy.                         |                                    |
| Hook's Life of Archbishop Parker.           |  |                                    |
| Dr. Angus Smith on Air and Rain.            | Hermann Agha.                              |                                    |
| Bogdanowitch's Tactical Results of the War. | Hook's Flood—an Opera.                     |                                    |
| Coleridge's Life of St. Francis Xavier.     | The Book of San-Diala.                     |                                    |
|   | Michael Tredder.                           |                                    |

CONTENTS OF No. 868, JUNE 1, 1872:

- The Washington Treaty—Germany—The Ballot Bill—The Sultan's Speech—The French Army Bill—The Galway Election Position—Lord Dalzell—The Custody of Infants.
- A Manly and Noble Sport—Recent Changes at Oxford—Seeing the Academy—V and W—Mr. Harcourt on the Invasion Question—South African Politics—The Salmon Fisheries—The Royal Academy—The Derby.
- Hook's Life of Archbishop Parker—Creasy's Colonial Constitutions of the Britannic Empire—Mr. Buchanan and the Fleishly Poets—Life of Sir Henry Lawrence—Lucy Pittam—King's Sierra Nevada—My Wife and I in Queensland—The Household Cookery Book—French Literature.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.
June 17, 20, July 2, 4, and 6. NOTICE TO COMPETITORS.—All Competitors in Solo Classes will be required to bring their own Music, as well as Copies for the Accompanist, at the Private Hearings, and also at the Competitions, and must be ready with any piece in the list asked for by the Jury. The Competitors will appear in alphabetical order. The names of Singers chosen by each Jury to compete will be printed in the Programme of the day, with an account of the large type upon the Handel Orchestra. Each Competitor chosen by the Jury will have the option of naming a Solo and Duo, subject to approval, to sing at one of the Concerts to take place after each Competition. The title of the Solo and Duo must be sent in to the Office of the National Music Meetings as soon after the Private Hearings as possible.

By Order.

MUSICAL UNION.—JAEEL.—This eminent Pianist, recently returned from Moscow, will come expressly for the TWO next MATINEES, June 11 and 14, to commence at a Quarter-past Three. Executants—Hermann, Wiesner, Weidlich, Mann, and Lasserre. Quartet in E Flat, Piano &c., Schumann; Quintet in G, Spohr; Duo, B Flat, Piano and Violoncello, Mendelssohn; Piano Solos, various, Jaell. Tickets to be had at the usual Places, and at St. James's Hall.

Professor ELLA, Director, 9 Victoria Square.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. Conductor, Mr. W. G. CUSINS.
MONDAY, June 10, St. James's Hall, Eight o'clock.—Symphonies, Jupiter, Mozart, and Pastoral, Beethoven; Concerto for Piano, in E Flat, Liszt; Piano, Mr. Fyfe Harrison; Overtures, The Tempest, Benedict, and Faust, Cherubini. Vocalists, Misses Marie Russ and Signor Vizzani.—Stalls, 10s. 6d. and 7s. Unreserved, 5s. and 3s. 6d.—L. Cook & Co's, 63 New Bond Street; Cramer's, 301 Regent Street; Chappell's, 45 New Bond Street; Oliver's, Mitchell's, Keith, Frowse's, Hays', and Austin's Ticket Office, St. James's Hall, Piccadilly.

OLD BOND STREET GALLERY, 25 Old Bond Street.—THE EIGHTH EXHIBITION OF PICTURES IN OIL AND WATER-COLOURS is NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

G. F. CHESTER, Hon. Sec.

THE SOCIETY of PAINTERS in WATER-COLOURS.—THE SIXTY-SECOND ANNUAL EXHIBITION is NOW OPEN, at 5 Pall Mall East, from Nine till Seven. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

ALFRED D. FRIPP, Secretary.

INSTITUTE of PAINTERS in WATER-COLOURS.—THE THIRTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION is NOW OPEN from Nine till Dark. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.—Gallery, 45 Pall Mall, near St. James's Palace.

JAMES FAHEY, Secretary.

DORÉ'S GREAT PICTURE of "CHRIST LEAVING the PRETORIUM" with "Triumph of Christianity," "Christian Martyrs," "Francisco da Rimini," "Neophyte," "Titania," &c., at the DORÉ GALLERY, 35 New Bond Street. Ten to Six. Admission, 1s.

UNDERGROUND JERUSALEM.—An EXHIBITION of WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS by WILLIAM SIMPSON, illustrating the Recent Excavations and Explorations. Pall Mall Gallery, 45 Pall Mall (Mr. Thomson's). Ten to Six. Admission, including Descriptive Catalogue, 1s.

ELIJAH WALTON'S COLLECTION of OIL and WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS, now ON VIEW, at his GALLERY, 4 Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, Westminster. Admission, 1s., including Catalogue. Open Daily from Ten till Dark.

ARTISTS' BENEVOLENT FUND (Incorporated by Royal Charter), for the Relief of the Widows and Orphans of British Artists.

Patron—Her Majesty the QUEEN.

The SIXTY-SECOND ANNIVERSARY DINNER of the Corporation will be held at the Fruchaud's Tavern, Great Queen Street, on Saturday, June 8, 1872.

R. N. FOWLER, Esq., M.P., in the Chair.

Since the foundation of the Society the sum of £375 has been distributed in relieving Widows and Orphans of British Artists; and during the past year Forty-nine Widows and Nine Orphans have received annuities amounting to £267 10s. The Institution is entirely supported by the voluntary donations and subscriptions of artists and patrons of the Fine Arts. Gentlemen's Tickets, 5s.; Ladies', 3s. 6d., may be obtained of the Secretaries, at the Fruchaud's Tavern; and of the Secretary, L. Youns, Esq., 4 Trafalgar Square, W.C.

ARUNDEL SOCIETY.—NOTICE of the ANNUAL MEETING. MEMBERS are invited to attend the ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING, which will take place at the Rooms of the Society on Tuesday, June 18, at 3 o'clock P.M. precisely.

31 Old Bond Street, W., June 8, 1872. F. W. MAYNARD, Secretary.

CLIFTON COLLEGE SCHOLARSHIPS.—The following will be open to Competition at Midsummer:

1. One or more of the value of £20 a year (equivalent to both Board and Tuition free), tenable during the holder's stay at the College.
2. One of £15 a year, open to boys under Seventeen.
3. One or more of £10 a year, open to boys under Fifteen.
4. One or more of £25 a year, open to boys under Fifteen.

For Numbers 1 and 4 an allowance for age is made in favour of young boys.

The Examination will commence on Wednesday, June 19, at Nine A.M. Further information can be obtained of the HEAD-MASTER, the College, Clifton, Bristol.

THE COLLEGE, Isle of Cumbrae.—There will be room for a few STUDENTS from the ENGLISH UNIVERSITIES during the Long Vacation. Early application is desirable.—Address, The Rev. THE PROCTOR, the College, Isle of Cumbrae, by Greenock, N.B.

KING'S COLLEGE, London.—The Rev. ALEX. J. D. DORNEY, B.D., Lecturer on Public Reading and Speaking, receives RESIDENT and VISITING PUPILS at 13 Prince's Square, W.

EDUCATION in BELGIUM.—Mr. OGER LAURENT receives a limited number of YOUNG GENTLEMEN who intend to learn MODERN LANGUAGES without interruption to their English Studies. The establishment is situated close to the Park at Brussels, and is constructed on strict hygienic principles. The diet is of first quality and unlimited. Terms: for Pupils above the age of Twelve, £25; under, £20 per annum. For references, &c., apply to E. de Laboquer, Esq., Avenue Villa, Brussels, Belgium.

EDUCATION by the SEASIDE.—PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN.—French and German immediately spoken. Greatest attention paid to health and moral training of Pupils; they are usually prepared for Public Schools. Highest references given and required. Terms, 5s. to 10s. per Week. Prospective apply to T. E. M., Messrs. Treasurer, Brighton; Messrs. Slater & Co., 100 Strand, London. Half Term begins on June 12.

ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL, Maitland Park.—Instituted May 16, 1776.—Orphans of both sexes are eligible from any part of the Kingdom. They are now in the Schools; 400 can be accommodated; 2000 have been nurtured; 10 will be admitted in July.

The Charity depends for three-fourths of its annual income upon voluntary Contributions, which are insufficient to maintain the school for such a large number of children. Contributions are earnestly solicited, and will be thankfully received.

Office, 70 Chancery Lane, E.C.

Life Subscriptions: for Two Years, £10 10s.; for One Year, £5 5s. Annual Subscriptions: for Two Years, £1 1s.; for One Year, 10s. 6d.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 868, Vol. 33.

June 15, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE ALABAMA NEGOTIATIONS

THE see-saw of the American negotiation has been recorded, not without a curious effect, in weekly comments on the latest oscillations of the pendulum. A fortnight ago the Treaty appeared to be on the point of death, from which it unexpectedly revived when Lord GRANVILLE read to the House of Lords General SCHFACK's authorised communication. It was not unnaturally assumed that the discussion of the wording of the Supplementary Article would be amicably arranged; but the American Government, influenced perhaps by the taunts of its opponents at home, has announced that the limits of concession have been reached. The nature of the alterations proposed by the Senate is not yet known, and it is highly improbable that after so many efforts to save the Treaty the English Government should have insisted on any trivial or verbal objection. Lord GRANVILLE has already stated that the amendments bear no relation to the undertaking not to press the Indirect Claims. It may therefore be surmised that the Senate endeavoured to secure some inadmissible equivalent for the withdrawal of the claims, but it is useless to form conjectures as to the substance of a document which will almost certainly be published in a few days. The difference proved to be so serious that the English Government proposed that both parties should concur in an invitation to the Arbitrators to adjourn the proceedings. It is scarcely a cause for regret that Mr. FISH peremptorily rejected the suggestion, although he professed his willingness to assent to the adjournment if it were thought desirable by the Arbitrators. It now appears that the English agents will move for an adjournment, intimating at the same time their intention not to hand in their written argument unless their request is granted. The American SECRETARY OF STATE has given notice in reply that he will consent to no qualified or conditional proceeding, and that if the English Government persists in its intention the American agent will be instructed to express the opinion of his Government in such terms as self-respect may require. The American Case afforded a specimen of the polemical style of its authors at a time when both countries erroneously supposed themselves to be on friendly terms. A protest against the conduct of the English Government will probably furnish an exceptional model of the American form of international courtesy. It is unfortunate that the favourite invention of philanthropists should on the first experiment of its use have caused universal irritation; but, as Mr. FISH lately explained with perfect candour, a reference to arbitration is the beginning rather than the end of a quarrel. If the inquiry had not been interrupted, the American counsel would have found many opportunities of giving utterance to their national feeling of dislike. The preliminary negotiations have, after a prolonged controversy, terminated in a wrangle. The English Ministers will be blamed for exposing themselves to contumely; but in great international discussions it is more creditable to suffer incivility than to inflict it.

It is strange that either professed supporters or avowed adversaries of the Government should attempt at the last moment to take the conduct of the business out of the hands of the Ministers who are both constitutionally and practically responsible. No remonstrance or warning could have extracted from Mr. GLADSTONE or Lord GRANVILLE a more definite promise than their repeated declaration that they would not proceed with the arbitration unless the Indirect Claims were withdrawn. The discussion in the House of Lords might possibly have weakened the hands of the Government at the decisive moment, although it now appears that Mr. FISH has abruptly terminated the negotiations. The adjournment of Congress, the announcement that the Senate will not be summoned to a special Session, and the departure from Washington of the PRESIDENT and the SECRETARY OF STATE, show that the arbitration must fall to the ground unless the American agents at Geneva are instructed to concur in the English demand for an adjournment. It has been justly remarked in different Parliamentary discussions that it was the business of the plaintiff rather than of the defendant to render arbitration possible; but as the obnoxious concessions which have been made are irrevocable, it would have been well that the dispute should be finally settled. There can be no doubt that any honest and competent tribunal would award, at the most, a comparatively insignificant sum for damages, even if it were possible to hold that in the case of any of the cruisers the English Government had been guilty of a neglect of duty. At present a general feeling of annoyance takes the form of a kind of complacent satisfaction at the failure of the Treaty; but the angry interpellations in both Houses on Tuesday last indicated disappointment as well as disapproval. The irritation proved to be contagious, for Lord KIMBERLEY attacked Lord CAIRNS with an acrimony which in the House of Lords ought to be modified by more courteous forms. There was much ground for the suggestion that Lord CAIRNS had on more than one occasion furnished the American Government with arguments for their own interpretation of the Treaty and of less formal engagements, but it might be fairly contended that even an excess of candour was preferable to the exhibition of a patriotic bias. The proceedings of to-day at Geneva will be watched with some anxiety, although they will be purely formal. Even if they are nominally regarded as private, the details will probably be published by the exercise of that literary enterprise which at Washington disregards the barriers of official secrecy. If the eminent persons who meet for the purpose of doing nothing possess any sense of the ludicrous, they will be disposed to smile at the useless formality which they are assembled to transact. The English Arbitrator will have to take his seat with his colleagues when they receive from the English counsel his refusal to hand in the written argument prepared on behalf of his Government, or to proceed further with the inquiry. There is reason to fear that the representatives of the United States, especially as some of them are mainly responsible for the rupture of the Treaty, will give effect to the reported menace of Mr. FISH by the form of the protest which they may be expected to deliver.

The question whether the collapse of the Alabama arbitration will affect the arrangements with respect to the San Juan boundary and the Canadian fisheries can scarcely be answered by a mere reference to the terms of the Treaty. If either party insists that all the covenants of the Treaty must be interpreted as parts of the same whole, it would be useless to rely on the form or language of the document in proof of the opposite contention. As a matter of fact, it is well known that the PRESIDENT only consented to the appointment of the High Commission on the express condition that it should be authorised to deal with the Alabama claims. If the clauses of the Treaty have nevertheless been framed so that each portion is independent of the rest, the American Government would be justified in relying on the original understanding rather than on the language adopted by the negotiators; and in international controversies either litigant has the power, and therefore the right, of adopting his own interpretation of an ambiguous undertaking. It would be as idle for the English Government to demand a one-sided decision on the San Juan dispute as for the American agents at Geneva to require that the Tribunal should proceed with the Alabama inquiry after the withdrawal of the English agents. If the PRESIDENT and the SECRETARY OF STATE wish to limit as far as possible the points in dispute between the two countries, they will proceed both with the San Juan reference and with the arrangements relating to the Canadian fisheries. In both cases the only object of the English Government is to guard against any collision which may endanger friendly relations. The Canadian question possesses economical as well as political importance, and the Imperial Government in this particular matter represents the interests of the Dominion rather than those of the mother-country. The determination of the San Juan boundary concerns the honour rather than the welfare of the Empire, although a decision in favour of the American contention would in some degree affect the security of the neighbouring British possessions. If it is true that the arguments of the agents on both sides have already been exchanged at Berlin, it would seem that a retirement from the arbitration would scarcely be consistent with due respect to the German Emperor; but Mr. BANCROFT, who prefaces his Case with a string of elaborate compliments to the august Arbitrator, may be trusted, in executing any instructions which he may receive from his Government, not to neglect the forms of courtly deference. All Englishmen will be of the same mind in desiring to rescue any fragments which may remain after the wreck of the Treaty; but the discussions of the last six months have done much to cool the precipitate enthusiasm with which the Washington arrangement was in the first instance received.

PETER THE GREAT.

RUSSIA has been this week celebrating the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of PETER the GREAT. A solemn service was held on the appointed day, last Tuesday, in the Cathedral. Then there was a procession by water to the landing-stage before the statue of the founder of the Russian Empire. The EMPEROR rode at the head of an imposing body of troops across the Isaac's Plain to the Cathedral of St. Isaac. Another grand service was celebrated, and once more the procession returned to the statue. A salute on the largest scale was fired, and the troops marched by in all their splendour. Everything that was possible was done in honour of the truly remarkable man who found Russia an Empire of savages, and left it an Empire in contact with, and almost a part of, the civilized world. It was not only that when PETER visited WILLIAM III. Russia was unknown to England, but there was nothing as to Russia which Europe was in the least concerned in knowing. Its only port was Archangel; Sweden cut it off from the Baltic; Turkey from the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. It had no cities, or wealth, or learning, or armies fit to cope with Europeans. PETER said that the Swedes taught him the art of war, and he learnt it as a perfectly new lesson, in a manner that made the Swedes repent that their teaching had been so good. PETER, under circumstances so very unfavourable, determined that Russia should not only be a great Power, but a great naval Power. He set himself to learn the rudiments of the art of ship-building, and he framed in the dockyards of Saardam and Deptford the project of giving Russia a navy. No instance of the expansive power of the political mind of man is more extraordinary than this. PETER entirely out of his own head invented the notion of Russia, a landlocked Power, becoming the mistress of great seas and the owner of gigantic navies. It was only part of the same idea, and not so striking a part, that he should have nursed the ambition of making Russia a Power distinct from other European Powers, and yet one of their number. Sweden and Poland collapsed before Russia, because they were little Powers affecting to be great ones. Turkey, unprotected by Western Europe, had no sufficient basis of resistance. That Russia should have learnt some of the arts of civilization from communication with Europe; that, possessed of these arts, she should have largely influenced Europe; that, with an autocratic Government and a brave, submissive population, she should have gradually won her way on all sides, is not so very wonderful. What is wonderful is, that the author of her greatness should have seen that a seaboard and a navy were necessary to her, and might be won by her, at a time when she had no ports, no ships, and no seamen. The only Russian who could see this was the Sovereign, and the Sovereign, in order to realize his visions, had to begin at the beginning and learn the merest rudiments of seamanship and ship-building. Perhaps the only parallel in modern times is that of FREDERICK the GREAT, who conceived and carried out the equally difficult project of making a tiny State without a frontier and without a military ally, by mere force of pluck, skill, good management, generalship, and economy, fight at the same time Russia, Austria, and France. Prussia is in itself almost as unfit to be a great military Power as the Russia of PETER's earlier days was to be a great naval Power. But in both cases genius and patience, and the infinite attention to details which is the soul of patience, and perhaps of genius, won their way, and secured the desired end.

But although great works cannot be done without great workmen, still the great workman must have adequate materials in order to achieve his purpose. FREDERICK the GREAT could never have fought the Seven Years' War unless his subjects had been akin in temper and stubborn courage to their descendants whom we have seen marching through France in 1870. PETER could not have made Russia great unless there had been a Russia to make great. And the greatness of Russia is due to three causes. In the first place, there was the influence of a spirited, though utterly unscrupulous, set of alien adventurers whose talents were bought by Russia just as the statues and pictures and books of ancient Europe were bought to add to the nascent glories of St. Petersburg. In the next place, there was a frugal, hardy, devout, abundant peasantry, gifted with a great courage and a readiness to die for their Czar the fruits of which were made sufficiently apparent to the world of our days at the Alma and Inkermann. The present EMPEROR has at his absolute disposal sixty millions of subjects and a million and a quarter of trained men. Lastly, the most effective spiritual agency known to the modern world, that of the Russian clergy, is entirely at the command of the Czar. When PETER was in England he undertook, at the instigation of Lord CARMARTHEN, to permit the introduction of tobacco into Russia; and when it was represented to him that not only had the laws previously prohibited smoking, but that the clergy had denounced the practice as damnable, PETER replied that he knew how to manage the priests. Certainly the Czars have shown that they know how to manage their priests. The Russians are among the most devout of men. They are always rendering external homage to the signs of religion. They bow in adoration before every cross, and always have a pictured Saint at hand to bless and protect them. The clergy have all the respect and reverence paid them which flow from the hearts of an uninquiring and admiring people. But the whole of this spiritual power is an engine in the hands of the Czar. The priests only exist to serve him and to promote his glory. The Russian Church is at once a State Church with the extreme of vitality in itself and with the extreme of subordination as regards the State. PETER, who was entirely free from anything like high principles, and allowed nothing to stand in the way of his aims, persecuted the Protestants in his dominions to the complete satisfaction of his clergy; and his policy has been that of his successors, and has met the reward anticipated. The State upholds the Church with an iron hand, and the Church has no desire except to please the Emperor. If all that has taken place in the last ten years in the way of religious persecution in Russia, under a singularly mild and noble-minded Czar, could be made known, Europe would stand aghast. The Orthodox Church is maintained and its area extended at any cost; but the Orthodox Church is not like the Catholic Church in Catholic countries, a foreign and usurping Power—it is heart and soul the handmaid of the Emperor. For anything like it we must go out of European experience, and look at Mahomedan countries. The Czar is the head of the Faithful, just as the Sultan is the head of the Faithful, and the only difference is that the spiritual power of the Sultan is crippled, while that of the Czar is not crippled, by the opposing influence and the abiding control of foreign nations.

When great men have done great things for a nation it is natural and right that occasionally the greatness of these men and of their work should alone be brought into prominence, while their bad qualities and the evil they wrought are for the moment cast into the shade. It is quite true that, in spite of all these processions to and from the statue and the Cathedral, PETER was in real life a gross, cruel, sensual savage. But it is not for Russia to think of this at a time when the accident of what is pronounced to be an anniversary recalls, to the exclusion of everything else, what PETER was, and what he did, for Russia. It may, however, be observed that the works of great men have always two sides and operate in different directions. They have a constructive and at the same time a destructive force. PETER's object, in which, seconded by his able successors, he fully succeeded, was to make Russia at once great and part of the European system. Having become great, and having become part of the European system, the country inevitably tends to change its character, and to lose those special elements of greatness by which it has risen. Russia becomes every year more like Europe. Its peasantry, and even its clergy, are on the road to change. We often hear of the Old Russian party, and perhaps are not clear what it means, and what it desires. Its meaning and its desires become clear if we regard it as the party which wishes to accept one half of PETER's work without accepting the other half. It wishes that Russia should be great in Europe without becoming European. It thinks that the status of the peasantry and of the clergy shall be immutable. It disregards the general politics of Europe and clings to Pan Slavism. It dreams not of absorbing Poland, but of blotting it out. It has persistently, and not unsuccessfully, resisted the benevolent and liberal policy of the Czar. It recoils from Germany because German thought and German training are the doors of European influence. PETER is at this moment, as it were, fighting with himself in Russia. The ladder by which his family has mounted to the heights of its dizzy ambition declines to be kicked down. Russia, to be all that he wished, needs to be transformed, and the transformation of a people is a long and difficult process. There are eddies and backwaters in the current of every national history, and Russia will only with many struggles and many retrograde movements become really European. There will be many scratchings of the skin, and the Tartar will always be revealed beneath. Of the ultimate result there can be little doubt. Russia will be gradually changed, but in calculating the effects of the change, which will be, it may be expected, favourable both to its real and apparent greatness, it must be borne in mind that the new Russia will not be the old, and that the peculiar instruments by which the dreams of PETER were realized will have ceased to exist.

THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY.

TWO out of three Conventions have nominated candidates for the Presidency of the United States. It is uncertain whether the Democratic Convention at Baltimore will think it more advantageous to propose a candidate of its own, or to widen the breach in the Republican party by adopting the nomination of Mr. GREELEY. If the managers of the Cincinnati Convention had seriously wished to elevate the standard of political and official morality, the selection of Mr. ADAMS would have entitled them to claim the votes of the large and growing class which is profoundly dissatisfied with the principles and practice of the present Administration. The Democrats, both in the North and in the South, might not improbably have concurred in the nomination of a candidate who has through circumstances, and perhaps by inclination, remained aloof from recent conflicts. During the Civil War and after its close Mr. ADAMS had occasion to prefer on behalf of his Government demands which seemed to Englishmen unjust and even extortionate, but the dignity of his own demeanour was universally acknowledged. No American politician could have been with equal propriety selected for the office of Arbitrator at Geneva, unless it had been thought desirable that the representatives of the contending litigants should be absolutely impartial. The choice of a President whose father and grandfather had already held the same high office would have served as an interesting illustration of the hereditary transmission of personal eminence; and it is not improbable that the vulgar American prejudice against family distinction may have operated to the disadvantage of Mr. ADAMS. In the earlier divisions his name stood at the head of the list, but the proceedings of American Conventions are as puzzling to strangers as the similar manoeuvrings of a Conclave of Cardinals. Some of the delegations probably satisfied themselves that it was impossible to secure an absolute majority for Mr. ADAMS; and it was alleged, not that Mr. GREELEY was fit for the office of President, but that he would receive a larger popular vote than any of his opponents. Whether there is a greater probability of obtaining a competent ruler by a system of Conventions or by reliance on primogeniture is a doubtful question; but it can scarcely be disputed that a Prime Minister appointed because he is already the leader of the dominant party affords a better guarantee of competence than a Presidential candidate who emerges from the intrigues of a Convention. The principles or doctrines which Mr. GREELEY may be supposed to represent are not even professedly held by his principal supporters; and his own personal qualifications are universally regarded as ridiculous. Full of the zeal and narrow intolerance of self-taught and half-taught men, not deliberately dishonest, and yet consciously trading on his own simplicity, Mr. GREELEY has acquired much popular influence by appealing to the ignorance and prejudices which he shares. While he is totally devoid of the humour of Cassatt, with whom he has been compared, he is equally vehement and abusive in his language. Utterly incapable of understanding the most elementary reasoning in political economy, Mr. GREELEY has constantly asserted that Mr. WELLS and other American advocates of Free-trade are bought in that currency which he characteristically designates as "British gold." It is unnecessary to add that he piously adopts the doctrine taught in the school-books of his youth, that, in memory of that profound and bloodthirsty tyrant GEORGE III., every true American ought to cherish an implacable hatred to England.

The more respectable promoters of the Cincinnati Convention are bitterly disappointed by its result. It was their desire to check the corruption which threatens to pervade political society by a protest against the present Administration. Some of them held that a Protectionist policy was not only injurious but discreditable to the country; and they hoped that it would be possible to find a candidate who might advance sound principles with something of the authority of a statesman. They have now learned that a Convention can only be manipulated by professional practitioners of the base art of electioneering. Those who were dissatisfied with the policy of General GRANT find themselves addled with a nominee who affects as his best title to public confidence the homely rudeness of an Athenian DICEROLIS or a Roman OFELLUS. It is true that the most rustic obstinacy may be overcome by pressing considerations of personal expediency. The Liberal Republicans were not prepared to accept, in deference to Mr. GREELEY, the preposterous tariffs which he has constantly upheld. It might have been feared that his inveterate suspicion of British bribery would have been insurmountable; but the prospect of danger to his candidature overcame his scruples. Mr. GREELEY now consents to leave the question of taxes on imports to be determined by the wisdom of the people in their Congressional districts; or, in other words, he remains neutral on the issue which he has hitherto maintained with unwavering arrogance of assertion. The Cincinnati platform or syllabus, while it is clear and definite on every undisputed question, leaves the economic controversy untouched. It is thought, perhaps on sufficient grounds, that all sections of the opponents of General GRANT will be equally ready to waive their various convictions.

The Philadelphia Convention of the regular Republican party came together already pledged to support General GRANT. A large majority of the most corrupt politicians in the United States, including the most experienced managers of elections, had previously secured the local constituencies and their delegates. Civil Service reform has been uniformly discouraged by Mr. GREELEY; but it was known that many of the seceders were bent on attacking the stronghold of political corruption. The CAMERONS and FORNETS have rallied round the standard of General GRANT, who has, probably through inexperience, uniformly prostituted his patronage to political purposes. Mr. WILSON was nominated as the Vice-President on the first ballot; and it only remained to publish a declaration of principles which may with one exception compare in unmeaning vagueness with the Cincinnati platform. The GRANT Republicans have determined, on a calculation of chances, to identify themselves with the advocates of Protection, and they will therefore receive the support of the Philadelphia iron-masters, and of the majority of the manufacturers of New England. It can hardly be denied that, as a successful soldier, General GRANT is with all his faults a more presentable candidate than Mr. GREELEY. A general who has won several pitched battles, and who has commanded enormous armies, can never be despised as an insignificant person. On the other hand, General GRANT has been one of the least capable administrators among Presidents of the United States, and he has been unfortunate in his cousins and brothers-in-law, who have all been appointed to office, and many of whom have been connected with questionable pecuniary transactions. The admiration of military eminence which is common to all nations prevails widely in the United States; and yet General GRANT has long ceased to be an object of general enthusiasm. The managers who undertake his re-election, while they naturally make the most of his former exploits, rely largely on the holders of office, who have been systematically selected because they were supposed capable of making themselves useful in the Presidential contest. The expectants of promotion probably incline to the same side, though some of them may think that there is a better opening for those who follow the fortunes of Mr. GREELEY.

At the election of 1868 the Democratic party commanded two-thirds of the votes. The Republicans have since been weakened both by the accomplishment of the process of reconstruction and by their own internal dissensions. The partial removal of disabilities, and the entrance of a younger generation into political life, have increased the number of white electors in the Southern States; and it may be assumed that they are unanimously hostile to General GRANT. The scandalous malversation which has been practised in the Southern States by Republican adventurers who derived their power from the votes of the negroes has additionally discredited the Republican party; but it seems to be thought that the Democrats are not strong enough to carry the election, although they may perhaps decide the struggle between GREELEY and GRANT. The imperfect representation of the minority has secured to the Republicans the absolute control both of the Senate and of the House of Representatives; and a Democratic President would find himself embarrassed, like Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON, by the hostility of Congress. It is in preparation for the struggle, or, as it is called in America, the campaign, that both Houses are in a hurry to adjourn. From June to November the whole country will be alive with rumours, with appeals to opinion, with public meetings, and with fervid orations. The gravest and most conscientious politicians will be the least active, as it is impossible that they should sympathize with either or any of the candidates. The popular excitement, though noisy and incessant, is after all superficial. The indifference of the ordinary American to the qualifications of candidates for office is in some degree founded on an enviable confidence in the institutions and the destiny of the United States. The rapid advance of corruption has not yet visibly impaired the material prosperity of a country which, happily for itself, requires little interference on the part of the Government. Notwithstanding perverse tariffs, domestic industry flourishes in a region which is wide enough to be a world of itself. A majority of the population regards GRANT and GREELEY with the same kind of interest which is felt by a large class in England in the favourite runners for the Derby or the Ascot Cup. Mr. GREELEY's success would create amusement, and his failure will not occasion serious disappointment. It is patriotic to rely on the luck which, by an entirely undesigned coincidence, made the election of Mr. LINCOLN happen at the very outbreak of the Civil War. Mr. ANDREW JOHNSON was chosen as Vice-President because he had been a journeyman tailor, and it never occurred to his supporters that attention ought to be paid to the qualifications of a functionary who is only separated from supreme power by a single life. The first election of General GRANT was the inevitable consequence of his military achievements; the second will indicate a relapse into traditional indifference. The gradual and uninterrupted decline of political character and ability in America from Colonial times to the present day results not from actual degeneracy, but from the growth of a democratic aversion to personal or social pre-eminence. As long as the national vigour is not impaired, the mischief is not irreparable; yet the descent from PERICLES to HYPERBOLUS, or from WASHINGTON to BUTLER, is an unpleasant subject of contemplation.

THE LORDS AND THE BALLOT.

THE Conservative majority in the Lords were in a position of great difficulty when the Ballot Bill came on for discussion on Monday night. Most of them entirely agreed with Lord CARNARVON that "the Bill is a crude and ill-digested measure, full of snares and pitfalls, and likely to be fruitful of failure." But then this Bill, bad as they think it, has come up from the House of Commons after having been passed by considerable majorities, and after the Lords had last year refused to consider it on the very proper ground that it came to them too late for any real discussion. Under such circumstances are the Peers constitutionally free to weigh the Bill solely on its merits, and to reject it if they dislike it? The Duke of RICHMOND thought that they were not free. They might show in debate that the Bill was uncalled for, un-English, and prejudicial to the interests of the nation, but they must allow it to be read a second time. Then would come their hour, and they might kill it by carefully devised amendments. The Duke of RICHMOND's lead was followed, although with evident reluctance, by Lord CARNARVON and Lord CAMERON, who spoke with the greatest vehemence against the Bill, and then left the House before a division was taken. Lord SALISBURY took the opposite line. He held that the Lords were at perfect liberty to reject the Bill, and that if it was to be rejected, the straightforward and creditable course was to reject it openly, and not to trust to taking all the virtue out of it by amendments. On the latter head Lord SALISBURY seems to us indisputably right. This method of trying to kill a Bill by amendments, after its principle has been accepted in deference to the wishes of the Commons, has two great disadvantages. It is very undignified, and it is almost certain to fail. If the Lords cannot resist the will of the Commons in June, they are not at all likely to be able to do so in August, and if the Commons are firm in August, any destructive amendments of the Lords are sure to disappear. It is true that there may be exceptional cases. A Ministry which is fairly strong in June may be very weak in August, or may have disappeared by that time. It is impossible to pronounce as yet whether the present Government will survive the criticism of their proceedings under the Washington Treaty; and if they went out of office, the Lords would at once have got rid of the Ballot Bill, and have earned the credit of not having been obstructive and reactionary when it came on for the second reading. But, as a rule, it is a mistake for the Lords to give way on a second reading and then try to kill a Bill by amendments; for they transfer the settling of the real point at issue from a moment when they have considerable power to a moment when they have scarcely any power at all, and they lay themselves open to the charge that they are trying to do indirectly what they dare not do directly.

Whether the Conservative leaders in the Lords were right in permitting the Bill to be read a second time is partly a question of principle and partly a question of prudence. There are occasions when the Lords ought to allow measures of which they strongly disapprove to become law, for the simple reason that if the nation wants the measures carried, there is no other mode of getting them carried. Lord SALISBURY would agree to this, but then how are the peers to know what the wishes of the nation are? Prima facie the wishes of the nation ought to be gathered from the deliberate and repeated votes of the House of Commons sanctioning the proposals of the Executive Government. Unless the measure is a Government measure, the Lords know that the House of Commons, and those whom it represents, consider it a matter of very small importance. But if it is a Government measure, then the weight of the authority of the Commons as representing the nation ought not, we think, to be lessened, except under very unusual circumstances, by the fact that the issue was not prominently presented to the consideration of the constituencies at the last general election. There are other and better modes of ascertaining whether the action of the House of Commons is approved by the constituencies. There are plenty of ways in which constituencies can let their members know their wishes; and while an important Bill was passing through the House of Commons, the constituencies, if they thought their members were misrepresenting them, would be sure to let their opinions be known. The elections, too, which take place from time to time offer another means of estimating what the wishes of the nation are. With regard to the Ballot, it must be owned that the Bill has now passed the House of Commons twice without the constituencies having given the slightest sign that they are misrepresented in the matter, while in all recent elections the successful candidates have been either supporters of the Ballot or silent about it. Under these circumstances the Duke of RICHMOND was probably right in thinking that the Lords ought to yield; and that prudence counselled the same course is too obvious to need any proof. Lord SALISBURY took the bolder line, but then he was aware that he was incurring no responsibility by doing so. He knew that the second reading was going to be carried, and he was therefore free to oppose it with all his strength.

It was not to be supposed that the Lords could urge any new arguments for or against the Ballot. The experience of the Australian colonies was once more quoted for the Ballot, and that of the United States against it. But it has long been discovered that the experience of other countries cannot decide whether we ought to introduce the Ballot here. No one bribes in Australia under the Ballot, but that is probably not so much because of the Ballot as because no one thinks enough of getting into a Colonial House of Assembly to put for the honour. As in England there are hundreds of men who would any day pay thousands of pounds to get into Parliament, there is no parallel between the cases of the mother-country and her colonies. In New York, and in a minor degree in other States of the Union, there is a considerable amount of intimidation, perjury, and fraudulent manipulation of the ballot-box. But England is not like New York, nor indeed are most of the States of the Union. We know that a speculator in New York State can keep a tame Judge of his own, and in a state of society where such a thing is possible the Ballot may utterly fail without the failure being any argument against it in a country like England. Lord GREY, who moved the rejection of the Bill, had scarcely anything to say except that the Ballot was the beginning of further changes in the Constitution. Not that he disapproved in so many words of further constitutional changes, but he thought that they ought to be all made at once. Lord SHAFTESBURY took a high line against the immorality of the Bill. He was prepared to see the Church, the Lords, and even the Throne vanish into space, and the ruins of those institutions would still find the just man fearless; but he was not prepared to look with indifference on the utter demoralization of a whole nation, which must, he thought, be the result of the Ballot. Having thus delivered his testimony, he went away and did not think it worth while to vote against this fatal measure. The Ballot Bill certainly has one most extraordinary feature about it, and that is, that it is almost impossible to tell whether any one who patronizes or denounces it means what he says. One line of argument, however, was opened by Lord SALISBURY which possesses increased interest in proportion as the prospect of the measure becoming law grows more distinct. Let us suppose that the Bill does all that it pretends to do—that it is found workable, leaves bribery as it is, discourages intimidation, and does not much encourage personation, what will be its more indirect effects? What will be its consequences in Ireland? Will it lead to a large and growing abstention from voting in all constituencies of some considerable size? We fear that the prospect in these directions is very cheerless, and that the tyranny of Irish priests, and the reluctance of quiet people to mix themselves up in politics, will be considerably increased by the Bill.

The amendments which the Duke of RICHMOND intends to propose in Committee are to embody schemes for making a scrutiny possible, and for making the Ballot optional. There always may be, and possibly is, a great deal of personation in every large constituency, and it is generally effected with perfect impunity, and with some successful influence on the result. But if on a petition a scrutiny is asked for, the vote can now be struck off which the personator has given. Under the Ballot Bill a vote can only be struck off if it can be proved that the candidate or his agents abetted the personation. Personation, therefore, is more likely, it is said, to prevail under the Ballot because it is more likely to prosper. The Duke of RICHMOND accordingly proposes that the votes shall be given in such a manner that it can be known how each man has voted if there is a petition. There are two objections to this which we wait to see how the Duke surmounts. Every voter will be aware that if a petition is brought his vote will be known, and as it is in keenly contested constituencies that petitions are most frequently brought, the voter would feel that his vote would be made more likely to be known by the very existence of the bribery and intimidation from the pressure of which he was anxious to escape. In the next place, there is a very great mechanical difficulty in inventing any mode of voting by which the vote shall hereafter be capable of being made known, without letting the agents know at the time of voting how the vote has been given. This is only a mechanical difficulty, but it is a very formidable one, as it has been decided that the voting-papers after the poll is closed shall be inspected by the presiding officer in presence of the agents. The second amendment of the Duke of RICHMOND is certainly most efficacious for its purpose. If the Ballot is made optional, all the harm and all the good of it will be gone. The man who is bribed will earn his money by showing how he votes; the man who is intimidated will be intimidated out of using the Ballot. There are people indeed whom an optional Ballot might suit—timid men who are not bribed, and who are not exactly intimidated, but who would like to vote without giving offence. At present these people generally escape their difficulties by not voting at all, and certainly they cannot be said to deserve that the cumbrous machinery of the Ballot shall be introduced for their special advantage. Unless the Ballot does whatever it can be made to do towards the prevention of bribery and intimidation, it cannot be worth adopting; and if it is optional, it can do little or nothing at all.

COMPULSORY SERVICE IN FRANCE

THE debate on the 37th clause of the French Army Bill—the clause which fixes the term of service in the active army at five years for one part of the yearly contingent and at a period varying from six months to a year for the remainder—is full of interest both for soldiers and for civilians. The two sides of the question have been admirably argued by General TROCHU and M. THIERS. According to General TROCHU the first thing to be done is to make military service really universal. In war quantity is now of more importance than quality. Of course there is a certain minimum of knowledge and practice without which a man is not properly a soldier at all. But when this is secured a large number of fairly trained troops is better than a small number of veterans. The practical conclusion from this reasoning is that the whole of the yearly contingent should serve for the same time, and that the time should be as short as is consistent with making the men soldiers. This limit, as fixed by General TROCHU, is three years—to be reduced, as the new system comes thoroughly into play, to two years. According to M. THIERS the first thing to be done is to make the army thoroughly effective. Quality is still of more value than quantity. A few thoroughly good soldiers are better than a much larger number of ordinary troops. The conclusion which M. THIERS would like to draw from these premises is that the term of service should be at least eight years. But in deference to the Committee which has charge of the Bill he has reduced this term to five years. It is admitted on all hands that it is impossible to make the whole population serve for five years, so that a division of the contingent becomes inevitable. The part that remains five years with the colours will constitute the real army; the rest will form a reserve, out of which the real army may be recruited with the smallest possible outlay of time and trouble.

In this controversy everything turns in the first instance on the precise length of service which is necessary to ensure an army of the proper quality. If five years is the shortest time which can be trusted to produce this result, the five years must somehow be found; and if it is impossible to find them for the whole population, they must be found for a part of it. Upon this point the balance of professional opinion in France seems to be against General TROCHU, and so long as this is the case civilians will always have an excuse for preferring the view which is most favoured by experts. If it could be proved that the shorter period proposed by General TROCHU is sufficient for this object, the system of an equal length of service for the whole contingent would have a decided advantage over the compromise proposed by the Committee and accepted by M. THIERS. No doubt the burden of compulsory service for two years would be extremely heavy. But it would be greatly lessened by the fact of its being imposed upon all alike. It would be so much taken out of every man's career; but this very universality, while it makes it more serious in imagination, makes it less serious in fact. No man is placed at a disadvantage by having to spend two of his best years in camp, because the same necessity is laid upon all his rivals in the business of life. In this respect the plan is decidedly superior to a plan which makes professional soldiers of one half of the yearly contingent, and relegates the other half, after a scarcely perceptible interval, to the practice of their trades or professions. There is no equality between the lot of two men entering the army at twenty, and leaving it in the one case at twenty-one, and in the other at twenty-five. The four years which have been taken from the one and left to the other may be an irretrievable injury to the former. Thus the real weakness of the French Army Bill as shaped by the Committee and M. THIERS lies not so much in its treatment of that part of the contingent which is sent home at the end of the year as in its treatment of the part which has to remain with the colours. As regards the former, it is true that a stay of twelve, or perhaps only six, months in camp will not have made them soldiers. But it will have made them acquainted with the rudiments of military training. With proper provision as to occasional drills they ought to be as good as the average of English Volunteer regiments, with the additional advantage of having a known place in the regular army and some experience of military discipline. Considering that this description will in no very long time apply to the whole adult male population, the opponents of the scheme seem fairly open to the charge of underrating the military benefits which the Army Bill will confer on France. When we turn to the other half of the contingent, the picture is less encouraging. In name, they are only giving their country that personal service which also demands from all her sons. In fact, they are giving her that personal service which she demands from some of her sons and excuses from others. In whatever way the distinguishing line is drawn, those who are on the wrong side of it will envy those who are on the right side. If it is made a matter of arrangement, and young men belonging to the half which is to be sent home are allowed to exchange with young men belonging to the half which is to remain with the colours, a door is virtually opened to the revival of substitutes. If the selection is vested in the Minister, there will be much actual and more presumed favouritism. If it is left to chance, the distinction between lucky and unlucky numbers will be maintained, and, instead of feeling that they are sharing the common lot of all their neighbours, the conscripts will think themselves the victims of exceptional ill-fortune.

The Assembly, if left to itself, would perhaps have voted for General Trochu's amendment. Universal personal service is the popular cry just now in France, and it was obvious that the term of three years imposed upon all without distinction is a much more thoroughgoing mode of bringing this principle to bear than a system which allots five years to some and six months to others. But it was known that the Government and the Committee had with much difficulty found a common point upon which they could agree, and the Committee so far represents the majority that the latter were not likely to repudiate their acts. General Trochu was defeated by a majority of 134. The next day the conflict was renewed on an amendment of General CHARLTON's, proposing to substitute four years' service for the five years proposed by the Committee. There seems no ground for supposing that this motion would have met with any better fate than its predecessor. M. THIERS had insisted on five years as the very shortest term which he could accept, and it was not likely that, after rejecting three years for political reasons, the Assembly would suddenly put politics aside, and accept four years for purely military reasons. Indeed even on this last ground there was much less to be said for General CHARLTON's proposal than for General Trochu's. The former did not aim at making the term of service the same for the whole contingent, and consequently it did not differ in principle from the compromise recommended by the Committee. M. THIERS thought fit, however, to oppose the greater resistance to the lesser amendment. He argued against General Trochu; he met General CHARLTON by a simple menace of resignation. He was responsible, he said, for the safety of France, and the greater his responsibility the greater should be his freedom of action. If the Assembly did not vote for the five years' term, the law would have to be carried out by some one else. By a curious confusion of thought he justified this determination by a reference to his conduct as Minister under Louis PHILIPPE. He had resisted a respected and beloved King, and told him frankly that he must not follow this or that policy. M. THIERS has apparently forgotten that he now holds a constitutional position which bears a much closer resemblance to that of the King who was opposed by the Minister than to that of the Minister who opposed the King. In the peculiar circumstances of the country he may have good grounds for going beyond the province technically assigned to the President of the Republic. But there is nothing gained by making the Assembly feel that, by whatever name M. THIERS may be called, his attributes are those of a Dictator. In fact, there is a great deal lost, because the habit of submitting to Dictators has already far too strong a hold on the French people, and the true policy of a patriotic statesman would be to accustom them to the idea of self-government, even while he was in fact taking the most part in governing them. As yet the threat of resignation seems to have lost none of its force. General CHARLTON's amendment was rejected by a majority of 421. Perhaps M. THIERS may regard this as a final vindication of his hold over the Assembly, and may abstain for the future from a game which, in spite of appearances, must tend to become more dangerous the oftener it is tried. M. THIERS may dare the Assembly to do without him once too often. It is certainly true that no one has yet superseded him either in the Chamber or in the country; but it is also true that new men are coming by degrees to the front, and that the position of the Assembly, if it were suddenly left without M. THIERS, would no longer be one of hopeless desolation.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE AMNESTY AGITATORS.

SOME of the Irish members who presented a memorial to Mr. GLADSTONE for the release of the Fenian prisoners will probably acquiesce with fortitude in the unsuccessful result of their application. Gentlemen of the class to which Sir ROWLAND BLANNERHASSET belongs, although they may think it their duty to forward the wishes of their constituents, are not likely to confuse the crimes of the accomplices in the Manchester murder, or of soldiers who have been false to their oath and their colours, with the offences which are ordinarily regarded as political. The worshippers of the Manchester martyrs and the friends of their surviving associates have no better argument to urge in favour of the heroes whom they admire than that they were engaged in a lawful war with the enemies of their country. It would be useless to urge on an Irish rabble the consideration that the violent rescue of prisoners in a peaceable country has nothing whatever to do with belligerent rights and privileges. The people who put the Manchester policeman to death for discharging his simple duty had, a moment before the commission of the outrage, enjoyed the full benefit and protection of the laws which they proceeded to violate. Even if the right of private and individual war had been recognized by any civilized community, the Manchester criminals neither issued a defiance to the QUEEN nor gave formal notice that at their own risk they were prepared to shoot her officers. The only excuse for making a distinction between political offences and ordinary violations of the law is that the moral guilt of resistance to established Governments varies through a wide range from the verge of moral virtue down to vulgar crime. The casuists who have at different times paradoxically excused tyrannicide have never extended the license of slaughter to hitoricide or the murder of plain policemen. It might have been thought that even the perversity of Irish faction would acknowledge the justice of the sentence passed on the murderers, and would abstain from insisting that the Government should allow the accessories to escape with impunity. It has also been taken for granted elsewhere that military allegiance is exceptionally sacred, and that a soldier convicted of treason or of desertion to the enemy is treated with exceptional leniency if he escapes capital punishment. The advocates of amnesty include among their number many avowed enemies of English rule, as well as a certain proportion of Liberal members who profess to think the exercise of mercy desirable. Mr. GLADSTONE's answer will be received with general satisfaction, although he is unable to make up his mind whether there are two or three Manchester prisoners. On either assumption the Government has resolved that the two or the three shall undergo the remainder of their sentence; and it was impossible that the delinquent soldiers should be liberated, with the direct result of encouraging the relaxation of all military discipline. For the comments which his answer could not fail to produce in Ireland Mr. GLADSTONE is probably prepared. It is consolatory to reflect that Irish astonishment and indignation are often less strongly felt than expressed.

The first release of Fenian prisoners was perhaps an act of prudence. Two or three of their number were native or naturalized citizens of the United States; and although at that time the English law allowed of no transfer of allegiance, it was known that the American Government, which was on other grounds unfriendly to England, was disposed to claim the right of protecting its foreign citizens. As far as the crimes of the prisoners had been committed within the United Kingdom, it would have been immaterial to inquire whether the perpetrators were English subjects or aliens, except for the obsolete arrangement by which foreigners were entitled to be tried by a jury chosen de medietate lingue; but some parts of the evidence referred to conspiracies organized in New York; and it was possible to raise a legal question on the liability of a foreign offender to punishment for acts committed in his own country. To avoid a possible collision with American claims, it was thought expedient to release some of the alien Fenians; and the Irish offenders who came within the same category of crime were simultaneously pardoned. It would perhaps have been more judicious to abstain, at least for a considerable time, from any further display of leniency. O'DONOVAN ROSSA, who is the best known of the Fenian criminals, had in prison behaved with brutal violence to the authorities of the gaol. The assaults which he committed would have fully justified the infliction of that corporal punishment which is required in the last resort for the maintenance of prison discipline. With still better reason it ought to have precluded him from all chance of obtaining an early remission of his sentence; but leniency to defeated enemies is generally popular in England, and the Government was at the time unusually anxious to disarm Irish disaffection. The principal ringleaders, before they sailed for the United States, delivered impudently treasonable speeches at Cork; and, as might have been expected, they immediately allied themselves with the American faction which professes as its main principle implacable animosity to England. During the late diplomatic controversy O'DONOVAN ROSSA has expressed his hope that he may land with an American army in Ireland, where it is scarcely too much to say that he and demagogues of his kind would be welcome to the friends of order, if only they would once move place themselves within reach of English justice. The excessive clemency of Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues was regarded with little favour; but the supposed removal of a pretext for agitation caused a certain sense of relief. It was for the moment forgotten that, as long as any rebellious patriot was undergoing punishment for any kind of crime, the clamour which is its own principal object was not likely to subside. There is still an Amnesty Association devoted to the interests of the criminals, who are justly thought to be rebels as well as violators of the ordinary law; and it has been powerful enough to induce Sir ROWLAND BLANCHERHASSSET and other respectable members to present its demands to Mr. GLADSTONE. It is unnecessary to remark that care for the interests of the prisoners forms no part of the motives for the agitation which is nominally prosecuted on their behalf. The sincere promoters of the movement only hope to ascertain their own power of intimidating the English Government, and to secure contingent impunity for themselves and their friends if they should hereafter chance to incur similar penalties.

It is perhaps by way of revenge for Mr. GLADSTONE's refusal that some of the friends of the Manchester prisoners have committed a childish and malignant outrage on one or two public monuments in Dublin. The statue erected to Lord CARLISLE has been destroyed or defaced; and a similar attempt has been made in another part of the city. There is too much reason to fear that the criminals will escape without punishment, though, if they could be discovered and convicted, they could hardly profit by the plea that they also, like their Manchester prototypes, were carrying on legitimate warfare. Lord CARLISLE, though he was not a great statesman or administrator, scarcely deserved the treatment which his statue has received. In his earlier life he ardently supported, as Irish Secretary, the demands of the popular party, and during his long Viceroyalty he devoted himself, rather from kindness of heart than for any selfish reason, to the cultivation of popularity in Ireland. It was right and natural that his memory should be commemorated by the erection of a statue which might in course of time have been valued as an historical monument. The ruffians who have defaced the statue probably thought that they were insulting the English nation or the Government by an outrage on the effigy of a Lord-Lieutenant. With such perversity it is hopeless to reason.

It can scarcely be urged as a ground for extraordinary leniency to assassins or mutineers that the condition of Ireland is unsatisfactory. The country is indeed rapidly advancing in material prosperity, but seditious newspapers and lay and clerical agitators take care that disaffection shall never subside. Although Mr. Justice KEON's judgment in the Galway case was expressed without regard either to good taste or to prudence, even the clergy who, under the inspiration of Cardinal Cullen, protested against his language, abstained from disputing the statements which he founded on the evidence in the case. The full Court, although it was divided on the question whether Captain TRENCH was entitled to the seat, agreed in the opinion that the clergy with their accomplices had been guilty of gross interference with the freedom of election. There can be little doubt that the priests are jealous of their lay rivals in violence, and that in the Galway contest it was their principal object to prove that their influence was indispensable to the success of their candidate. Whatever may have been their motive, it is unsatisfactory that elections should be determined by the use of shameless violence and intimidation. In all probability the inculpated prelates and priests will escape with impunity; nor indeed is it desirable to furnish a pretext for a charge of religious persecution. When convictions have been obtained for undoubted crimes, it is in every way expedient to prove that there are limits which it is unsafe to transgress.

MR. DISRAELI AT THE NATIONAL SOCIETY.

MR. DISRAELI has been making an exceedingly clever speech at the annual meeting of the National Society. There was not a word about politics in it from beginning to end, and yet its scope and intention were thoroughly political. The impression left by it was that the cause of religious education had received a great blow by the passing of the Elementary Education Act. There was no need to say that this blow had come from a Liberal Government, or to draw the moral that the clergy ought to bestir themselves at the next general election. Fact and inference were alike too obvious to need pointing out. All that Mr. DISRAELI had to do was to present the recent educational history of the country in a draped and modified form. A little exaggeration of the religious element in the system which the Education Act superseded, a little depreciation of the religious element in the system which the Education Act established, and the work was done. To both these demands on his ingenuity Mr. DISRAELI showed himself thoroughly equal. His picture of the State spending long years in "encouraging, stimulating, organizing, and at length establishing a system of national education" in which religion was allowed its proper place; and the companion picture of the same State, "wearied with its difficulties, or unable to battle with them," abdicating one of its highest functions, and relinquishing for the future all care for religious education, are compositions of real merit. They are pure creations of imagination; but how few imaginations there are that can create just what their possessors want at the moment! This perhaps is the most remarkable characteristic of Mr. DISRAELI's fancies. They are all fancies with a purpose, but they are singularly free from the laboured unreality which so often makes such efforts valueless. Probably nine-tenths of the clergy who listened to him on Tuesday were persuaded that there had been a time in which England had been in the happy state in which the Conservatives wish to keep Scotland—a time in which the Catechism of the Established Church had been taught of necessity in every elementary school in the kingdom. They are not likely to verify Mr. DISRAELI's statements when they get home, or they would remember that, before the passing of the Act of 1870, the State made no provision for education, religious or irreligious. It simply helped private persons to make provision for education. Wherever local individual energy was ready to begin the work, there the State was willing to give aid in certain proportions and on certain conditions. This is all that the State before 1870 did in encouraging, stimulating, organizing, and establishing national education. And this it does still, only in a somewhat larger measure. Wherever local individual energy will found a school, there, supposing that a school is really wanted, the State will help to support it. Mr. DISRAELI speaks as though there were a class of schools founded and maintained by the State, in which religion was formerly taught, and from which religion is now excluded. It is not necessary to inquire whether this change is accurately described, for the simple reason that it never took place. Until the Act of 1870 became law there were no State schools. And since that time State schools have only been set up in districts where school accommodation is deficient. If the Church of England is as energetic as Mr. DISRAELI exhorts her to be, these districts will be few in number. The main difference between the system of elementary education now in force and that which was in force before 1870 is that the one left everything to voluntary agency, and did nothing to supplement it even where it had been shown to be a failure, while the other leaves voluntary agency as free as ever, but warns it that it can only have the field to itself on condition of undertaking to fill it.

Mr. DISRAELI's advice to the National Society is sound and sensible so far as it goes. He assumes that the Church of England will continue to devote herself to instructing the children of the poor in reading, writing, and arithmetic, as the only means of securing an opportunity of instructing them in religion. With this view he urges that existing Church schools shall be maintained, that new Church schools shall be planted and established in every part of England, that the diocesan inspection of Church schools shall be made thoroughly complete, and that Church Training Colleges shall be strengthened and sustained. If this advice is carefully followed out, Mr. DISRAELI's prophecy that the meeting of Tuesday "will be the commencement of a movement that will give a new colour and life to the great question of national education" stands a good chance of being fulfilled. But there is another aspect of the question which cannot but present itself to some of those who wish well to religious education. The plan of a campaign which Mr.

DISRAELI has sketched is one that will require a very large outlay of time, money, and labour. Hitherto the whole educational energy of the nation has been virtually at the disposal of the managers of voluntary schools. A man who wished the children of the poor to receive secular instruction had no choice, in the great majority of cases, but to contribute to the support of schools in which they would receive religious instruction into the bargain. For the future this necessity will not be laid on him to anything like the same extent. He will in many instances have already paid his school rate, and when he is asked in addition to subscribe to a voluntary school, he will very probably answer that, as the State is ready to do everything that voluntary schools leave undone, he sees no reason for relieving the State of the burden. The persons who care for definite religious instruction will go on contributing to the schools in which it is given. The persons who only care for secular instruction will now be content with contributing—as they must do whether they like it or not—to the schools in which secular instruction is given. Consequently, the managers of Church schools will have to trust much more than formerly to the aid of those who thoroughly sympathize with the object for which Church schools are kept in being. The general public will be apt to plead the payment of the school rate as a receipt in full for all demands on its educational enthusiasm. So long as in many parts of the country there were no other schools in existence, and no means of calling other schools into existence supposing that these were closed for want of funds, the friends of Church schools had excellent reason for making charitable requisitions on their whole acquaintance. The effect of educational rating will be greatly to narrow the area over which these voluntary aids can be levied, and to make the burden of supporting Church schools press with increased weight on a small number of persons.

It seems more than probable that, when this new state of things comes to be clearly realized, the friends of religious education will be led to ask themselves whether the energy which they expend upon the maintenance of separate Church schools might not be made to produce a larger result if employed in another direction. At present, in a Church school in receipt of Government aid the managers are allowed to give religious instruction only to the children whose parents are willing that they should receive it, and even to them only at the beginning and end of the school work. This permission is all that they get in return for the heavy expense of keeping up the school. It can hardly fail to occur to some of them that, under a secular system, conceived in a just and liberal spirit, they would get a similar permission for a very much smaller consideration. Supposing that, instead of keeping up a school of their own, and giving religious instruction to the children who liked to come for an hour every morning or evening, they contented themselves with using a school maintained by the local School Board, and there giving the same instruction to the same children at the same hours, what would be the difference as regards the amount and value of the religious knowledge imparted? The difference to the persons responsible for imparting it would be immeasurable. Instead of having to keep the whole machinery of a school in working order, they would simply have to keep in order the machinery for supplying the religious lessons. We shall not undertake to say how the question thus raised will eventually be answered. It is enough to point out that it is almost certain to be asked some day, and that, before resigning themselves unreservedly to Mr. DISRAELI's guidance, the clergy may do well to consider the new view of their position which it opens up.

THE LICENSING BILL.

AN interesting discussion arose last week on a proposal of the Duke of RICHMOND to bring all retailers of spirits under the same degree of legislative control as is imposed on publicans. The thoroughgoing advocates of restraint have long since proclaimed the necessity of applying it to the grocer, but there is no probability that Parliament will look at the matter from their point of view. The Bishop of PETERBOROUGH, who on a former occasion shed upon the subject of licensing the much-needed light of common sense, has again done good service by pointing out the important distinction between legislating against private vice and against public disorder. The law, he says, has no right to interfere with a man who chooses to commit the sin of drunkenness in his own house, though it has a right to punish a man who parades his drunkenness in the public streets. The case of the grocer who sells his wares in closed bottles, to be taken away, is not on a par with that of the licensed victualler or beerhouse-keeper who sells liquor for consumption in his own house, where disturbances often arise in consequence. This explanation of the principle on which legislation ought to proceed is not wholly satisfactory, but perhaps no better explanation could be given. If fanatics were not impervious to reason, they might know that the House of Lords declines to interfere with grocers because it is impossible to introduce a violent restriction upon the habits of large classes of society. It will continue to be possible for drunkards to avail themselves of the facilities which shops for the sale of wine and spirits by retail afford to sober people. It may perhaps be useful to mention that the grocer of whom we hear so much derives his origin from the Act of 1860, by which every person keeping a shop for the sale of goods was enabled to take out a licence to sell by retail foreign wine, not to be consumed on the premises. There is nothing in the Act to prevent a butcher from selling claret and sherry, but practically the new trade thus opened fell into the hands of those who deal in what are commonly called groceries. The success which attended the experiment encouraged an extension of it, and many grocers took out, in addition to the retail wine licence under the Act of 1860, the licences which were usually taken out by dealers in wine and spirits before that Act. The result has been that dealing in wine and spirits is not carried on as a distinct business to the same extent as formerly. We believe that many grocers hold all the licences that the law allows them to take out, and thus they are able to supply a customer with a single bottle of gin, which he may keep in his house or apartment for his solace during the hours when the public-house is closed. After the discussion in the House of Lords it appears safe to assume that this part of the existing trade in liquor, however liable to abuse, cannot be interfered with. The amendment which the Duke of RICHMOND brought forward and afterwards withdrew did not propose to interfere with the sale of wine by retail under the Act of 1860. If, however, a grocer had obtained, as many have, all the licences which are necessary for dealing both wholesale and retail in wine and spirits, then the amendment would have prohibited him from selling spirits by retail unless he procured a magistrate's certificate authorising such sale. The holder of such certificate would be placed, as regards hours of closing and police supervision, upon the same footing as the publican. But as this proposal was rejected, the sale of spirits by retail by grocers will be absolutely unrestrained. It appears from a report of a speech by Lord KIMBERLEY, that he contemplated an attempt at partial restriction; but the last edition of the Bill shows that this purpose, if ever entertained, was abandoned. We thus arrive at the remarkable result that the sale of spirits by retail will be more free than the sale of beer. It would not be possible to allow the same house to be open at different hours for the sale of beer on and off the premises, and it is agreed that there must be some restriction as to the former which must apply also to the latter. It has been alleged that the grocers are special favourites of Government because they have largely assisted in introducing to the public cheap French wines; but they have certainly introduced at the same time large quantities of spirits which are perhaps intended as a corrective of the acidity of what is called GLADSTONE'S Claret. Any Government which attempted to interfere with this trade would be involved in formidable difficulties. To limit the number of grocers' shops would be to create a new form of monopoly which perhaps would hereafter insist on compensation. We cannot help feeling, however, that when grocers are left free, it is difficult to be severely restrictive on publicans.

The discussion between the brewers and Lord KIMBERLEY turned principally on the degree in which the owner of a public-house is to be made responsible for the misconduct of the occupier. As the Bill now stands, a third conviction of the occupier may have the effect of disqualifying the house for two years. But the Court having cognizance of the case will have discretion as to inflicting this penalty. The brewers will probably do wisely if they accept this provision as it stands, and, at any rate, owners may reasonably be required to do their utmost to ensure regularity in the conduct of occupiers. As regards the hours of closing there is much force in Lord SALISBURY's complaint that Hertfordshire is to be put to inconvenience because the morality of Manchester is not proof against the seduction of public-houses after 11 P.M. Among the various deputations to Lord KIMBERLEY has been one of "real working-men," who appear to be afflicted with a lamentable delicacy of moral constitution. It is not easily intelligible that a sober and industrious father of a family cannot resist the temptation of entering a public-house. We are told that this deputation comprised representatives of various trades, and it is certainly wonderful that they should all agree in describing themselves as such exceedingly poor creatures. We never hear from the middle and upper classes of society any similar avowal of the utter want of the power of self-control, and if such a picture of the artisans of London were drawn by any hand but that of a "real working-man" we should expect that vehement displeasure would be excited by it. It must have been a severe trial to Lord KIMBERLEY to listen with becoming gravity to the oration of Mr. JOSEPH LEICESTER, who assured his Lordship that it is "the divinity within" the working-man that demands the early closing of public-houses. If we correctly gather the speaker's meaning, it is this—that a man's appetite impels him to partake of an indulgence which his moral sense demands should be placed beyond his reach. When a man is alone he will take to drinking beer, but get him to a public meeting and he will sign a petition for closing beer-houses. It seems to us that "real working-men" are like those extremely troublesome people who wish to close all windows because they are afraid of catching cold. Of all forms of cant perhaps this which Mr. LEICESTER and his companions have invented is the most despicable. There seems no reason why drinking should be the only vice against which special legislative precaution is to be demanded. Suppose that it were suggested that the streets of London at night are in a condition dangerous to virtue. It would be pleasant to hear a deputation representing to Mr. BRUCE that "the divinity within" the speakers could not keep them out of certain places of which humanity therefore demanded the abolition. The "real," or, as we might prefer to say, the ideal working-man "looks to his home, to his family, and to those associations which make his home a glory," and he demands the suppression of public-houses. It is wonderful that he should not be capable of this exalted contemplation before instead of after entering a public-house. But perhaps his home becomes a glory only when he is himself what is sometimes called "glorious." It might be expected that an uncompromising zealot like Mr. LEICESTER would not spare the grocers. He demands that all licences for the sale of spirituous liquors should be withheld from them.

The Bill has passed the House of Lords and the grocers have survived the combined attack of the Duke of RICHMOND and Mr. LEICESTER. Details may still be advantageously reconsidered; but we doubt whether any alteration of principle is likely to be made in the Bill in the House of Commons. Brewers and other owners of public-houses will do well to accept without further contest the burden of closely supervising the conduct of occupiers. Parliament cannot stop, and will hardly be induced to attempt to check, the liquor traffic; but it can and will insist that it shall be carefully regulated. This indeed appears to be the chief practical result of the Bill as it now stands. We cannot place ourselves in the mental condition of those persons who fancy that the moral character of the population of London depends upon the question whether the public-houses are closed at 11 or 12 P.M.; and we think that the distressed clients of Mr. LEICESTER might try to fortify themselves against temptation by the ordinary safeguards of religion and morality. We do not know whether they profess what is ordinarily called Christianity, but if they have abolished it, they can hardly demand to have a substitute provided by legislation. A man was lately tried at the assizes for smashing a shop-window and taking from the inside a watch. Parliament would hardly listen to an application to abolish shop-windows because they may be a temptation to dishonesty. There is a story of a sailor who was much disgusted at being told that a black man kneeling in chains and in tears was his brother. We suspect that Mr. LEICESTER and his "real working-men" would be equally unacceptable as brothers to the majority of Englishmen.

A PARLIAMENTARY FARCE.

THERE is probably no part of its work which the House of Commons performs so pretentiously, and yet so inadequately, as the supervision of expenditure. This is supposed to be one of its great constitutional functions, and is always spoken of with much solemnity, but it would appear to be a function which is gradually lapsing into pure ceremonial. A good deal of time is spent in going over the Estimates, and sometimes there is quite an imposing display of economical energy. Ex-officials prove very much to their own satisfaction that there has been a shocking waste of money ever since they left office, and that it is only to be stopped by their going back again. Independent members make their moan on behalf of the oppressed taxpayer. There are debates and divisions, and Ministers profess to be indignant and alarmed, and appeal to their supporters to stand by them and not to allow the safety and honour of the country to be imperilled by the touching of a sixpence of the Estimates. But somehow nothing ever comes of it. It is only a sham fight with blank cartridges; and if the Estimates were taken as read, and passed en bloc at the beginning of the Session, the practical result would be just the same. It has been asserted by a high authority that the proceedings in Committee of Supply are only a farce, and if anybody wishes to understand the nature of the farce he cannot do better than study the proceedings, for example, of such a night as Monday last. The House was in Committee on the Civil Service Estimates for several hours. A multitude of little questions were started for discussion, and there were three divisions to give an air of reality to the scene. It is perhaps needless to say that, in the end, the votes were passed precisely as they were presented by the Government. After some loose talk about the Board of Trade, Mr. DILLWYN moved that the vote of 2,701*l.* for the Privy Seal Office should be struck out. The question was fully discussed last year, and Mr. DILLWYN, who repeated the exploded fallacy that the Privy Seal has a sinecure, had nothing new to say about it, unless it was that Lord RIRON might have been more usefully employed at home than in America, and in that case there would have been no necessity to call in Lord HALIFAX. If it is desirable to have a member of the Cabinet who is free from departmental engagements, and capable of making himself generally useful, and whose advice is of importance in the deliberations of the Cabinet, it is immaterial what may be his official designation. Nor is there any reason why, if Ministers are to receive salaries, an exception should be made in the case of the Privy Seal. We certainly do not share Mr. ORWAY's enthusiasm for gratuitous services, but if there is anything in the principle it should be equally applied to all Parliamentary offices. The Committee passed the vote by a large majority, but the members who objected to it will no doubt be able to boast to their constituents, when next they meet, of their heroic efforts to save public money and to enforce economy in high places.

Mr. A. JOHNSTON and some other members made a show of opposition to the vote for the expenses of the Charity Commission, which, it was urged, ought to be paid by the Charities themselves. It is impossible to doubt the sincerity of Mr. LOWE's declaration that he should be most happy to carry out this idea if any practicable method of doing it could be suggested; but this was a detail which the economists characteristically disregarded. If the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners—"a very peculiar office," as Mr. LOWE said—is of advantage to the public, it is obviously desirable that trustees of charities should not be furnished with a pretext in the shape of fees for keeping clear of it. If the funds entrusted for safe keeping to the Commissioners were to be taxed, while money in the hands of trustees escaped taxation, the practical effect of such an arrangement would be to counteract the object for which the Board was established. There is, no doubt, one way of taxing charities, and that is by subjecting them to Income-tax or succession duties; but Mr. LOWE, as well as Mr. GLADSTONE, has been convinced by experience that the opinion of the country is not yet prepared to grasp what he considers to be the "true principles" on which charities should be dealt with. Some doubts were hinted as to whether the charge for Parliamentary printing might not be reduced, but no attempt was made to go into the question seriously. The amount of money which is spent in this way annually is considerable, and is continually on the increase; and an economist who was in earnest about economy, and who was not above the drudgery of looking into accounts, would find much more profitable employment in this direction than in trying to cut off the modest salary of the Privy Seal. A return of the number of returns moved for by certain members of the House of Commons, and of the cost of printing them, would probably convey some startling information. Next there was a lively discussion about candles for the use of members. Mr. AYTON has lately arranged that the great clock at Westminster shall be lighted up as long as either House is sitting—a poetical symbol of the sleepless vigilance of the Legislature, which might be rendered still more impressive if, as has been suggested, the subjects under discussion and the state of the House could be indicated by a change of coloured lights. It appears, however, that while

Mr. AYRTON has been launching out in one direction, he has been economising in another. Gas has been substituted for wax candles in the library of the House of Commons, and Sir C. O'LOGHLIN, who prefers candles, pleaded that they should be restored. Mr. AYRTON replied with gay vivacity that candles were of little use except to those who had the gift of sight, and that to one who could not see it was of little consequence how much light there was. It is to be hoped that these amiable epigrams consoled Sir COLMAN. Mr. RYLANDS, at a loss apparently for something new, reproduced his old motion against the Secret Service money, contenting himself, however, with proposing that it should be reduced by 10,000*l*. When Lord CLARENDON was examined before a Select Committee on this subject, shortly before his death, he observed that there was a foolish inconsistency in trusting a Minister with the management of great international questions, on the issue of which vast interests, and perhaps peace or war, depended, and at the same time hesitating about trusting him with the expenditure of a few thousands a year. Mr. RYLANDS appears to be impregnable in his distrust of Ministerial honesty, but he has strengthened his case against the Secret Service Money by the introduction of a new and highly original argument. He has discovered that foreign nations are greatly disturbed by the knowledge that the British Government is in possession of secret funds to the alarming amount of 24,000*l*. a year, and are led to suppose that we are now trying to over-reach them in military matters. We do not know what are the foreign nations to which Mr. RYLANDS alludes, but we are left to infer that the bloated armaments of the Continent are kept up solely as a protection against the secret fleets and hidden battalions which our wily Government has been providing "unknown," as Mrs. GAMP would say, out of the vast treasures of the Secret Service Fund. Lord ENFIELD very properly declined to answer Mr. RYLANDS's inquiries, explaining, perhaps superfluously, that the object of having a secret fund was that its application should not be known. There was again a large majority for the Government, which had a smaller, but still a sufficient, majority in support of the vote for Queen's Plates. Mr. WHARLHOUSE was exposing the enormity of giving young barristers three guinea fees in Mint cases, when the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER considerably proposed that progress should be reported in order that the ATTORNEY-GENERAL might have an opportunity of clearing up the mystery.

It can hardly be pretended that the House of Commons is occupied in a useful and dignified manner in discussions such as these. It would be difficult, indeed, to imagine an evening more unprofitably spent. We do not mean to say that it is in any case possible for private members to do very much in the way of cutting down the Estimates, or that there is much room for reductions. Nor are we, in fact, disposed to look down upon small economies merely because they are small, and to say that nothing under a million, or at least several thousands, is worthy the attention of Parliament. Extravagance will usually be found on analysis to consist in a number of comparatively petty charges which are either excessive or unnecessary. It is always a good thing to check waste, however small may be the amount in question, because there is nothing which tends so much to spread and propagate itself, and to ascend from little things to big things. But it is one thing really to check waste, or to try seriously to check it, and another thing to make a shallow pretence of doing so, without taking the commonest care to get at the facts of the case, and to make sure that it is really waste which is being attacked, and that the attack is being made on the weak side of the matter. It must be obvious to the meanest capacity that, if a vote is extravagant, the only way to attack it successfully is to be in a position to prove that it is extravagant, and that the only way to prove this is to look into the matter beforehand and to ascertain exactly how it stands. To single out an item blindly and indiscriminately upon mere caprice or conjecture is simply to play into the hands of the Government, who have always an answer ready for the occasion. There are various methods by which a member can get at the facts of the case, but it is certain that he will fail in any attempt to make an impression on the Estimates if he waits until the vote he assails is actually before the Committee of Supply. There is then no time to analyse and test Ministerial replies, to prepare an answer, or to organise opposition. As at Homeburg, all the chances are in favour of the table, and the table knows it. In the nature of things, the Estimates must necessarily be accepted to a great extent on the responsibility of the Government. It is impossible that members can be acquainted with all the technical details, personal considerations, and undercurrents of policy which influence, and no doubt on most occasions very properly influence, the Government. The Minister, backed or inspired by experienced officials, has naturally a great advantage over his opponents. The only way in which it is possible to challenge the Estimates effectually is to take a particular class of votes, to study them carefully, and to arrange a plan of attack founded not only on a knowledge of details, but on some broad general principle. At present the economists appear to be always in extremes; they are either for passing vague resolutions recommending a reduction of expenditure, or they rest their case too exclusively on some petty isolated item the precise nature of which they have been at no pains to understand, and as to which they are almost certain to be overwhelmed by technical arguments and confident official assertions. There is no reason to suppose that, on the whole, the Estimates are framed in an extravagant spirit, and on some points there are indications of an opposite tendency, which is equally remote from true economy. Still there is no doubt plenty of scope for economists, if they set to work in the right way. However that may be, there can hardly be any question as to the folly and futility of the ordinary course of proceedings in Committee of Supply.

THE POETRY OF WEALTH.

THERE is one marvellous tale which is hardly likely to be forgotten so long as men can look down from Notre Dame de la Garde on the sunny beauty of Marseilles. Even if the rest of Dumas's works sink into oblivion, the sight of Chateau d'If, as it rises glowing from the blue waters of the Mediterranean, will serve to recall the wonders of Monte Christo. But the true claim of the book to remembrance lies not in its mere command over the wonderful, but in the peculiar sense of wonder which it excites. It was the first literary attempt to raise the mere dead fact of money into the sphere of the imagination, and to reveal the dormant poetry of wealth. There has as yet been only a single age in the world's history when wealth has told with any force upon the imagination of men. Unpoetic as the Roman mind essentially was, the sudden burst upon it of the accumulated riches of the older world seems to have kindled in senators and proconsuls a sense of romance which, wild and extravagant as it seems, has in some of its qualities found no parallel since. The feasts of Lucullus, the gluttony of Heliogabalus, the sudden upgrowth of vast amphitheatres, the waste of millions on the sport of a day, the encounter of navies in the mimic warfare of the Coliseum, are the freaks of gigantic children teasing about wildly the slowly hoarded treasures of past generations; but they are freaks which for the first time revealed the strange possibilities which lay in the future of wealth. It is hard to say whether such a time will ever return. No doubt the world is infinitely richer now than it was in the time of the Romans, and no doubt, too, there are at least a dozen people in London alone whose actual income far exceeds that of the wealthiest of proconsuls. But the wealth of the modern capitalist is a wealth which has grown by slow accumulations, which has risen almost insensibly into its enormous mass, and the vastness of which its owner has never had brought home to him with the same sort of shock as that which Lucullus must have felt when he fronted the treasures of Mithridates, or Olive when he threaded his way among the sacks of jewels in the royal vaults of Moorshehabad. So far, indeed, is wealth from stimulating the imagination nowadays that a banker is the very type of the unimaginative man, and that the faintest suspicion of genius is enough to render a financier an object of suspicion to the money market. But it is conceivable in the odd freaks of things that we may yet see the advent of the Poet-Capitalist. It is almost impossible to say what new opportunities the possession of fabulous resources might not add to the fancy of a dreamer or to the speculations of a philanthropist. It is not till after a little thought that we realise how materially the course of human progress is obstructed by sheer want of money at critical moments, or how easily the sum of human happiness might be increased by the sudden descent of a golden shower on the right people at the right time. There are dreams which men have been dreaming for generations after generations which require nothing for their realisation but the appearance of such a capitalist as we have imagined. To take what may seem perhaps an odd instance, just because it is an odd instance, let us remember what a wonderful amount of hope and anticipation has been thrown by a great religious party into the restoration of the Jews. Rightly or wrongly, it is the one theme which sends a throb of excitement through the life of quiet parsonages, and kindles a new fire even in the dreariest May meetings at Exeter Hall. But in point of actual fact there is not the slightest necessity to await any great spiritual revolution for the accomplishment of such a dream if its accomplishment were really desirable. A league of Evangelical bankers who really believed in the prophecies they are so fond of quoting could turn the wildest fancies of Dr. Cumming into actual fact with very little trouble indeed. Any energetic agent would undertake the transport of Mount Sion bodily to Jerusalem, the bare limestone uplands of Judaea could be covered again with terraces of olive and vine as peacefully as the same sort of scenery and industry as is still required to keep up the cultivation of the Blodion; and Mr. Ferguson would furnish, for a due consideration, plans and estimates for a restoration of the Temple on Zion. We are not suggesting such a scheme as an opportunity for investing money to any great profit, but it is odd to live in a world of wealthy people who believe firmly that its realization would make this world into a little heaven below, and yet never seem to feel that they have the means of bringing it about in their cheque-books. Or take a hardly less odd instance, but one which has actually been brought a little nearer to practical realisation. Some time ago a body of Welsh patriots determined to save the legends and literature of the Cymry from extinction by founding a new Welsh nation on the shores of Patagonia. Nothing but Welsh was to be spoken, none but Welsh books were to be read, and the laws of the colony were to be an amalgam of the codes of Moses and of Howell the Good. The plan failed simply because its originators were poor and unable to tide over the first difficulties of the project. But conceive an ardent capitalist, with a passion for nationalities, embracing such a cause, and at the cost of a few hundreds of thousands creating perhaps a type of national life which might directly or indirectly affect the future of the world. Such a man might secure himself a niche in history at less cost and with less trouble than he could obtain a large estate and a share in the commission of the peace for a midland county.

But there is no need to restrict ourselves simply to oddities, although oddities of this sort acquire a grandeur of their own at the touch of wealth. The whole field of social experiment lies open to a great capitalist. The one thing required, for instance, to render the equal and misery of our larger towns practically impossible would be the actual sight of a large town without equal or misery; and yet if Liverpool were simply handed over to a great philanthropist with the income of half-a-dozen Marquises of Westminster, such a sight might easily be seen. Schemes of this sort require nothing but what we may term the poetic employment of capital for their realization. It is strange that no financial hero makes his appearance to use his great money-club to fell direr monsters than those which Hercules encountered, and, by the creation of a city at once great, beautiful, and healthy, to realize the conception of the Utopia and the dream of Sir Thomas More. Or take a parallel instance from the country. Those who have watched the issues of the co-operative system as applied to agriculture believe they see in it the future solution of two of our greatest social difficulties—those, we mean, which spring from the increasing hardships of the farmer's position, and those which arise from the terrible serfage of the rural labourer. But the experiments which have been as yet carried on are on too small a scale either to produce any influence on the labour market as a whole, or to make that impression on the public imagination which could alone raise the matter into a "question of the day." What is wanted is simply that two or three dukes should try the experiment of peasant co-operation on a whole county, and try it with a command of capital which would give the experiment fair play. Whether it succeeded or not, such an attempt would have a poetic and heroic aspect of a different order from the usual expenditure of a British peer. Or we may turn to a wholly different field, the field of art. We are always ready to cry out against "pot-boilers" as we wander through the galleries of the Academy, and to grumble at the butchers' bills and bonnet bills which stand between great artists and the production of great works. But the butchers' bills and bonnet bills of all the forty Academicians might be paid by a great capitalist without any deep dip into his money bags, and a whole future opened to English art by the sheer poetry of wealth. There are hundreds of men with special facilities for scientific inquiry who are at the present moment pinned down to the daily drudgery of the lawyer's desk or the doctor's consulting room by the necessities of daily bread. A Rothschild who would take a score of natural philosophers and enable them to apply their whole energies to investigation would help forward science as really as Newton himself, if less directly. But there are even direct ways in which wealth on a gigantic scale might put out a poetic force which would affect the very fortunes of the world. There are living people who are the masters of twenty millions; and twenty millions would drive a tunnel under the Straits of Dover. If increased intercourse means, as is constantly contended, an increase of friendship and of mutual understanding among nations, the man who devoted a vast wealth to linking two peoples together would rise at once to the level of the great benefactors of mankind. An opportunity for a yet more direct employment of the influence of wealth will some day or other be found in the field of international politics. Already those who come in contact with the big-wigs of the financial world hear whispers of a future when the destinies of peoples are to be decided in bank parlours, and questions of peace and war settled, not by the diplomatist and statesman, but by the capitalist. But as yet these are mere whispers, and no European Gould has risen up to "finance" Downing Street into submission, or to meet the boldest move of Prince Bismarck by a roll on the Stock Exchange. Of all the schemes, however, which we have suggested, this is probably the nearest to practical realisation. If not we ourselves, our children at any rate, may see International Congresses made possible by a few people quietly fattening their breeches-pockets, and the march of "armed nations" arrested by "a run for gold."

Taking, however, men as they are, it is far more wonderful that no one has hit on the enormous field which wealth opens for the development of sheer downright mischief. The sense of mischief is a sense which goes quietly to sleep as soon as childhood is over, from mere want of opportunity. The boy who wants to trip up his tutor can easily find a string to tie across the garden walk; but when one has got beyond the simpler joys of childhood, strings are not so easy to find. To carry out a practical joke of the Christopher Sly sort, we require, as Shakespeare saw, the resources of a prince. But once granted the possession of unlimited wealth, and the possibilities of mischief rise to a grandeur such as the world has never realised. The Erie Ring taught us a little of what capital might do in this way, but in the Erie Ring capital was fettered by considerations of profit and loss. Throw these considerations overboard and treat a great question in the spirit of sheer mischief, and the results may be simply amazing. Conceive, for instance, a capitalist getting the railways round London into his power, and then in sheer freak stopping the traffic for a single day. No doubt the day would be a short one, but even twelve hours of such a practical joke would bring about a "Black Monday" such as England has never seen. But there would be no need of such an enormous operation to enable us to realize the power of latent mischief which the owner of great wealth really possesses. An adroit operator might secure every omnibus and every cab in the metropolis and compel us to paddle about for a week in the mud of November before the loss was replaced. The whole stock of stored-up coal for winter consumption might be "locked up" in the close of autumn. It is quite possible, indeed, that gigantic mischief of this sort may find its sphere in practical politics. Already Continental Governments watch with anxiety the power which employers possess of bringing about a revolution by simply closing their doors and throwing thousands of unemployed labourers on the streets; but it is a power which in some degree or other capital will always possess, and any one who remembers the assistance which Reform derived from the Hyde Park rows will see at once that mischief on the large scale might be made in this way an important factor in political questions. Ambition has yet a wider sphere of action than even mischief in this poetic use of wealth. A London preacher recently drew pointed attention to the merely selfish use of their riches by great English nobles, and contrasted it with the days when Elizabeth's Lords of the Council clubbed together to provide an English fleet against the Armada, or the nobles of Venice placed their wealth on every great emergency at the service of the State. But from any constitutional point of view there is perhaps nothing on which we may more heartily congratulate ourselves than on the blindness which hides from the great capitalists of England the political power which such a national employment of their wealth would give them—a blindness which is all the more wonderful in what is at once the wealthiest and the most political aristocracy which the world has ever seen. What same the mere devotion of a quarter of a million to public uses may give to a quiet merchant the recent example of Mr. Peabody abundantly showed. But the case of the Baroness Burdett Coutts is yet more strictly to the point. The mere fact that she has been for years credited with a wide and unselfish benevolence has given her a power over the imagination of vast masses of the London poor which no one who is not really conversant with their daily life and modes of thinking could for an instant imagine. Her bounty is enlarged in the misty air of the slums of Wapping or Rotherhithe to colossal dimensions, and the very quietness and unobtrusiveness of her work gives it an air of mystery which talks like romance on the fancy of the poor. It was characteristic of the power which such a use of wealth may give that the mobs who smashed the Hyde Park railings stopped to cheer before the house of Lady Burdett Coutts. Luckily none of our political nobles has ever bethought himself of the means by which the great Roman leaders rose habitually to influence or won over the labouring masses by "panem et Circenses." But a nobler ambition might find its field in a large employment of wealth for public ends of a higher sort. Something of the old patrician pride might have spurred the five or six great houses who own half London to construct the Thames Embankment at their own cost, and to hand it over free from the higgings of Mr. Gore to the people at large. Even now we may hear of some earl, whose rent-roll is growing with fabulous rapidity, as coming forward to relieve Mr. Lowe by the offer of a National Gallery of Art, or checkmating the jobbers of South Kensington by the erection of a National Museum. It seems to be easy enough for peer after peer to fling away a hundred thousand at Newmarket or Tattersall's, and yet a hundred thousand would establish in the crowded haunts of working London great "Conservatories," where the finest music might be brought to bear without cost on the coarseness and vulgarity of the life of the poor. The higher drama seems to be perishing in default of a State subvention, but it never seems to enter any one's head that there are dozens of people among those who grumble at the artistic taste of Mr. Ayrton who could furnish such a subvention at the present cost of their stable. As yet, however, we must be content, we suppose, with such a use of wealth as Lothair brings to the front—the purely selfish use of it carried to the highest pitch which selfishness has ever reached. Great parks and great houses, costly stables and costly conservatories, existence relieved of every hitch and discomfort—these are the outlets which wealth has as yet succeeded in finding. For nobler outlets we must wait for the advent of the Real Capitalist.

QUOTATION.

QUOTATION, properly managed, is at once an embellishment of style, written or spoken, and a tribute to the literature of the past. When based on the "reading which makes a full man," and used only to enhance the speaker's own thoughts, or to give them a setting, it is a natural adjunct of educated utterance. It was inevitable that the Renaissance should give an active stimulus to the quotation of Greek and Latin authors in modern European literature; and Bacon's Essays, compared with those of Addison and Steele a hundred years later, give a good idea of the high tide of quotation in that department of writing. Not that the high tide ended with the Elizabethan writers; for both Burton and Jeremy Taylor, the one in eccentric multiplicity, the other in spontaneous exuberance, are types of whole classes of authors in the seventeenth century who treated the stores of literature in a similar fashion.

During the last century also, both in Parliamentary speaking and in writing, the habit of literary quotation was much more general than it has become in our own generation. A kind of impatience of quotation has now sprung up, the result of several conditions which may be remarked in contemporary life and thought. The rapid increase of population, and the coincident development of the means of printed communication, have not only thrust current social and political questions into a front place in men's thoughts, but have made them engross much of the time which formerly could be spent more easily on culture in some form or another. Life is more busy and earnest than once it was, and the persistent and cumulative effect of newspapers is to make it seem more busy and earnest than it really is. It may be doubted whether, mutatis mutandis, the knowledge among presumably educated people of our own classical literature, to say nothing of that of Greece and Rome, is at all on a level with the standard among the same class of a hundred years ago. Yet the printing and reprinting of classical books in every sort of literature goes on with such a degree of rapidity, and competitive examinations have created the appearance of so much omniscience in literary matters, that there is a tendency to regard a quotation as a superfluity involving the intention of display, as if the thing quoted were already in every one's mind merely because it is in every one's reach. In the field of public speaking also many causes have operated to bring into prominence an increasing number of men whose early training was not in the region of culture at all, and who abstain from quotation not so much from choice as from necessity. The comparative disfavour with which classical studies are just now regarded, by contrast, for example, with the study of natural science, carries with it at any rate this cause for regret—namely, that one does not see how, under such circumstances, should the same mode of feeling continue, our native standard writers are to hold their own. For, besides the direct and actual quotation which abounds in the great English authors of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, there is also in them a world of what may be called inferential quotation. If the best remains of Greece and Rome were to drop into the background still more rapidly and completely than they sometimes threaten to do now, a great mass of this inferential quotation would lose its significance; the life, the aroma, of the passages would have vanished. In Milton, who was perhaps quite the best-read man of his own or of any epoch, this indirect reproduction of the thoughts of the past reaches to a very high degree indeed. A large number of lines will instantly occur as examples to any one who is even tolerably familiar with his prose or poetry. It is not only in strongly mannered lines like that the instances of what we mean are to be found. Such a sonnet as

Or hear'st thou rather pure ethereal stream?

Lawrence, of virtuous father virtuous son, has charm and merit enough about it for any reader; but it will hardly be disputed that the charm is increased by those echoes of the past, both from Horace and Juvenal, which are implied in the words, though not expressed. The same may be said of such a passage as

Let Euclid rest, and Archimedes pause,
And what the Swede intends, and what the French.

If it be objected that nothing can be in reality added to lines like these by a recollection of the Horatian O matre pulchra filia pulchior, or Quid Tiridatem terreat unice securus, we reply that the charm of inferential quotation does not consist in the recalling of an isolated line out of one literature for the purpose of fitting it on to a line in another, but in something much wider and deeper—namely, in the illustration, even by means of things small in themselves, of the unity or the affinities between the modes of educated thought in distant and different times. In direct quotation this unity is definitely appealed to; in that which is indirect or inferential it is hinted and gently suggested—

Part seen, imagined part.

There are certain places in Milton, and by no means few in number, where the sense is positively unintelligible without the key to the implied reference; a good example of which occurs in the Third Book of the Paradise Lost, where the flight of the spirits who afterwards fall into Limbo is described:—

They pass the planets seven, and pass the fixed;
And that crystalline sphere whose balance weighs
The impalpable, talked, and that first moved.

This description of an upward flight through space has naturally presented difficulties to any one who happened to be unaware of the implied reference to passages describing the five spheres of the Ptolemaic system. The four lower are here mentioned—the planetary, the firmamental ("fixed"), the crystalline, with its vibratory motion, which existed in the imagination of the ancient astronomers, and the primum mobile. Beyond these came the empyrean, which in the Miltonic passage next after the lines just quoted is taken to be heaven. But often, though by no means always, references such as this have more to do with Milton's mannerism than with his poetry.

Two poets as unlike as Spenser and Shelley agree nevertheless in having whole strains of utterance eloquent with notes which are only fully heard through the means of some knowledge of Plato, as the Hymnes to Beauty and the Adonais may show. In Mr. Tennyson, who besides higher merits is the most scholarlike of the poets in this generation, implied quotation is very frequent. For example, in the beautiful and perhaps not very well-known lyric called Love and Death, the first line—

What time the mighty moon was gathering light,

brings with it a suggestion of Virgil's

Luna, revertentes quum primum colligit ignes, and the fine appeal in Enid beginning

O purblind race of miserable men, is a virtual quotation of the great line in Lucretius,

O miseras hominum mentes, o pectora caeca.

And phrases like "revolving many memories" in the Morte d'Arthur, or "those blind motions of the spring" in the Talking Oak, draw their life and virtue from a Virgilian past.

Idle or impertinent quotation is one of the most severe inflictions that a reader or listener can be visited with. There are some people who will perpetually be quoting proverbial sayings, and who keep one well up to the recollection that "Well begun is half done," and that "Christmas comes but once a year." Proverbs form almost the only stored literature of the English peasant; and some persons who, as far as dress can elevate, move in a much higher sphere than he, seem themselves not to possess much more in the way of reserve fund for conversational embellishment. One of the best things that even Charles Lamb ever said was drawn from him by what we are calling an "impertinent" quotation. He was in the habit of playing cribbage with Elliston, and Elliston, whose natural talents had been supplemented by a very slender sort of education, was just the man to be fond of a flourish, and not to neglect the chance of airing a quotation when he could get it. Accordingly, one night as they were sitting down to the table, Elliston rubbed his hands with much satisfaction, and said, "Now then, Lamb, 'When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war.'" "Yes," Charles Lamb answered; "and when you meet Greek, you—don't understand it." If Mr. Borthrop Trumbull in Middlemarch had read the books which he had so punctiliously provided with calf bindings, he would have been a finished master of unnecessary and impertinent quotation.

The practice of loose quotation, of habitually citing a line or a sentence without being quite certain of its actual words, and still more of its meaning, is a slovenly one which cannot be too severely blamed. From this habit misquotations often take their rise, and some of these become stereotyped in a very curious manner. One of the best quoted lines in the English language, where, of the ancestral village elders in Gray's Elegy, it is said that

Along the cool sequester'd vale of life
They kept the noiseless tenor of their way, is cited nine times out of ten in the form

They kept the even tenor of their way.

And a line still more familiar—we mean the famous "One touch of nature" in Troilus and Cressida—has met with a destiny almost unique. For, as was pointed out in these pages several years ago, the thought in that line has nothing whatever to do with a general bonhomie arising from the successful touch of a universally responsive chord; the line itself says that all men have a touch of family resemblance, and the following lines point out that this touch is the love and worship of novelty and change. Dr. Cumming has done much towards demonstrating to what lengths the force of misquotation may go; but even Dr. Cumming never went quite so far as a speaker at one of the recent Nonconformist meetings, whose speech was fully reported in the English Independent of May 10. This gentleman had explained at some length his conviction that Germany, the United States, and "poor Old England," are destined in a remote future to join hand in hand and go forth to win the final and crowning victory of good over evil. When this is done the three Powers will return home again in triumph. Carried away by his own brilliant post-nostications, the speaker cast about in his mind for an appropriate quotation with which to adorn his prophecy and to end his speech. He bethought him of the Legs of Men, and especially of the passage which begins

Blot and thine that the Sun
Who saw Hecate's bright eyes

And this is the form in which he thought fit to produce it to the meeting:—

Bless and otherwise bless [sic]
The Roman who sees Rome's brightest day;
Who sees the long victorious pomp
Wind down the Appian [sic] way.

Those were the exact words; and speculation, we must freely admit, is completely baffled by them. What comprehensive mode of benediction may be indicated by the words "Bless and otherwise bless"; why one kind of blessing would not have answered the purpose; why the old triumphal route of the "Sacred Way" should be violently transferred to the "Appian"; how the Appian Road would ever lead up to the gates "of Capitoline Jove," at which the speaker finally lauded the three reforming nationalities amidst "loud cheers" from the audience—into these and similar questions we feel that it would be idle to enter. They were at any rate points which had clearly never vexed the soul of the orator himself, nor were his audience apparently more fastidious than himself. It is better to allow this remarkable reading of Macaulay's lines to stand as it is, a monument of the aid which misconception and misquotation may mutually render, and of the halo of ridicule which may thus be thrown around things which in themselves are dignified and lofty. It was in a similar strain of free citation that another gentleman, who has since become an eminent member of the London School Board, once reminded an audience, à propos of nothing in particular, how "glorious old John Bunyan" has written it down that

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage.

Language, whether spoken or written, without the fertilizing vein of sound quotation, direct or implied, tends to become jejune and barren; but quotation, to be of use, should be apposite, and it should be accurate.

THE BENNETT JUDGMENT.

WE very sincerely tender our condolences to the Church Association, and our congratulations to the Church of England, upon the collapse of the Bennett prosecution. That militant Society—passing rich, like the elderly bride in Our Mutual Friend, with "thirty thousand pounds"—has been devoting itself with a zeal and a recklessness which even Mr. Miall might envy, to the destruction of the English Establishment, and it has met with its reward at the hands of a Judicial Committee so strongly composed that the Record can only find the funny charge to bring against it that it was a "decemvirate." We cannot, of course, feel any sympathy with the respondent, whose conduct has all through the affair been simply inexcusable. Uncorrected by the long experiences of a chequered clerical career, the Vicar of Frome began with gratuitously defying the susceptibilities of a large body of the theological public, by the calculated aggressiveness with which he broached doctrines peculiarly difficult, delicate, and liable to suspicion, in publications outside of the area of his ministerial teaching. Having, then, as he must have foreseen, if not desired, brought upon the cause which he professed to uphold the perils of a suit in which defeat implied calamity to the party whose champion he had made himself, Mr. Bennett simply ran away from the fight which his own pugnacity had provoked, without so much as giving the opportunity to wiser men than himself to look after interests which were most sacred in his eyes, but which his own act had exposed to the chances of a litigation which need not have been one-sided except for his obstinate laches.

On the other hand, it would be a great mistake to assume that because the clergyman who has just got off was only Mr. Bennett, therefore the decision was only important to the parishioners of Frome; for it must be recollected that, while one side was labelled Sheppard and the other Bennett, the individuality which the promoters sought to crush was as little represented by the one man Mr. Bennett as they were by the one man Mr. Sheppard, who lent them his name. Mr. Bennett was notoriously self-willed, obstinate, and unamenable to the influences of ordinary prudence, and he was accordingly as much the right man through whom to strike at a great section of the Church on its doctrinal side as, for similar mental qualities, Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Purchas had been apt instruments for an assault on its ceremonial aspects. The Church Association, having resolved upon hazarding the safety of the Establishment on the chance of stamping out the High Church party, followed the plain dictates of obvious policy in selecting in each case as their immediate victims men whom an arrogant temperament, harsh and inconsiderate language, and extravagant proceedings had made peculiarly vulnerable. But neither profit nor pleasure could have been attained by merely drumming out Mr. Mackenzie, Mr. Purchas, and Mr. Bennett. Cynical bystanders might even have insinuated that High Churchmen as a party would stand higher with the public for the loss of such headstrong and self-seeking free-lances. The Association, however, felt that in bringing down a direct condemnation on all or any of these men they could not fail in damaging the position of the many other persons whose opinions and practices, without fault or desire of their own, could in any degree be identified with the actions or opinions of these enfants terribles. The attempt met with considerable success so long as it was limited to the less important field of ceremonial, although the victory proved in its results to be a comparatively barren one, from the provoking coolness and self-restraint which the persons indirectly affected exhibited in meeting their legal reverses. On Saturday the situation changed, and in rating, but letting off, Mr. Bennett, the Judicial Committee in effect declared that the High Church party, of whom, by his whole course of action, the well-known vicar had shown himself determined not to be the representative man, possessed a legal standing-ground within the wide pale of the English Church.

It is no business of ours to investigate the truth of either of the High or of the Low Church theory. What we say of the one we repeat of the other—that in the actual condition of the Established Church of England, the coexistence of both systems, as well as of the "Broad" school, is necessary for the permanence of that Establishment; and as we think that the downfall of the Establishment would be a great social calamity, we protest impartially against the High section pelting out the Low—which they show neither the inclination nor the power to attempt—or the Low making the Church too hot for the High, which some of them certainly manifest the desire, though not the capacity, to do. We should take the same view even if the High Church party had not emerged from that inglorious position of sterile dignity to which an unchecked course of sleepy prosperity had reduced it some half century since. The hemorrhage following the amputation of that limb would even then have killed the patient. But the last fifty years have totally changed the social value of High Churchmanship. Be it the pure gospel, or a retrograde system of superstitious formalism, it has made a mark both deep and broad upon the age. Its contributions to theological and scientific literature have been enormous; it has filled the pulpits with orators whose rhetorical reputation rivals that of the most eminent Parliamentary debaters; it has been the motive power of a vast amount of practical constructiveness in the way of churches, colleges, and schools, of hospitals and refuges, of societies for missionary, eleemosynary, or devotional purposes, which have asserted for themselves no inconspicuous place in the sum total of national life. The impetus given to art by a school of thought divorced from the cold prejudices of narrow Puritanism has reasonably enlisted the sympathies of the large community who love art towards a party which recognizes their just claims; while the multitudinous occupations created both for men and for women, singly and collectively, by a system which aims so much at work, so much at co-operation and so much at the strength derived from systematic devotion, have imperceptibly built up a spirit of mutual affinity peculiarly susceptible of any shock of satisfaction or of disappointment. Such is the High Church party of the present day in its external aspects. It belongs to the Established Church; it harmonizes with that Church; in its own opinion it is the most true exponent of that Church, while it does not deny the right of schools which think very differently from itself to belong to the same Church on the easy terms of accepting the same liberal formularies. Not even the fatuity of the Church Association would have dreamed of stamping out the convictions of such a party by any number of worrying prosecutions, while it could hardly have anticipated enforcing an unbelieving conformity upon persons whose beliefs, however misguided, were certainly strong and definite. It may have speculated on keeping High Churchmen within the pale while it reduced them to an attitude of sulk and silent impotence, like the bondsmen whom, as Herodotus tells us, the Scythians blinded and then kept to the daily drudgery of domestic service. If so, its policy was one of profound and calculated immorality.

Only one reputable alternative remains, apart from the supposition that they were actuated by mere unreasoning spite, to explain the policy of the zealots of the Church Association; and that is, that they had determined to risk the dissolution of the Established Church if only they could drive the High Church party out of its fold. If they were men of sufficient mind to appreciate the power, and the will to that power, which would be possessed by such a section—that of the High Churchmen of this generation harried out of that Establishment for which they have hitherto been such indefatigable labourers, we can only say that their policy bears a very close resemblance to that of the "moral force" Fenians. They were simply blind bigots, bent on the humiliation of persons whom they hated and misunderstood, their proceedings sink to the level of English sympathizers with Irish discontent. In any case the discomfiture of their revolutionary filibustering must be a matter of congratulation to all who are anxious for the success of the great English exponent of a national Church which is able to reconcile the logic of formularies with the freedom of investigation.

The theory which underlies the judgment is the repudiation of the hard and fast theory that the distinctive formularies of the English Church of England are not merely truth, but all truth, and therefore that the maintenance of any opinion not plainly "contradictory or repugnant" to those formularies, but still not comprised within them, must on account of that very non-comprehension be forbidden to the ministers of the Church. In the words of the judgment—"The question is, however, not what the Articles and Formularies affirm, but what they exclude," or as more fully expressed in another passage:—

Changes by which words or passages inculcating particular doctrines, or assuming a belief in them, have been struck out, are most material as evidence that the Church has deliberately ceased to affirm those doctrines in her public services. At the same time, it is material to observe that the necessary effect of such changes, when they stand alone, is that it ceases to be unlawful to contradict such doctrines, and not that it becomes unlawful to maintain them.

In laying down this principle, however, the judges evidently felt themselves committed by the recollection that the judgments in Martin v. Mackenochie and in Hibbert v. Purchas have been based on the opposite assumption, and they had accordingly endeavoured in the early part of the document to reconcile the inconsistency by the theory that

In the public or common prayers and devotional offices of the Church all her members are expected and entitled to join; it is necessary, therefore, that such forms of worship as are prescribed by authority for general use should embody those beliefs only which are assumed to be generally held by members of the Church. In the case of "Westerton v. Liddell" (and again in "Martin v. Mackenochie"), their Lordships say, "In the performance of the services, rites, and ceremonies ordered by the Prayer Book, the directions contained in it must be strictly observed; no omission and no addition can be allowed." If the minister be allowed to introduce at his own will variations in the rites and ceremonies which seem to him to interpret the doctrine of the service in a particular direction, the service ceases to be what it was meant to be, common ground on which all Church people may meet, though they differ about some doctrines. But the Church of England has wisely left a certain latitude of opinion in matters of belief, and has not insisted on a rigorous uniformity of thought which might reduce her communion to a narrow compass.

This is no doubt a highly ingenious hypothesis, but it breaks down upon facts. The idea, if any, upon which it is based is that there can be a certain maximum, or minimum, or medium of worship so exactly balanced as to be universally satisfactory to the confessedly divergent tastes, feelings, and convictions of that miscellaneous nation which makes up the Church of England; and further that in these days of that very "latitude of opinion" which the judgment encourages in the same passage in which it enjoins hard ceremonial monotony, those divergences will all be contented and appeased by an appeal to the letter of rubrics construed in the most confessedly narrow and rigid spirit. It also assumes that while one class of mind is to be held as irreconcilably offended by exuberance of ceremonial, another class of mind is to be treated as if it were, or ought to be, indifferent to that which it considers deficiency of reverential circumstance, and that while the Low Church half of the congregation is to be indulged by a penal law strictly prohibiting the parish priest from any ritual seeming to indicate a belief in what is called Sacramental religion, the High Church moiety is to be blidden to sit still and acquiesce in any exhibition which the minister may make of his adherence to contrary doctrine. Another consequence which follows from the same position is, that the authors of these sentences must suppose that the British public are a pack of superstitious formalists. The heartburnings—say the Judges—which arise from variety of ritual are such that they must be restrained by active coercion. But, if so, may there not be equal heartburnings over doctrine? "No," in effect answer the Judges, while they lay down one principle for the control of the indirect teaching which may be drawn from the clergyman's acts in the desk and at the altar, and another for the control of the direct teaching which he offers from the pulpit. Mr. Bennett is set free to publish the opinions which have brought the Church Association down upon him; but woe betide the Vicar of Frouse if he stands at the communion service with his back to Mr. Sheppard, or puts on any raiment more gorgeous than the parish surplice.

The difficulty so gratuitously created can only be solved by the frank acceptance of the view which we believe is held by thoughtful Churchmen of all schools, that while the parochial system remains eminently useful as a national system of worship, education, and charitable organization, it is no longer possible or desirable to treat attendance at the parish church as a matter of individual obligation. Viewing the vast variety of tastes which divide the great multitude of its adherents, the Church of England can only justify its claims to national existence by a liberal recognition of that variety in the matter of worship. If we grant this premise, it is plain that no more practical course for giving it effect can be devised than the acknowledged permission to every clergyman to shape his type of worship according to the form which he conceives to be of the highest benefit to his flock, and to every Churchman to offer his devotions where he believes that he will derive the fullest spiritual advantage, subject to the condition, which is as easily cognizable by legal common sense in ceremonial as in doctrine, that the type of service which each clergyman presents shall not be flagrantly "contradictory or repugnant" to those ceremonial rules which must exist in a body constituted as the Church of England is. When a rite comes into question, its legality as distinct from its policy ought on the principles of this judgment to be tested, not on the consideration of whether the rubric "affirms" it, but on that of whether it "excludes" it. Its policy will of course turn on a comparison of the numbers of those whom it edifies, of those whom it offends but who can easily go elsewhere, and of those whom it offends and who have no such ready escape.

A more impartial respect for their own principles would, we think, have induced the Judicial Committee to reconsider the criticism of the Dean of Arches' phraseology with which it tempers its acceptance of his conclusions. The expressions of Sir Robert Phillimore were confessedly "extrajudicial." So are those with which the Privy Councillors sitting at Whitehall go out of their way to lecture their colleague sitting in the Arches Court. "The word 'receptionist' is as foreign," they say, "to the Articles as the word 'objective.'" As, however, there is nothing contradictory or repugnant to the formularies in those expressions, they might more wisely have abstained from "regretting extrajudicial" statements of their colleague, until they can show themselves able to provide any tangible substitute, or can prove that the "attitude of opinion" which they encourage in the pulpit must be checked on the Bench.

INTERNATIONAL AMENITIES.

WE are afraid that many of the people who go to see boat-races and other public sports do not invariably give themselves up to the sentiments and reflections appropriate to the occasion; but it is at least a comfort to think that they are sure to be informed next morning how they ought to have felt, and how in fact, as their benignant monitors are kind enough to assume, they did feel at the proper moment. Possibly a good many of those who waited wearily on Monday last to get a glimpse of the hollow contest between the London and Atlanta crews for what is called the "aquatic championship of the world," may have been disposed to lament their wasted hours and the poorness of the sport, and may not have been aware that they were then engaged in binding more closely the bonds of brotherhood between the nations, and performing other remarkable feats of a similar kind. But if they did not know it then, at any rate they know it now. Big Jupiter and Little Jupiter are agreed about this, and when they do agree, their agreement is wonderful. We are assured by the elder and duller deity that on Monday "America and England relieved the strain of their political contentions by throwing their interest for the moment into a rivalry more easily decided;" but it does not appear that this relief prevented Mr. Fish from writing a very ill-natured despatch. If it is true that "the friendly rivalry on the Thames represents the natural relation of the two countries," it is clear that the Alabama negotiations, in which the rivalry is more remarkable than the friendship, at least on the American side, convey a false impression. Jupiter, weighted with the responsibility of keeping the world straight, could not himself "forget all but a boating competition between the two nations," but he is confident in his hope that for lighter minds "these hours of amusement may be of service in arousing some healthy currents of good-feeling." Four Americans come over here to win a race; they make a laughing-stock of themselves by their ignorance of what in this country is supposed to be rowing, are beaten with ludicrous ease, and are nearly upset by a wherry; and we are asked to believe that the result will be to produce healthy currents of national good-feeling. This never occurred to us before, but perhaps the American Case may have been designed with a similar object. Young Jupiter is more lively, and, after his nature, more gushing on the subject. He is full, of course, of compliments to the United States. "It is by attempting the impossible that our Western kinsmen have risen to their grand pre-eminence"—that is, in everything except rowing. It was impossible they could beat us at that, but still if they keep on attempting the impossible they may do it at last, and then "our defeat will be in itself a triumph." This boat-race, we are told, illustrates the truth that our national energy, our stalwart strength, &c., enable us to hold our own against the dash and daring of our American kinsfolk; but here, again, the negotiations do not quite fit into the theory. It is suggested that "to any foreign observer the most striking reflections aroused by the whole affair must have been the thought how, after all, Englishmen and Americans are men of the same race and type." Any Frenchman who was present would no doubt be ready to admit that in this instance Americans and English were both subject to the same kind of lunacy, except that perhaps the Americans were the more conspicuously mad in having come so far on such an errand. And then we are treated to a paraphrase of the mythic nonsense attributed to the Duke of Wellington about the playing fields of Eton:—"The nerve and pluck and energy which animated both crews were the same that have carried England through many a trial, and have enabled America to uphold the Union in the darkest hours of its fortunes." These would be something almost pathetic, if it were not so intensely ludicrous, in the solicitude which is shown for the feelings of the United States under this terrible defeat, and the anxiety to cheer up that great country, and make things pleasant for it. But perhaps the finest touch of all is the exquisite self-complacency with which the Americans are assured, as if it were the best consolation and restorative that could be administered to them, that, after all, they are not so unlike Englishmen that a foreigner might imagine them to belong to the same race. It may be doubted whether the Americans will take this "whipping" very much to heart. The Atlantas were certainly not recognized as champions of their country to the same extent as the Harvard crew who formerly visited the Thames. But, in any case, it is amusing that anybody should imagine that if the Americans were really much interested in the matter, a competition of this kind, and especially the sort of consolation which has been offered to soothe defeat, would be likely to promote friendly feelings between the two nations. The Atlantas have not been interviewed by English reporters, and we are not aware what speculations they may have thought it necessary to take in order to protect themselves against the insinuations of jealous Englishmen. But we have some recollection of reading in the American papers an alarming narrative of the public with which the Atlantas were believed themselves to be surrounded, and repeating the name of poisoning is which they lived. It is perhaps significant of the generous sympathies which are supposed to be cultivated by these encounters, that there appears, according to the Daily News, to have been a popular impression that the Atlanta men had previously to the race been rowing "dark," in order to enable their friends to make bets more advantageously. It is now known that the Americans did the best they could all along, but the suspicion with which they were regarded is unpleasantly characteristic of one phase of modern sport.

It would appear that the brotherly love engendered by the international boat-race has not been sufficient to produce a satisfactory understanding between Mr. Fish and Lord Granville; but perhaps something better may be hoped from the International Musical Peace Jubilee which is to take place at the end of this month at Boston, and which is intended, in the words of the promoters, "to aid in removing somewhat of the prejudices which engender ill-feeling, and to create a better understanding between the nations of the world through the common medium of art." This description of the lofty objects of the speculation in question is taken from a touching letter written by the solicitors to the contractors who are getting it up, in answer to some observations in Parliament. It is not often that language of so elevating a character is to be found in a lawyer's letter, and it should be more highly prized on that account. The band of the Grenadier Guards has been despatched to Boston to take part in this grand festival, not, it seems, altogether to the satisfaction of military circles. It is not unnatural perhaps that the men of war should be alarmed at the prospect of their occupation being suddenly suppressed through the agency of their own band. There is a fine touch of poetical revenge in employing a number of military bands to play the world into universal peace. It is announced that the musical performances at the Jubilee will be sustained by a chorus of twenty thousand singers and an orchestra of three thousand instrumentalists. The performances will be kept up for fifteen days, exclusive of Sundays, and it is expected that a vast multitude will be collected to listen to the peace-inspiring strains of this host of singers and musicians. For the purposes of the Festival a "Coliseum" capable of seating one hundred thousand persons has been constructed at Boston. Superstitious people might possibly think it ominous that a considerable portion of this building fell down a short time since. It has since been rebuilt, but it is thought desirable to assure "timid persons" that the security and stability of the whole structure have been thoroughly tested, and that there is no reason to fear that it will give way again. It is evident from the nature of the performances that it will be severely tried when the orchestra is in full blast. We observe that an American journalist deems it prudent to warn persons of an excitable temperament that the strain on the nerves produced by the enormous volume of sound may prove to be rather trying, especially if submitted to for a fortnight without relaxation. It is suggested, therefore, that it will not be wise to attempt to sit out the whole of the performances; and we agree with the writer that those who go in for getting a full return for their money will be lucky if at the end of the fifteen days they come out with nothing worse than a headache.

In order to indicate the peaceful character of the festival, salvoes of artillery are to be introduced into the musical performances, and the din of a mob of military bands is to be reinforced by the thunder of a huge drum which has been constructed expressly for the occasion, and which is the biggest and noisiest monster of its kind that has ever been seen or heard. The Imperial Army Band of Berlin is to be present, and will, we suppose, engage in generous rivalry with the French Republican Band, each playing the cheerful tunes to which their countrymen were lately engaged in slaughtering each other; while the Grenadiers' Band will have the pleasure of meeting and possibly of joining in a duet with an Irish National Band, well up in Fenian melodies, which the speculative philanthropists who are now engaged in removing all "prejudices which engender ill-feeling" have expressly engaged for the occasion. A well-known preacher used to remark that he did not see why the Devil should have all the best tunes, and the promoters of the Boston Jubilee appear to be similarly of opinion that the time has come when the orchestra of war may appropriately be employed in the worship of perpetual peace and brotherly love. "Peace, on her hillock, piping her pastoral note," may for the moment be somewhat puzzled by this terrific explosion of the warlike strains which have hitherto attended the march of Mars. We can only hope that the intentions of the managers of the Jubilee will be fulfilled, and that "a better understanding between the nations" may be arrived at through "the common medium" of brass bands, big drums, and salvoes of artillery. All that is wanted would seem to be that the Alabama Commissioners should reassemble at Boston and sit out the fifteen days of soothing music.

It is possible that the experience of the last few months will suggest to many minds that the drawing together of the bonds of brotherhood between the nations, however desirable in itself, is not quite so simple and easy an operation as has been imagined. There are probably few people silly enough to suppose that there is any serious meaning in the nonsense which is talked and written about international fraternity and affection being developed by brass bands and boat-races; but there are, we suspect, too many who allow themselves to be deluded with the notion that the gravest international differences—differences having their roots deep in the character, history, and political circumstances of the respective countries—can be instantly charmed away by an Abre-cadabra of fine words about "common tongues," "national kinship," and the rest of it. There was evidently a notion when the High Commissioners met out for America, that such a pleasant-spoken man as Lord Ripon, with such a good cook, had only to go about in society, and give nice little dinners, and make nice little speeches, while Professor Bernard and his companions were racking their brains for the "least accurate" expressions in which they could convey the good understanding which was assumed, as a matter of course, to have been arrived at; and all would be well. On the whole there is perhaps about as much to be said for the efficacy of the big drum at Boston Jubilee "of bird's-eye maple, 6 ft. high, 12 ft. in diameter," with sticks to match, as of the fine speeches at Delmonico's which were supposed at the time to have put an end to all disagreements between England and America. One of the journals which were most gushing the other day about the international aspects of the boat-race appears to be still of opinion that it is "only a question of words" which keeps two great countries from rushing into each other's arms; but we should have thought that, if one thing was clearer than another, it was that the present difficulty has arisen simply because the question has been treated too much as one of words, and not of things, and that the power of words has now been fairly exhausted. All the embarrassments, perplexities, complications, and disappointments of the affair may be traced to the same source—a foolish faith in the magic influence of empty words. It is just as well that the delusion should be knocked on the head. Grave international questions are not to be settled off-hand by neat little after-dinner speeches, or flowery talk about "kith and kin" and "generous brotherhood," any more than by Musical Peace Jubilees, with military bands and a park of artillery to emphasize the aspirations after peace.

THE SORROWS OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

WE have received a pamphlet which sets forth a melancholy story. As it comes from the class aggrieved, we cannot rely upon the completeness or accuracy of its statements except so far as they are supported by official documents. Assuming, however, that they are substantially correct, it certainly appears that a useful body of public servants have some real ground of complaint; and in the hope that we may help them to receive at least a fair answer, if not a redress of their grievances, we are happy to give such publicity as we can to a moving appeal. It appears, then, that a Mr. Aston Blake was employed in September last in the Inland Revenue Department. Mr. Blake, as we infer from his letters, is a gentleman who may easily be supposed to be somewhat formidable to official superiors. He took to writing a series of letters to the Civil Service Commissioners, requesting explanations of certain regulations to which he was subjected, and declining to be satisfied with the answers which he received. The Civil Service Commissioners are naturally more in their element when asking than when answering questions. As may be imagined, the replies to his letters became shorter and less explanatory; one of his letters, indeed, received no reply at all, and a more urgent request for information merely elicited the statement that the Commissioners had nothing to add to their previous communication. It is not surprising that within a couple of months from this correspondence we find that Mr. Blake ceased to be an ornament to his office; or, as he less euphemistically expresses it, that he had been "kicked out." It is, however, more remarkable that this statement was made to a crowded audience of discontented writers, who received it with sympathetic "groans and hisses." For obvious reasons, these gentlemen seem to have been rather shy of allowing their names to appear. A paper called the Civilian, which reports the meeting, declares, we know not with what authority, that the meeting was singularly unanimous and enthusiastic. It adds further, that it was extremely respectable. "The writers," it says, "were not the cads we had expected. Amongst them came former schoolfellows, relatives, old associates, and men whom we had met with on terms of equality on some one of the highways and byways of life." It is not for us to say what precise standard of respectability is implied by the fact that a man has been a schoolfellow of the reporter of the Civilian, nor are we much enlightened by the further intimation that some of these gentlemen had "treated us rather cavalierly as they journeyed to Pall Mall or Whitehall to earwig the private secretary or confidential clerk of one of those potent personages who control the land and sea forces of Her Britannic Majesty Victoria." We are content to assume that, whatever their antecedents, the gentlemen in question were employed in our public offices, and, for our part, we should never have anticipated the propriety of describing them as "cads." Be that as it may, the fact appears to be that a large number of our public servants are in a state of extreme irritation and disgust. They want, as we all want, more liberal pay and longer holidays. If they had been bricklayers, or even agricultural labourers, they would have endeavoured, and very possibly with success, to secure those desirable objects by a strike. For very good reasons they have not had recourse to that mode of warfare; but they have formed an association, and are endeavouring by an appeal to members of Parliament and the proverbial tender-heartedness of Mr. Lowe to secure a greater measure of reward. Such complaints deserve at least a hearing, and we will try to state their case as simply as possible.

In the good old palmy days, before the blessings of universal competition were known to mankind, the clerks employed for the simpler sort of duties, such as copying despatches, received a rate of pay the minimum of which varied in different offices from 5s. to 6s. 6d. a day. There was generally an increase of salary for every year's service. There was a fortnight's leave of absence, and in some cases an allowance was made during sickness. With the first introduction of competition these advantages began to be pared away. A register was opened for "temporary writers," admission to which was to be obtained by examination. Clerks who had been employed for considerable periods were compelled to pass the new tests, and were then re-appointed at their old rates of pay; but with a stoppage of all holidays, and a deduction of pay for every absence, even of a fraction of an hour, whatever might be the cause. A new set of regulations appeared in August last, which made further alterations for the worse in the position of the clerks. Those who had served continuously since the 4th of June, 1870, were to continue to receive the salary paid to them at that date, but were to have no claims whatever for service subsequent to it. All other writers were to come under the new regulations. They were to be paid at a uniform rate of 10d. an hour, or 30s. a week—the official day consisting of six hours. All absences were to be deducted; no holidays allowed; they might be dismissed at an hour's notice; if they refused to serve when called upon, their names would be struck off the register; and though they might be called upon to go to any part of the kingdom, no allowance would be made for travelling expenses. The general effect of these regulations is obvious. The writers are no longer regarded as belonging to a permanent establishment. They gain by their success in competition nothing but the privilege of being placed upon a register, which gives them the chance of being called out to do as much work as may be desired at the rate of 10d. an hour. The public, instead of keeping a permanent staff of officials, simply has its work done by the job, and incurs no more obligations of any kind towards the persons whom it employs than a private person incurs towards his washerwoman or his tailor. It is a mere commercial transaction on both sides which ends when the particular transaction is completed, without leaving either side under an obligation; and, as a natural corollary, the terms are fixed at the lowest price possible. When the writers protest, they are met by the argument that men of "character, education, and capacity" are ready to replace them on the same terms. They reply that this should be a matter of grave concern and sympathy—which is undeniable—and add that it should not be regarded as a reason for screwing down the poor writers to the lowest possible point. This last assertion will be doubted by the severest school of political economists. Why not take advantage of the play of supply and demand? What is the justice of forcibly extracting six shillings from the rest of the population for the pay of a clerk when you can get another man to do the work respectably for five? There is no magic about the precise sum of 10d. an hour, though 11d. is doubtless more agreeable to the recipient. But how, on grounds of abstract justice, can one sum be pronounced to be much more equitable than the other? or, indeed, to what considerations is it possible to appeal, except to the practical teaching of experience, that 10d. or 11d. as the case may be, is necessary to produce the required article?

These considerations have been thrown in the teeth of the unfortunate writers, and we cannot say that they give a perfectly satisfactory answer when they quote the precept, "Masters, give unto your servants that which is just and equal." We still have to ask, what is just and equal, and by what tests is it to be decided? Neither is it conclusive to say that another set of people receive from twice to four times as much for doing work of no greater difficulty. That may perhaps only prove, what would not be an unprecedented phenomenon, that the public pays extravagantly for part of the service it receives. Why should we not leave the question to open competition, and allow the clerks, if they please, to try the effects of combination, which has proved so powerful in other kinds of employment? To say the truth, we do not see our way to giving a perfectly satisfactory answer to these questions without information which we do not possess. One or two remarks, however, may be made which incline us to the opinion that a real grievance is at the bottom of these complaints. Doubtless we can get the work done in some fashion or other for 10d. an hour, or possibly for less, but that fact alone is not sufficient to establish the policy of the proceeding. We require a certain degree of respectability even in persons employed to do work of a very mechanical kind. The writers have, it is probable, no very important secrets confided to their keeping; but yet, for reasons sufficiently obvious, it is desirable that everybody employed in a public office should possess a certain amount of honesty, intelligence, and zeal. Now the system of competitive examination unluckily provides no guarantee that any given standard will be reached. From the examination papers, of which specimens are given in the pamphlet before us, it is obvious that it is desired to obtain, not indeed very highly educated men, but still men who would be effective clerks in a merchant's office. It is plain, however, that the competitive system only secures that the best of those who present themselves shall be taken, and not that a certain standard shall be attained. Whatever may be the wishes of the examiners, they are practically compelled to conform their standard to the average of the competitors; and if the inducements offered are lowered, it is clear that the class of applicants will also be lowered, in spite of all the competition in the world. And, in the next place, it is scarcely to be expected that a very excellent class of public servants will be secured for a sum of 50s. a week, without the least guarantee of permanent employment, and without any chance that long service will be rewarded. Thirty shillings is not more than can be secured by an average mechanic; and the writers are obliged, as they say, to maintain "a scrupulous external respectability" which is not demanded from the artisan. It is a puzzle, to which we confess we see no answer, how a man with a family and a home is to keep himself decently clothed and fed and to bring up his family in tolerable comfort on such a pittance. The expenses of living daily increase; and the struggle becomes harder than of old. It seems plain, then, that in spite of the illusory safeguard of competition, the class of writers employed must degenerate, and we have no reason to suppose that even at present they are at all superior to that which we should desire to see employed. And, finally, it seems specially undesirable that the terms of employment should be such as to make the proverb surtout point de zèle a practical rule in the Civil Service. Yet it appears that anything like energy or interest in their duties is systematically discouraged by the present regulations for writers. Not only are they poorly paid, but they have nothing to look forward to. The State has the great advantage over other employers that it is immortal. It should therefore be able to get its work done on better terms, because it can promise permanent advantages in the shape of superannuation allowances and promotion. But promotion is not offered to the writers, who are a mere supernumerary class of pariahs, employed as they are wanted, and cast aside when their services become unnecessary. Their situation gives them no chance of rising, and the longest and most exemplary services cannot possibly be rewarded. A private employer may have bowels, but the State, bound by fixed regulations, has none; and therefore employment in a public office, so far from giving additional advantages, is plainly worse than employment at the same daily rate elsewhere. If any additional discouragement were wanted, it would be given by the refusal to allow holidays or to permit travelling expenses. A writer, it seems, must always be ready to serve the State at a moment's notice, and the State is under no reciprocal engagement to him. He is therefore under all the conditions which can tempt a man to scamp his work as much as possible and seek for other employment at the earliest possible opportunity. Under such circumstances it certainly seems that the writers have made out a good prima facie case; and that, unless there is some inaccuracy in their statements, we must expect a deterioration in the class employed and a growing want of zeal in the new generation.

FASHIONABLE SCREWS.

FINE ladies not unfrequently play at philanthropy. Such time as they can spare from dress and amusement they give to framing plans of relief for the poor. These are always plans that give their inventors a prominent position, that include society in its holiday clothes, and that depend for success on other people's pockets. Sometimes it is a concert, where you have to buy a ticket at an exorbitant price, to hear indifferent music badly rendered by second-rate professionals; or it may be an amateur affair, when the entertainment is yet more dreary, and you have to applaud with greater vehemence to cover the lack of interest and intrinsic merit; or it may be amateur theatricals, when you pay a week's living to see Lady Callipyge in tights and Miss Auricomus with her back hair down. But you have to do it. Your fine lady friends count on your support, and hold you to your sacrifice by the honour of your knighthood and as the confession of your service. If you are rich and a parvenu it is all very well. You do not miss your guineas, and you are content to pay handsomely for a front seat among the upper ten; and to be able to discuss my Lady Callipyge and Miss Auricomus among your own set with the air of a man who knows his world is a privilege worth a handsome outlay. If you are one of themselves, you pay of course for the honour of your order, though you think it a bore all the same; but if you are only one of the hangers-on, one of the semi-detached fringe, the impecunious appearances that float about the great world, mere gilt and not gold, and very thin gilt too, you know then what the force of the fashionable screw is when it is put on you, and you have to submit to be squeezed if you would still be received. There is of course the honour of the thing. Well, the honour counts for something, certainly; but your sparse guineas have their own eloquence too; and when you have to live up to the mark of people whose thousands would cover your units, you find your margin encroaching on your capital in an alarming manner. You would not mind so much perhaps if you could distil any amusement out of your expenditure. But, save for that barren honour of association, the philanthropic pleasures which fine ladies get up among themselves are mostly of the dullest, duller kind. Concerts, private theatricals, raffish, bazaars, fiets champêtres—what a sense of weariness steals over us as we jot down the list! The yawns that would not be stifled, try as heroically as we might; the laugh that would not come when the funny things were said, though we made hideous grimaces which we hoped would pass for genuine mirth; the interest that absolutely refused to be simulated; and that no amount of pumping up would bring to the surface; the ineffable emptiness and silliness and boredom of it all; and to think that generation after generation of fine, healthy, muscular men, and women who have souls to be saved, go in for this miserable kind of thing as if they liked it; and at each new outbreak of the old disease, make believe that it is a useful, a popular, and a dignified display of philanthropic zeal!

Perhaps a charitable bazaar is the most objectionable of all the screws in use, because giving the most trouble to the largest number of persons, and loading the conscience of every one concerned with a variety of burdens, any one of which we should imagine unendurably painful to the sensitive. In the first place there has been called into existence, at great pains and cost, a lot of absolutely worthless things; pincushions that will not hold pins; penwipers, the beads or fluffy ends of which get into the slit of the pen; smoking-caps of violent patterns, that cannot possibly fit any head bigger than a turnip, or else so large that they would do for Gargantua himself; dauby "art," the best destination of which would be to light the kitchen fire; bead ornaments that no woman who respected herself would wear, and that are fit only for savages; and various articles for gentlemen's use, such as "shaving tidies" and the like, which are enough to send any man mad who has them in his possession. The name of the trumpery, absolutely useless and absurd, paid for at fabulous prices, and bought under a pressure that is little better than a polite method of swindling, is legion; but the object, whatever it may be, for which the bazaar has been got up, is assumed to justify the means; and to supply the poor dear natives of equatorial Africa with tracts and blankets is a cause so holy that it covers a thousand sins against common sense, good taste, and the first principles of trade and honesty. On the other hand, a bazaar gives a certain amount of pleasure to a certain set of people. There are, first, the ladies holding the stalls. They have for one excitement that of dress, with its concomitant, admiration; for another the till. If they are young or pretty, or of exceptionally high position, their counter is thronged, and they are complimented and stared at to satiety. They make merchandise of their smiles, and drive a roaring trade in their cartes-de-visite and autographs, with miserable little coat bouquets made up and fastened in by their own hands, and sold at prices more like the current rates of El Dorado than of London; so that their "take" soon swells beyond their neighbours' and rivals', and with it their enjoyment of their friends' annoyance and their own glory, and of the day's doings altogether. For among the reasons against philanthropic bazaars must be counted the malice, hatred, and all uncharitableness which they engender among the ladies who hold the stalls, and the unchristian sentiments cherished by each fashionable boutiquière, according to her own comparative failure and the success of her friends. That does not prevent a certain amount of personal pleasure, however, even in the least successful; of which perhaps the greater part has been anticipatory, though something is due to association, and to the glory of having one's name printed on rose-tinted circulars at the tail of a dozen peeresses, with Her Gracious Majesty or His Royal Highness to head the ruck. It gives pleasure too to the crowd of moneyed snobs who think it well worth the cost to stand at one side of a deal plank laid on trestles and covered with pink calico, chaffering for cigar-cases and worsted work, with the Countess of this or the Duchess of that condescending for the moment to be shopkeepers, and not above the less reputable arts of their prototypes. And it gives pleasure to young girls who have no money of their own, and consequently are not expected to buy, and for whom things are bought by the gentlemen or the kind old aunts of the party. The carpenters and confectioners employed also get their gain out of the affair; and the microscopic "stimulus to trade," represented by so many yards of material and so many reels of thread as have been used in the rubbish turned out, must be taken into account. But when these have been summed up, nothing remains behind but vanity and vexation of spirit, and a large surplus of unusable trash.

These are truths which every one knows, and which have been repeated a dozen times. Yet they make no kind of impression. Year after year sees the same dreary whip applied to the generosity of the rich and the mercy of the charitable; and philanthropic objects which ought to need no recommendation but themselves are touted for by the same kind of vulgar glare and glitter, say in a fête champêtre, that once went to make up town fairs and village festivals. Save that the guests are all well dressed, and the English spoken for the most part unexceptionable, there is absolutely no difference in kind between a fête champêtre held in a private park for an object and the old fairs of our youth. The amusements are essentially of the same character, if less gross in display; except indeed that the jugglers and acrobats, being hired for the day, are seldom so racy and full of vigour as when their suppers depend on their own exertions. There are the same stupid games of chance, whereof the winnings are things you cannot eat or things you cannot use; and the same mild games of skill, such as knock-em-downs and Aunt Sallys, Giant's mouths, and the like. There are the Tyrolean singers, in conical hats with peacocks' feathers at the side, flinging out their famous jodels under the trees; and perhaps, if the promoters are people of inventive genius and can light on a clever becker, there is the cave where the hermit or the gipsy tells fortunes for an extra fee, and makes shrewd guesses at probabilities, previously prompted by one who knows, that set the simpler minds afloat with wonder how over they were found out. There are shady walks where flirtations are carried on, and retired seats where engaged lovers are always to be found; there are counters where lukewarm ices are sold, with cupps of weak tea and stale sandwiches interspersed. But though the arrangements have a certain aristocratic finish about them which the village festival and the town fair had not, and the military band and striped bunting surpass all that Hodge can do in the way of music and canvas, still the fête champêtre for an object, where the company pays for entrance, and where all the amusements provided are offered at a separate charge, is only the same thing as a fair differently conditioned, and not half so amusing, if a trifle more expensive and a great deal less immoral; which last ought perhaps to make the score.

To our mind the whole thing is a mistake. If objects or institutions want help, let them be brought before the public in a manly, straightforward way. A distinct statement of their work, and as distinct an exposition of their difficulties, a simple and therefore pathetic history of some of the more striking of their cases, and indisputable evidence that they are wanted both in the sphere and the locality they have chosen, are more earnest and more dignified means of appealing to the public than the mock trading of a bazaar, or the dreary fun of a fête champêtre. Of course the counter argument is that people with money are usually so frivolous and stupid that they are to be got at only through their vanities and their selfishness. Offer them occasions for display, or the pretence of a quid pro quo, the association of fine-sounding names, or the semblance of amusement, and their guineas will flow in liberally, where the eloquence of a Bossuet and the philanthropy of a Howard would fall like water upon a sandhill. And as the world is governed mainly by expediency, and all folks think it the wisest policy, if not the highest morality, to live down to their surroundings, those who have the cause of institutions and the success of objects at heart think it well to make friends with mammon if they can, and to get by spurious motives help which they say would not come to them through truer ones. We doubt this. We do not believe in building anything whatever on quagmires; and the cause which has to be shored up by such artificial means as these fashionable screws of so-called amusement is a cause that will never stand its ground in the long run. We are afraid, however, that it is no use preaching; the season has set in, and tracts and blankets for the dwellers in equatorial Africa, as well as other things nearer home, are to be found among the summer list of causes for which we shall be bidden to bazaars and fêtes, and asked to join in raffles and all the other hateful means by which charity is rendered odious and philanthropy ridiculous.

CHURCH AND STATE IN GERMANY.

THE Old Catholic movement seems to be every day becoming more and more of a burning question for the State, both in Northern and Southern Germany. In the North, Prince Bismarck has taken up the cudgels against the Ultramontane clergy with a vigour which is all the more remarkable from the studious neutrality of his earlier policy in religious controversies. The Jesuits may perhaps in one sense be considered safe game to fly at. That dark whispers of their personal vengeance should be current in connexion with the alleged indisposition of the Imperial Chancellor is natural enough. For the names of Gioberti and Cardinal Andra, not to speak of more recent stories about Strosmayer, may suffice to remind us that the suspicion of poison has by no means become obsolete on the Continent, however long it may have survived the actual practice. The belief in Ganganelli's untimely fate is still widely prevalent, at least among Protestants, after the lapse of a century, and was elaborately defended not many years ago by a writer in the Quarterly Review, though the physician who examined his body at the time unhesitatingly ascribed his death to natural causes. Setting aside, however, these subtle grounds of apprehension, there can be no doubt that Prince Bismarck will carry with him a considerable body of Catholic as well as Protestant feeling in his stringent measures against the Jesuits. It was by the urgent desire of the French Government, and with the express sanction of the other Catholic Cabinets, that Clement XIV. suppressed the Order in 1773; and if their direct political influence has been less conspicuous since their restoration by Pius VII. forty years later, their energies have certainly not shown any sign of abatement, and their number has risen during the last half-century to more than half what it had become in the two centuries before the suppression. In Germany they have long held the virtual direction of Catholic education, both primary and superior, in their hands, and for some twenty years past they have made strenuous use of their vantage ground for indoctrinating both the hierarchy and the people with infallibilist beliefs. The German College at Rome, at which several of the existing bishops were trained, is under their exclusive management. On these and other grounds the Jesuits have provoked a strong antagonism in Germany, and their expulsion from the country, whatever may be thought of the abstract justice of so high-handed a measure, would probably be regretted by a minority only of the clergy, and a still smaller minority of laymen. It is rather in his challenge to what one of our contemporaries calls, with lofty disregard for the niceties of ecclesiastical terminology, "the regular clergy"—meaning thereby the secular as distinct from the regular clergy—that Prince Bismarck seems to be treading on dangerous ground. The Bishop of Ermland is threatened with ulterior measures if he persists, as he certainly will, in his refusal to withdraw the excommunication of Old Catholic priests; and the Army Bishop Namazowski, has been removed from his office for prohibiting mass to be celebrated in a military church at Cologne polluted by the performance, at a different hour, of Old Catholic worship, whereupon the Pope has lost no time in consoling him by the titular dignity, much coveted by Catholic prelates, of "Assistant to the Pontifical Throne." So matters stand between Church and State in Prussia for the moment, and it is easier to foresee the impossibility of their continuing in statu quo than to predict the ultimate result. As to the moral and numerical strength of the anti-infallibilist movement among the fourteen million Catholic subjects of the Empire, opinions seem much divided; and there are so many who, for various reasons, hesitate to show their hand, that any opinion on the subject must be more or less conjectural. That the mass of the educated laity do not believe in Papal infallibility is hardly denied, the favourite retort of their Ultramontane opponents being that neither do they believe in the Trinity. But precisely the same sort of criticism is made, and apparently with quite as much reason, on the good faith of pronounced Infallibilists. Such charges, and others still more odious, are sure to be freely bandied about in times of religious controversy, and it is not possible till the smoke of the battle is cleared away to ascertain the true position and relative strength of the rival forces. But to speak like Herr Montang in the German Parliament, of "a disturbance in the Church caused by six professors and as many apostate priests," is to turn a serious subject into a comedy.

Meanwhile in the South of Germany a grave difference has arisen between the Bavarian Government and almost the entire professoriate of the Munich University, which includes, not six, but fifty-three, Catholic professors. The Cabinet of Herr Lutz, as our readers are aware, has long since announced its resolve to maintain intact the rights of Old Catholics, both civil and religious, but it is somewhat hampered in the practical carrying out of this policy by the Ultramontane party in the Chambers, partly composed of priests and elected in great measure under clerical influence. The demand of the Bishops for coercive powers against their refractory clergy was refused, as well on the ground of the Council not yet being over and its decrees therefore not being binding, as of the illegal promulgation of those decrees without the placitum regium, and the violent measures by which it had been followed up by the episcopate. But a second and more plausible demand met with a different reception. The Bishops asked for an endowment of 4,000 fl. for the establishment of new Professors of Philosophy and Ecclesiastical History in the University—to supplement or supplant the existing staff—to whose lectures they might send their theological students. The blow was of course aimed directly at Dr. Dollinger, who has for the last forty years held the chair of Ecclesiastical History at Munich. The Ministry referred the request to the Chambers, where a majority decided against it, as inconsistent with the policy already proclaimed of giving no recognition to the Vatican Council. But the close of the Session was at hand; the budget of Worship and Education had still to be passed, including 20,000 fl. for the University jubilee, this being the 400th anniversary of its foundation, and strong pressure was brought to bear on the Government by the Ultramontane or "patriotic" party to get the 4,000 fl. included too. It was urged that no principle would be given up, and that after all it would rest with the Senate—a select body of professors—to accept or decline the proffered gift. The Government caught at this plea for shifting the responsibility from their own shoulders, and the additional sum was voted in the budget; and thus the question of appointing additional professors as substitutes for those in office came before the Senate. It would have been easy enough of course for the Bishops to have lectures on philosophy and history after their own mind delivered in the Theological Seminary attached to the University, but that would not have suited their purpose. The Senate, with Dollinger, the Rector Magnificus for this year, at its head, was called upon to pronounce sentence on itself for heterodoxy, by appointing infallibilist substitutes to teach what it has formally repudiated as errors both of fact and faith. It was intimated, moreover, by the Minister of Worship that, unless the 4,000 fl. for additional professors were accepted, the 20,000 fl. for the expenses of the jubilee could not be paid. The Senate, however, was firm, and declined to accept the money on these humiliating conditions. It should be added that, while the legal right of appointing professors rests exclusively with the Government, it is always customary to consult the wishes of the University in the matter, and that to appoint them against its will would be looked upon as a very abnormal and tyrannical procedure. This, however, is what the Ultramontane organs are urging them to do, while accepting the refusal of the 20,000 fl. for the jubilee; the rest of the press, as a rule, takes the side of the University. It has, on the other hand, been suggested as a middle course that the Government, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, should take the matter entirely into its own hands, and carry out the vote of the Chambers by itself naming the two supplementary professors, while at the same time handing over to the University the 20,000 fl. for the celebration of its fourth centenary. Such a course would certainly be more straightforward and less offensive than that which it is actually pursuing; but, if adopted at all, it should obviously have been adopted from the first. To attempt to extort from the Senate an unwilling consent to what it could hardly fail to regard as an act of self-stultification, by the threat of withdrawing the necessary means for the observance of a great public solemnity long looked forward to, is a course not more irritating than undignified, and does not say much for the wisdom or firmness of the present Bavarian Cabinet. The representatives of the various parishes of Munich have meanwhile unanimously resolved to adopt all requisite measures, with as little delay as possible, for taking part in the approaching jubilee. So for the present the matter rests. There is meanwhile a contest going on between the Archbishop and the academical authorities about the services at St. Louis, the University church, which, like St. Mary's at Oxford, is also a parish church, but in this the Government does not appear to have interfered.

What makes this affair the more irritating to a large body of German Catholics is that they specially pride themselves on their national Universities as a characteristic distinction in which no other country can rival them, and which for that very reason they suspect some of seeking to mutilate or destroy. It seems also that for the last ten years a schema has been maturing, with the support of the Bishops and certain wealthy ladies, for the establishment of a high school at Fulda on strictly Roman principles, for which from 30,000 to 40,000 florins have already been subscribed; while there has been no attempt to introduce a Catholic Faculty of Theology at the new Imperial University at Strasburg, though two-thirds of the inhabitants of Alsace are Catholics. It is not unnaturally suspected that the Curia looks with a jealous eye on Universities altogether, and is really, under the pretext of securing liberty of teaching, declaring war against scientific culture, as Germans understand the term. There has been much in the policy of the Jesuits to foster this suspicion, and it will be remembered that the Old Catholic Congress of last September at Munich—which is to resemble this autumn at Cologne—followed up its demand for the liberal education of the clergy by a protest against the mischievous influence of the Order on education and a demand for its suppression. It is a similar feeling, from a precisely opposite point of view, which inspires the angry comparison which Ultramontane divines are so fond of insisting on between the infallibility of the Pope and the infallibility of the professors.

SMALL BIRDS.

THERE is an old question as to the limits of legislation in regard to the small affairs of life. There are many things which people ought, or ought not, to do which can hardly be brought within the scope of Acts of Parliament; but it is sometimes difficult to say exactly where the line should be drawn. A member of the House of Commons lately proposed, for example, that there should be a Royal proclamation against the eating of lamb and veal, on the ground that it was wasteful and extravagant to eat young sheep and calves which, if allowed to attain maturity, would supply a larger amount of nourishing food for the community. Mr. Gladstone, admitting the force of the argument—which, however, is in some respects rather plausible than sound, since it leaves out of account the cost of feeding the animals till they grow up—very properly pointed out that it would never do for the State to interfere in such matters, and that all that could be done was to trust to the growth of an intelligent public opinion on the subject. Another question of this kind is the extent to which it is possible or expedient to afford legislative protection to wild birds. The more valuable kinds of game are already protected. Grouse, partridges, and pheasants each have their close times during which they are allowed to breed in peace and safety. It seems a natural extension of the principle that this protection should also be secured to other descriptions of wild fowl which form a staple article of food and commerce; and Mr. A. Johnston's Bill, containing this proposal, has been unanimously read a second time in the House of Commons. Mr. Johnston proposes that it should be made unlawful to kill, wound, or take wild fowl in the United Kingdom between the 1st of April and the 1st of August in any year. Any person who is detected in the act of pursuing or killing wild fowl, or who is in possession of any wild fowl "recently killed, wounded, or taken" during the close period, will be liable to a fine not exceeding a pound for every bird. The Bill enumerates thirty-five different kinds of wild fowl as coming within the general definition of "staple articles of food and commerce"; but though they are all used, more or less, as food, here are some of them which can hardly be regarded as regular articles of commerce. The birds mentioned are chiefly of the curlew, plover, mallard, snipe, wild duck, and woodcock species, and the names of some of them are quite unfamiliar except to ornithologists and sportsmen who have devoted themselves especially to small game of this kind. How many people, we wonder, know what a dunlin is, or a godwit, a phalarope, a pochard, a plover, or a whimbrel? There is an exception in the Bill the logic of which we fail to apprehend. It is provided that the section protecting wild fowl shall not apply when the birds are young and unable to fly. We should have thought that some of the reasons which require that protection should be afforded to grown-up birds applied with at least equal force to young ones. Again, nothing is said about the taking of eggs; and here we come upon an obvious difficulty. How is the consumption of plovers' eggs to be checked during the London season? Mr. Hanley observed that, if we were to fine people who shot or gared plovers, the next step would be to fine people who ate plovers' eggs; since it would be almost impossible of view of preserving the birds, to protect them from being that, but to allow their eggs to be taken and eaten with impunity. A severe logic would certainly require that an immediate should be placed on the eating of eggs, and it is probable that the confectioners would have little difficulty in inventing an agreeable substitute. But as long as people are willing to pay for plovers' eggs at their present price, it would be trying in the face of political economy to doubt that a supply will be forthcoming in answer to the demand; and before fining or imprisoning the consumers of these dainties, it will perhaps be as well to try the effect of moral suasion. Under Mr. Johnston's Bill, there will at least be more birds to breed, and consequently more eggs to spare. If it were to be decided that the offence should be brought within the range of the criminal law, there would be some rather nice questions to be settled, as, for example, whether the penalty should fall on the host who placed the forbidden delicacies on his table, or on the guest who rashly partook of them. Lady Blanche at Bow Street for reckless indulgence in plovers' eggs is certainly a startling prospect.

It was perhaps hardly to be expected that Mr. Anson Herbert should be content with so rational and moderate a proposal as Mr. Johnston's Bill. Mr. Herbert has no patience with partial or gradual reforms, and always soars far above those practical considerations which are suggested by prudence and expediency. The Bill before the House is founded on a simple principle, which has already been recognized in other cases. Game and certain kinds of fish are protected by close seasons as being articles of food and commerce of which it is important on public grounds that a supply should be kept up. Mr. Johnston proposes that various descriptions of wild fowl which come within the same category shall also be protected in a similar manner. This is tolerably plain sailing, but Mr. Herbert insisted that the Bill ought to be extended so as to embrace all the birds in the kingdom, down to sparrows and tom-tits. His delicate sensibilities were offended by the strong smell of the larder which he detected in the measure as it stood. No account was taken of any birds except those which were fit for the table, or of any enjoyment to be derived from birds except in the way of eating them. With all, or nearly all, that Mr. Herbert urged on behalf of the birds we cordially agree. It is very much to be desired that the wholesale destruction of small birds through ignorance, brutality, or petty cupidity should be checked. The only question is as to the practicability of doing any good by severe legislation on the subject. An official inquiry which took place a few years ago in France proved very clearly the important services which the small birds render to agriculture. What they eat is often an insignificant quantity compared with what they save from the depredations of insects. It is well known that the tiniest twitterer is not beneath the notice of the Gallic sportsman when he sallies forth with his dogs and gun and a huge gibecière at his side. In France the denizens of the hedgerows are not only regarded as excellent sport, but as luxuries of the table; and the famous recipe for cooking red-breasts will not be forgotten:—"This amiable songster is excellent when done in bread crumbs." The farmers, too, waged war on the birds on their own account, vowing vengeance on them as a race of brigands. The result was that the birds began to grow scarce, and the insects got the upper hand, very much to the disgust of the farmers, who found that their condition was now insufferable, and appealed for help to the Minister of Agriculture. It is probable that the investigation which was ordered by the Minister produced a good effect in France and in this country also. It showed the farmers who were their best friends. The Sparrow Clubs which were ostentatiously busy in some English counties a few years since have been shamed into obscurity, if not inactivity. M. Geoffroy St. Hilaire proved by the examination of the stomachs of certain birds that they lived chiefly on insects, and that their assistance against the latter was cheaply purchased at the cost of the comparatively small quantity of grain and fruit which they appropriated to themselves. Mr. Herbert quoted the anecdote about Frederick the Great and the sparrows; he had set a price upon their heads, having found them at his cherries, but, after a year or two, he was glad not only to abolish the premium for killing sparrows, but to import them at his own expense. Lady Darnley Counts, in her last letter, mentions a more authentic incident. Mr. Rose, the Queen's gardener, having one day killed a blackbird which was flying from a strawberry bed, was seized with remorse when he saw that it was carrying off a large snail. It is impossible, however, altogether to clear the character of the birds, and some of them are worse than others. Thrushes and blackbirds are exasperatingly destructive in fruit-gardens, and the wood-pigeon in many districts is an intolerable pest. The argument in favour of the birds, on the ground that they are a protection against insects, may easily be pushed too far. Indeed a similar plea might be started on behalf of the snails, and of all kinds of parasites and vermin, none of whom are without a useful mission of some kind or other. The common sense view is that the birds do both good and harm, and the balance between the two depends very much on local circumstances. The wanton and indiscriminate slaughter of small birds deserves the strongest censure, but it is quite possible that they require to be kept down a little.

When Mr. Herbert has pursued his political studies a little further he will perhaps discover that, before passing a law, it is worth while to consider whether it has any chance of being enforced. It has been asserted that our legislation already shows some alarming symptoms of a mania for the creation of unenforceable laws, and this state of things would certainly make the climate of bird-mongering were to be made a criminal offence. The objection to Mr. Herbert's proposal that all birds should be protected is simply that it could not be carried out. We agree with Lady Darnley Counts that what we have most to hope for is the diffusion of correct information and the cultivation of habits of reflection as to the uses, feelings, and capabilities of the animal world. And we are glad to see that the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which has already done much good service in this respect, is disposed to rely chiefly on moral and educational agencies. Mr. Johnston's Bill appears to have been prepared by the Society in concert with a Committee of the British Association; but we are not aware that it has given any countenance to Mr. Herbert's fantastic and impracticable proposal. We cannot say that we share Mr. Herbert's fastidious objection to the smell of the larder, but the considerations which weigh with us most strongly in desiring to see a check put upon the wanton and reckless destruction of small birds certainly do not relate either to their flavour on the table or to the value of their assistance in agricultural operations. It will be a good thing in itself if the murderous instincts which appear to possess a considerable section of the population can be restrained. Nothing can be more disgusting than the stupid brutality of the people who go about shooting swallows, gulls, and other birds for the mere sake of slaughter, and who cannot restrain the impulse to shoot everything that comes within range if they happen to have a gun in their hands. Mr. Lowe's Gun-tax has perhaps done some good in this direction. It has helped to diminish the number of guns which were perpetually pointed at all sorts of living creatures in pure wantonness and malice. In Massachusetts and some other American States the birds of the fields and hedgerows are protected by strict enactments, but there seems to be some doubt as to whether the enactments are closely enforced. If the Wild Fowl Bill is passed, we shall have some experience to guide us as to how far it is desirable to carry this kind of legislative interference. In the meantime, there is a great deal to be done by precept and example. While educated and, as they profess to consider themselves, refined gentlemen engage in the wretched butchery which goes by the name of battues and pigeon-shooting, it is not surprising that less intelligent and refined natures should be encouraged in the indulgence of their brutal instincts. It appears that the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals is engaged in active missionary work in Spain, Italy, and elsewhere on the Continent. It has sent to the curé and school-master of every village in Spain "an almanack beautifully illustrated, and adapted to the tastes and requirements of Spaniards." There are various classes among our own population who might perhaps be the better for a distribution of almanacks adapted to their special weaknesses.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

VI.

THE portraits of the year may possibly be saved from absolute dreariness if taken as a sign of the times, or as a gauge of the rise and fall of the art of the country. Several styles are readily distinguished. There are what may be called society portraits—pretty and pink, fashionable, flouncy, and fluffy. Mr. Sant, R.A., sometimes, and Mr. Backner always, thus favour the Academy with the latest mode of the milliner's shop. Then there are subject portraits—ladies at a card-table, actors playing their parts, gentlemen on horseback in the hunting-field; and thus, after the manner of Reynolds, sitters are by happy attitude and fitting action disposed into more or less charming pictures. Mr. Millais is the great master of this process of picture portraiture; Sir Francis Grant, Mr. Watts, and one or two others in minor degrees, also seek to escape monotony by action, incident, or pleasing accessories. Again, there is what may be termed the intellectual portrait; statesmen, men of science or of letters—usually endowed with fine brains, piercing eyes, firm or flexible lips—have generally a presence sufficiently pictorial to dispense with decorative or distracting details. Mr. Richmond, R.A., Mr. Knight, R.A., Mr. Watts, R.A., Mr. Millais, R.A., and Mr. Wells, R.A., have been, or are, identified in their art with some of the finest intellects of our age. Furthermore, a distinction may be made between naturalistic or realistic portraits and portraits which tend to historic or ideal treatment. To the former class belongs plebeianism in portraiture—e.g. heads of educated mechanics, manufacturers suddenly become art patrons; the figures are usually bulky and aldermanic; the hands, often free from the mill or the counter, are naturally wanting in the graceful bend at the wrist, in the fine attenuation of the fingers, which mark the sitters of Van dyck from Charles I. downwards. This plebeian and commercial style may be characterized as solid and stolid. As an antidote there fortunately still exist certain historic or ideal treatments, in some measure borrowed from the old masters, but also taken direct from nature, the artist working on the immutable principles which the great painters discovered or exemplified. Mr. Watts, and also occasionally Mr. Richmond, draw, paint, and plan their portraits in accordance with historic precedents. Take, for example, the head by Mr. Watts of his fellow-Academician, Mr. Calderon (153); the manner is that of Titian. This now exceptional mode seems to depend on three leading conditions—selection of the governing idea, subjection of all that is rightly subordinate to that one idea, and lastly, the surrender of everything which detracts from the mental or pictorial value of the idea. It would appear to be needful to the perfection of this ideal portraiture that the idea chosen should be identified with the sitter in his happiest moments. It is to be feared that the portraits in the Academy, judged by any such standards, show the decadence of art.

Mr. Sant has accomplished a difficult task with fair credit. Among Royal pictures—seldom distinguished by art merit—ranks well the large portrait of "Her Majesty the Queen, with her Grandchildren, the Princes Albert Victor and George and Princess Victoria of Wales" (259). Mr. Sant is a great improvement on M. Winterhalter. For children he has had few equals since Reynolds, as will be at once apparent from the picture of the youthful "Son of Henry R. Farrer, Esq." (313). No doubt Mr. Millais has thrown off a more consummate work of art in the prettiest boy picture of the year, that of "Master Liddell, son of Charles Liddell, Esq." (280). In the drawing we recognize a subtlety and sense of beauty common to Vandyck and Lawrence; in the subdued splendour of colour we might fancy ourselves among the Venetians. But the painter's triumph is reserved for three sisters, who will henceforth be scarcely less famous in picture galleries than the three daughters of Palma Vecchia. Art quality, rather than accuracy in likeness, has rendered portraits celebrated; great historic portraits, with few exceptions, are prized less as portraits than as pictures. To this rule "Hearts are Trumps" (223) may prove no exception, inasmuch as it seems doubtful whether the three "Daughters of Walter Armstrong, Esq." (223) will ever take their place in the family portrait gallery, the picture being said to have found a purchaser among the general public on the abstract ground of art merit. And indeed in skilful, brilliant, and rapid handling, in colour daring and dazzling, yet in keeping and concord, in light-giving lustre not less refulgent than luminous frescoes in Italy, these portraits are more than portraits. Persons curious in technique will find it worth while to examine the workmanship both close and at a distance. Near to the eye the strokes of the brush seem random and ragged, the paint stands boldly out as if the canvas were a bas-relief, the draperies appear sketchy and unfinished, the whole picture indeed looks careless and offhand; yet if the spectator will stand back six or eight feet, the composition at once comes together and tells with a force so extraordinary that every adjacent picture suffers loss. A humorous writer has conjectured that "the artist must have painted with a brush about eight feet long, working upon a swivel like a duck-gun." Mr. Millais passes from gay to grave when he comes to deal with "Sir James Paget, Bart." (554), a portrait of calm outlook, with that air of mental introspection which anxious thought or responsibility induces. Another figure by Mr. Millais we mention for the sake of comparison with the assailable colouring of Mr. Orchardson. "The Marquis of Westminster" (567), by the former, and the "Portrait of a Lady" (492), by the latter, are hung as companion pictures; in each the figure is as red as that of a Cardinal. Mr. Millais takes pains to mitigate the hunting-coat; Mr. Orchardson, on the contrary, makes the lady's dress a blaze of fiercest red; and yet the head stands out firmly, and balance is restored by a skilful play of complementary colour in the background. This portrait is a fearless venture; in other hands it might have turned out a fearful failure.

It were wearisome to mention one half of the portraits which reach that safest of all standards, respectable mediocrity. We must not forget, however, "The Lord Poltimore and Hounds" (337), the great achievement of the President. In clear daylight, pleasant but chalky, his lordship appears on horseback; in fine perspective, all "chiaro" and no "oscuro," the landscape and distant huntsman are seen over the backs of about twenty hounds, who joyfully wag twenty tails in honour of "The Cattistock Hunt." The picture is good of its kind. For the sake of brevity we simply indicate portraits more or less distinguished by individuality and artistic treatment, from Mr. Goodall, R.A. (545), Mr. Wells, R.A. (220), M. Gallait, H.F.A., Mr. Elmore, R.A. (367), Mr. Calderon, R.A. (65), Mr. Richmond, R.A. (194, 336), Mr. W. B. Richmond (172), Mr. Prinsep (1080), Mr. Herdman, R.S.A. (475), Mr. Archer, R.S.A. (283), Mr. Macbeth, A.R.S.A. (1026), M. Bauerle (583), Mr. Oulless (366), Mr. J. C. Moore (32), and Mr. Whistler (941). This list might be extended almost indefinitely, so universal has the painting of portraits become among Academicians and others. A survey of the entire collection would seem to point to the natural conclusion that the artist who paints portraits and nothing else falls into monotony and a restricted range, whereas painters who descend to portraiture from the higher sphere of historic or creative art are more fertile in the expedients whereby dull heads may be enlivened, plain faces adorned, or subjects otherwise unpromising transmuted into agreeable pictures. Marked originality or bold departure from ordinary routine is exceptional; of such exceptional merit, however, we may quote two examples. One is a little girl in a riding dress with a whip in her hand (32), a simple enough theme. But Mr. J. C. Moore has managed to throw into the figure a quaintness, independence, and personality which we might expect to find in one of the early Italian artists were to sit down to paint modern character in modern costume. Mr. Moore was first known to us in landscape, and the harmony he evoked out of greys and sandy tints on the banks of the golden Tiber he still retains in his portraits. Another portrait, wholly exceptional, we owe to

Mr. Whistler, known in etching as a consummate master of light and shade. For chiaroscuro, for tone, for tender and true relations between light and shade, the "Arrangement in Grey and Black, Portrait of the Painter's Mother" (941), is very skilful. The attitude of the figure, seated and in profile, seems to have been suggested by two famous statues—the portrait of Agrippina in the Capitol, and Canova's portrait of the mother of Napoleon I. at Chatsworth. Yet Mr. Whistler has so blurred the face that we can hardly suppose portraiture was his primary purpose; the main motive would seem to be a play on monotone, and the one colour is so managed as to suggest many—an illusion known in the sister art of engraving.

The Slade Professor at the London University has thought fit to speak at the Royal Institution in disparagement of landscape; he would, in fact, exalt figure painting to the annihilation of landscape art—that art in which it used to be thought our English school stood supreme. Landscape painting, asserts Mr. Poynter, is the mere transcript and imitation of nature; figure painting, it is assumed, is something more; therefore we are to conclude that figure painting is superior to landscape painting. A ready answer to this argument would seem to be that each art is just what a painter chooses to make of it; that the human figure may be degraded quite as easily as a tree, a mountain, or a sky, and that, on the other hand, each element in a landscape can be, and has been, exalted by painters gifted with poetic insight and creative imagination. In proof of this position may be quoted the much decried John Martin and Francis Danby in our English school, and Claude, Poussin, and Salvator Rosa among foreign schools. We so fully agree with the high tone of Mr. Poynter's teachings that we the more regret he should have failed to see that the ideal principles which he enunciates may yet save our landscape art from the meanness and triviality of servile imitation. And indeed, on looking round the Academy, it would seem to us that in the utter discomfiture of the so-called pre-Raffaellites the path of the future no longer leads downwards, but upwards. At all events, in the landscapes of Mr. Vicat Cole (110, 550), Mr. Leader (151), Mr. Peter Graham (1055), Mr. Dillon (946), and Mr. Raven (84) we recognize an effort to bring the scattered elements of nature into subordination, unity, and symmetry; to give just value to the primary conception, the ruling idea; to reduce composition to a system and a law. Even Mr. Raven, who has struggled through a trying apprenticeship to pre-Raffaellism, learns at last the distinction between a study and a picture, the difference between art and nature; he sees the necessity of merging detail which militates against the dominant sentiment. Such, in short, seems to be the secret of his success in "A Hampshire Homestead" (84); each leaf that quivers against the sunset sky is brought into keeping with the quietude which has taken undisturbed possession of the landscape. In like manner Mr. Vicat Cole, in "Noon" (110), the chief landscape of the year, has been at infinite pains to bring the foreground tapestry of purple heather, green ferns, and golden sand, into keeping with the blue, the gold, and the grey of the distant valley and the outlying hills. Mr. J. T. Linnell also, in a lovely scene on the "English Coast" (555), has managed to reduce into unison of line and concord of colour a complex composition of sky, sea, wooded headland, and branching tree. Again, for a symmetry of proportion which might satisfy even a figure painter, and for sculpturesque modelling of mountain forms, we would point to Mr. Leader's "Flood on a Welsh River" (151). Likewise, as an example of the beauty and grandeur of which landscape art is capable, as a proof of the power gained by scale, elevation, space, atmosphere, we need only refer to Mr. Graham's "Cradle of the Sea-bird" (1055). It may be objected that Mr. Graham and his fellow-countryman, Mr. MacWhirter (248), surrender too much to unity; that, in seeking grandeur and mystery, they are apt to merge form and to blur outline. It may be pleaded in answer that the subjects selected are not from sunny Italy, but from murky Scotland. Another Northern aspect of nature, green, grey, and cool, is depicted by Mr. Millais in two landscapes which, notwithstanding admitted merits, are far from satisfactory. "Flowing to the River" (56) is detailed to the point of being scattered; while, on the contrary, "Flowing to the Sea" (71) is broad to vacancy. Yet these pictures contain some admirable passages; the sky is full of daylight, the leaves shake in the breeze and sparkle in the sun, and the rattling mill-stream rushes at full speed. Mr. Millais brings a keen, fresh eye to landscape; he seems to take a lively enjoyment in nature, and it is easy to recognize an unflinching endeavour to paint just what he sees. These pictures have somewhat of personal interest; they tell the views held of landscape art by the greatest of living figure painters.

Marine painting has changed greatly since the days of Clarkson Stanfield. Instead of Atlantic swells in mid ocean, we have small chopped seas breaking on the shore; and in place of men-of-war, now too unpicturesque for art purposes, we have small fishing craft. In the way of coast scenes, with high cliff, pebbly beach, and wet reflecting sands, there is no more thorough study than "Chalk and Firestone Rocks forming part of the Undercliff, Isle of Wight" (540), by Mr. Cooke, R.A. Also unsurpassed, especially for colour and for character, is Mr. Hook's "Gold of the Sea" (265). Among less known men may be named Mr. H. Macallum and Mr. Hunter; "Herring Trawlers" (899) by the latter is a vigorous, uncompromising study of stormy seas. But the grandest transcripts of tumultuous seas once again come from Mr. Brett and Mr. Henry Moore. We have seldom, indeed, encountered a more dashing, crashing scene than Mr. Moore's "Winter Gale in the Channel" (921). The waves have a grand sweep and swinging motion, and yet the forms are not lost in spray, nor are the large masses merged in small details. There is power in this wild strife of the elements. Mr. Brett treats similar subjects in a different style from Mr. Moore; he is a painter of phenomena, and his pictures are as literal as charts. In "White- and Bay" (912) he again seizes on a striking atmospheric effect; the sun in mid sky glides clouds which rise in mountainous masses above the horizon. Also "Anticipations of a Wild Night" (938) may be noted for wave drawing; wave within wave, light on the surface, light in the depth, colour reflected, and colour transmitted. Mr. Brett is one of the very few painters whose works bear a scientific test.

The Academy has again been severely criticized for errors in natural history. A year or two ago a florist complained in our hearing that Japanese chrysanthemums had been painted with the green leaves belonging to the ordinary varieties. And this year we are informed that Mr. Ansell (364) has thrown birds into society that always fly in solitude, which is about the same as to turn a solitary hermit into a social monk. It is also pointed out that Mr. Hook (265) has painted a catch of fish which the boat in the offing could not have caught. It is likewise obvious that the Highlander in Mr. Millais's landscape is at least four times too large for the boat on the shore; he could only cross the ferry piecemeal, a leg at a time. It is one thing to contend that art should teach science, but it is wholly another matter to plead that art should contravene science; or, in other words, set at naught nature. At all events one point the Academy makes sufficiently clear—that while science advances, art is at a standstill. The Exhibition of the present year shows retrogression rather than progress. It is mediocre, and below the average.

THE GRAND PRIX AND ASCOT.

CREMORNE has followed up his Derby victory by carrying off the great Paris race in a canter. The field was but small, the Duke of Hamilton starting three out of the nine runners, and succeeding in obtaining the second place with Barbillon. The hopes of the French were centred on Berryer and Revigny; but the latter has done so much work already this season as to require a period of rest, and the former sadly disappointed his adherents. Reine, winner of the One Thousand Guineas and the Oaks, was a fair third, which in itself points to the moderate quality of those who finished behind her; for it is difficult to say what amount of weight would bring Cremorne and Reine together. In truth the task set for the Derby winner was of the easiest nature possible; and having borne the journey without misadventure, and arrived fit and well, the race was little more than a canter for him. He waited till a quarter of a mile from the winning-post, and directly he was allowed to come away, his superior speed made him clear in a moment of all his opponents, and, pursuit being hopeless, he won at his leisure. Mr. Savile has now won the Grand Prix twice, his former victory being with The Ranger in 1863, the first year of the race. Since then the honours have been divided pretty equally between France and England, for Fervacques, who won in 1867, was always trained in England, and can scarcely be claimed as a French horse.

Ascot opened under every possible disadvantage of weather, rain falling almost incessantly throughout the first day. The arrangements and accommodation at Ascot are more suited to sunshine than to storm; but for those who braved the weather, the intrinsic excellence of the first day's racing—so far as it could be seen under the circumstances—was a sufficient reward. The Spagnoletti telegraph, we may add, was at last in successful operation; but the numbers are too small to be easily discernible from the Grand Stand and enclosure without the aid of a glass. The same remark applies to the numbers hoisted near the judge's chair. The course was naturally very heavy after the continued rains. Passing over the Trial Stakes, which attracted a large field of moderate horses, we come to the Queen's Stand Plate. The two-year-olds in this included Siluria (sister to Wenlock) and The Taster—presumably not far from the best two-year-old form at present shown; Drummond and Bertram were among the three-year-olds; and Digby Grand, Bauernfinger, and Vex did battle for the older horses. Unlike last year, when Chopette galloped away from her field, the two-year-olds never showed prominently in the race, which at the distance seemed at the mercy of Digby Grand, whom Fordham brought along close under the rails at the Stand side of the course, quite wide of the others. Bertram, however, though running rather ungenerously at the finish, just managed to get his head in front in the very last stride. Digby Grand was meeting Bertram on better terms than in the City and Suburban, where he conceded two stones and beat Mr. Barclay's horse by a length and a half; but the shorter course at Ascot probably suited Bertram better. He is a horse of fine speed, and, it will be remembered, was fourth in the Derby. But though it was said at the time that, but for a disappointment at Tattenham Green, he would have finished nearer the leaders, we think his present running shows that he could have no chance with Cremorne over a distance of ground. There was nothing very grand in getting fourth in the Derby this year, considering the ordinary quality of the majority of the runners. The distance in the Queen's Stand Plate was not far enough for Bauernfinger who, we are persuaded, is a far better horse over a mile or further than over a T.Y.C. course. Twice this year he has failed over short courses, but the three races he has run over a mile and a mile and a quarter he has carried off with consummate ease.

The great event of the day, the Prince of Wales's Stakes, brought out eleven runners. For a few minutes Cremorne's number was also exhibited, but in consideration of his recent exertions, and in view of future engagements, it was taken down. As it turned out, he would infallibly have won, despite his penalty; but it was only fair to a good horse to give him a rest after his expedition to France. Queen's Messenger's 5 lbs. penalty raised his weight to 9 st. 1 lb.; Almoner had a 3 lbs. penalty; Khedive, Xanthus, and Lighthouse carried the standard weight of 8 st. 10 lbs., while Drumochter, Lord Gough, Louise Victoria, and Wenlock had the benefit of the full allowances, though in the case of Wenlock 2 lbs. extra were carried to obtain the services of Fordham. Winalow and Wolfhall, a dark son of Savernake from the Fyfield stable, made up the field. On paper the race appeared a match between Queen's Messenger and Wenlock, and certainly it did not seem that either in the Two Thousand or the Derby Lord Falmouth's horse gave Lord Wilton's a 10 lbs. beating. It was certain, however, that the former could stay, while there were grave doubts whether the latter was adapted to a long course. A wonderful change had been effected in Khedive since April, when not only Chopette, but Drummond also, beat him off over the Howley Mile. Then he was wholly unfit to run; but now there was not a better trained or more muscular horse among the eleven. Last year his best performance was running a dead heat with Madge Wildfire at Newmarket. At first sight such credentials do not appear very trustworthy; but it must be remembered that Madge Wildfire has gone all to pieces this year, and her running must not be taken at all into account. Drumochter is a powerful horse, with a fine stride, and acquitted himself very fairly in the race. The pace was very fair, considering the state of the ground, which, especially on the far side of the course, was particularly holding. At the turn into the straight it looked 100 to 1 against Queen's Messenger, who was quite shut out, and for whom French was vainly endeavouring to clear a way to the front. At length he pulled him round to the outside, but it seemed that, as in the Derby, it would scarcely be possible for him to make up the ground thereby lost. He was nearly abreast of Khedive and Drumochter, who were leading, opposite the Stand; and thenceforward answering every call made on him in the gamest manner possible, he gradually wore his two opponents down, and won a very good race by a neck from Lord Zetland's horse. Drumochter was third, Wenlock a bad fourth, and Louise Victoria, who showed good speed for a mile and a quarter, fifth. The race settled one question at any rate namely, about Wenlock's staying powers, and proved conclusively that he neither likes a hill nor a long course. Despite his great advantage in the weights, he was beaten much further by Queen's Messenger than in the Two Thousand or Derby; in fact, he was never formidable at any part of the race. Queen's Messenger, on the other hand, proved himself a real game, honest horse, though he is deficient in speed, is an awkward galloper, and is one of those animals who are always disappointed at turns, or shut in at critical moments. It is much better to bring such a horse wide round a turn and trust to his staying powers at the last than risk the consequences of attempting to get the inside place. Louise Victoria gave additional proof of the inferiority of the fillies this year to the colts, and the running of Almoner and Xanthus showed once more—though it has been made sufficiently clear already—that the Biennial form is not within a stone of the first, second, and third in the Two Thousand and Derby. Queen's Messenger's victory, and the attendant incidents of the race, make the St. Leger look an absolute certainty for him, but we shall never feel happy about him till we see him get safely round the last turn. Wenlock may run better on the flat course at Doncaster, but King Lud's running last Wednesday seemingly removes another opponent, whose Two Thousand running made him somewhat formidable. If Khedive continues to improve, as he has improved in the last two months, he will be a worthy representative of the most popular colours in the North of England.

The succeeding race, for the Gold Vase, set at rest another problem which has engaged the attention of racing men. Could Sterling, the best horse in the world, as he has been called, for whom ten thousand guineas have lately been offered and declined, stay two miles? There could not have been a more favourable opportunity for him to show his powers, for he had escaped all penalties, and was meeting his antagonists on equal terms. Nor were they a very magnificent lot, consisting, as they did, of Albert Victor, Corisande, Ringwood, Agility, Dutch Skater, and Alario. Corisande, as we have seen, has had as little luck this season as most of Baron Rothschild's horses, and Albert Victor was beaten in a canter two months ago at Newmarket by so moderate a horse as Eolo II. The remainder require no notice. The two months that have elapsed since the Orwen Meeting have been employed as usefully for Albert Victor as for Khedive; and it was curious that in two successive races two horses should be brought out who were such a complete contrast to their former selves at their last public appearance. At Newmarket Albert Victor was a mass of flesh, and rolled about over the Cambridgeshire hill from want of condition. Last Tuesday his flesh—comparatively speaking—had disappeared, and he looked hard and full of muscle. The running was made by Alario at his best pace, in case there should be a weak point in Sterling, and he held the lead for nearly a mile and a half. After spending the last turn Sterling came on, side by side with Albert Victor, and was going so easily, in his usual grand style, that the race seemed won. Opposite the Stand, however, Cusance had to call on him for an increased effort, which the horse was totally unable to make, and Albert Victor drawing away at the same moment won easily by half a length. Nothing could be clearer than that Sterling was running out of his distance, for he had not the faintest struggle left in him in the last hundred yards. So far as regards Cup races we should imagine that Sterling's fate is settled, but he may still regain his fame as the best horse of the day at a mile or a mile and a quarter. We may well pass rapidly over the Ascot Stakes, once the greatest, now the most insignificant, race of the week, and contested on this occasion by nine horses, including two hurdle racers and one notorious cripple. Cantinière galloped away from His Grace for the Biennial, and then Baron Rothschild's ill-luck as nearly as possible pursued him to the end of the day, for in the Triennial Hannah only just succeeded in reaching Ripponden in the last few strides, and beating Mr. Savile's horse by a head.

On Wednesday the weather was favourable, and the racing, though wanting in the exciting features of the first day's sport, was sufficiently agreeable, though in one of the most popular and prettiest races of the year, the Royal Hunt Cup, there was a great falling off in the number of starters. Cremorne running against Malahide over a mile course at even weights had no occasion to hurry himself unnecessarily; but it was satisfactory to see that Mr. Savile's horse was fresh and well after his long journey. The second race was an equally easy affair for Prince Charlie, who over a five-furlong course disposed of Trombone and Siluria without much exertion. Cremorne, in consideration of his penalty, being withdrawn from the Ascot Derby, that race was left to Drumochter, King Lud, and Laburnum, at 8 st. 3 lbs. each, and Bustard, 8 st. 10 lbs. The third in the Prince of Wales's Stakes accomplished a very clever victory, Bustard and King Lud running a dead heat for second place, and the unfortunate Laburnum finishing last. Drumochter's victory is an additional recommendation to Queen's Messenger, while, if so moderate a horse as Bustard can give King Lud 7 lbs., Lord Zetland's horse cannot be good for much. The ancient Fervacques, who has experienced so many vicissitudes in his racing career, now a Grand Prix winner, now a hurdle racer, won the Visitors' Plate easily from Balmston, Wenlock's trial horse, and not nearly good enough to try a Derby horse. Then came the Hunt Cup, for which only nineteen started, speed being well represented by Hamlet, Oxonian, Anton, Fisherman, and Sir Robert Walpole. Among the remainder were Ripponden, Falkirk, Bonny Swell, Helmet, and Bordeaux. Curiously enough the selected favourite was Theodoros, an animal whose public performances have been despicable, and whose appearance is about equal to his performances. But he was the representative of a stable supposed to be invincible in races of this description, and that was sufficient. A four-year old, with 5 st. 9 lbs. on his back, he was never in the race, and might be at once advantageously promoted to the cab rank. It was surprising that Ripponden's high public trial with Hannah on the previous day should have escaped general attention. It was equivalent to putting Hannah in the Hunt Cup at 6 st. 12 lbs., and even if she is not so good now as last year, what pretensions has a wretched hack like Theodoros to beat her at a difference of little more than a stone? Anyhow the trial was the true clue to the race, and Ripponden won easily from Falkirk, Hamlet being third, and Sir Robert Walpole fourth. Paladin, by Fitzgerald out of Queen Bertha (Queen's Messenger's dam), won the Triennial in such style as to be forthwith installed favourite for the Derby of 1873, and then Highland Lassie won the Coronation Stakes, beating Guadalupe and Chance, and making the form of the three-year-old fillies more confused than ever. The only thing to be said is that they are all so moderate that they cannot get out of one another's way.

This is a year of disaster for Baron Rothschild, as much as last year was of triumph for him. His great champion, Favonius, was beaten for the much-prized Gold Cup by Henry, and thus in two days not only have Sterling and Favonius, whom we had regarded as an almost invincible pair, experienced mortifying defeats, but a French-bred horse has once more beaten in fair fight the pride of the English thoroughbreds. Henry, it will be remembered, won the Newmarket Derby last autumn, disposing of Bothwell, Digby Grand, and Cleveland with great ease. Afterwards he was made a great favourite for the Cambridgeshire, but the course did not suit him, and he never showed in the race. He is by Monarque out of Miss Ion. It is curious that just after ten thousand guineas have been offered for Sterling and twelve thousand for Favonius they should both be beaten, and M. Lefevre must be pleased to find that he has better horses in his own stable than any he can buy, even at fabulous prices.

REVIEWS.

ORISSA.*

THIS book endeavours to delineate the inner life of an Indian province. The words in which Mr. Hunter describes the scene of the new instalment of his Annals of Rural Bengal are the special value which his work will have for English readers. They need to have the vastness and complexity of their great dependency brought home to them in a way in which no general history, however comprehensive, can do this. They have to realise that each Indian province has had its own revolutions—physical, religious, and political; that these revolutions have borne no other resemblance to one another than that general resemblance which exists between the histories of England, Germany, and Spain; that in dealing with the inhabitants of India they are dealing with people differing from one another in race, in religion, in moral and physical antecedents, more completely than the inhabitants of the least related countries of Europe. Nothing but the detailed history of each of the separate countries which make up that India which they think it so easy to govern can force an entrance for these facts into their brains. Mr. Hunter's work is admirably suited to supply this want. He writes with great knowledge, great sympathy with the Indian people, a keen and quick appreciation of all that is striking and romantic in their history and character, and with a flowing and picturesque style which carries the reader lightly over ground which in less skilful hands might seem tedious beyond endurance.

Orissa is best known to Englishmen in connexion with the terrible famines by which it has from time to time been visited. They come from two sources—floods and drought; flood, as a rule, being the worse enemy of the two, but not producing the utter and terrible misery which is caused by drought on a great scale. The local rainfall of 62½ inches is an adequate water supply for the rice crop which is the staple of Orissa; but when the rain fails, the whole available water supply of the district goes, and "nothing remains for the people but to die." In 1770 ten millions died of starvation, and in 1866, even with all the increased facilities of communication, 750,000 persons died from the same cause. Yet at a different period of each of these years of drought Orissa had more water than it knew what to do with. Three great rivers, laden with the accumulated waters of 57,000 square miles of territory, descend into the plain within thirty miles of each other. Their currents, suddenly checked by the change from the tableland, break up into a hundred branches, which after struggling by innumerable interlacings and bifurcations towards the coast, reunite for the most part with one or other of the parent channels as they approach the sea. Vast quantities of silt are brought down suspended in the water, and as the stream becomes more sluggish this is deposited partly in the bed of the river, partly on its banks. In this way the bed and bank rise together until the river runs at a higher level than that of the surrounding country, and moreover runs in a channel which by constant accumulation of sand is constantly becoming more unable to hold the water with which it is occasionally charged. The Mahanadi sends down when in full flood 1,800,000 cubic feet of water per second, of which only about 900,000 cubic feet can find an outlet through its channels to the sea. Half of the torrent is left to burst over the banks and to distribute itself over the surrounding country. During the fifteen years ending in 1866 there was only one in which it was not necessary to grant remissions of revenue on this score. In 1866, in the single district of Parf, one-ninth of the entire surface was under water from five to forty-five days. The floods were nowhere less than three feet deep, while in whole villages they were ten feet deep:—

Thousands of miserable families floated about in canoes, on bamboo rafts, on trunks of trees, or on rice stacks, which threatened every moment to dissolve into fragments beneath them. No lives were lost in the first rush of the waters, for the unhappy inhabitants of these regions knew but too well from previous experience what they had to expect, and live in a constant preparation for calamity. Most of the hamlets have boats tied to the houses; and for miles the high thatched roofs are firmly held down by bamboo stakes, so as to afford a refuge in time of flood. Starving colonies might be seen thus perched above the waters. Every banyan-tree had its rooting of human beings, whilst the Brahmins effected settlements on the roofs of their brick temples and looked down in safety as the floods roared past. The common danger disarmed all creatures of their natural antipathies. Snakes glided up the rocks, and burrowed harmlessly in the thatch. Others, less fortunate, wriggled up trees, and whenever a canoe or a log of wood passed, slid down into the water and swam along the surface with head erect towards the ark which their instinct told them would bear them to dry land. From the first the cattle suffered terribly. Sheep and goats were carried away by herds in the torrent, and in a few days their carcasses came to the surface and floated about covered with crows and scavenging kites. The most pitiable sight of all was the plough cattle standing in shallow pools up to their necks, and hungrily snapping the barren waters for food until they sank exhausted into the slime. During the first days of the flood every branch, or twig, or bundle of hay was covered with ants, beetles, flies, and a hundred forms of minute life. By degrees starvation did its work, and the wearied animals relaxed their hold. Before the thirty days were over many a famished family had also sunk beneath the waters.

Until now the only attempt made at preventing these disasters has been by artificially raising the banks of the rivers. This system is still in force, but continual failures have greatly discredited it. To supplement it a system of canals has been constructed. Three vast weirs, one of them a mile and a quarter long, have been thrown across the three channels into which the Mahanadi divides when it issues from the mountains. From the reservoirs thus formed four canals stretch in various directions across the delta, forming trade routes to the sea or to the Hooghly river, and irrigating enormous tracts of land. These canals benefit the province in three ways. They collect the superfluous water in the rainy season; they discharge it in the season of drought; and they serve as channels for the sale of the produce brought from without if a famine occurs when all the produce of the country is difficult to dispose of. The Indian peasant, however, who has to pay for the canals is to be paid for. The Indian peasant, however, who has to pay for the canals is to be paid for.

water which is thus brought to his door until famine is actually upon him. "Then indeed a rush is made upon the canal, and thousands of acres are irrigated from them." But during the intervening years in which the rainfall has been sufficient the canal has paid no interest on the capital invested in it, and the Government has been forced to raise it, together with the cost of maintaining the canal, by some new and unpopular tax. Indian statesmen are divided as to the best means of meeting this state of things. One section, headed by the late Viceroy, is in favour of a compulsory water-rate—to be levied, however, only in places where there is an ascertained rise in the cultivator's profits after paying the irrigation-rate. The other section, headed by Lord Napier of Magdala, holds that a compulsory water-rate would defeat itself, by making canals and irrigation works unpopular. This latter argument seems, we confess, to depreciate unduly the intelligence of the Indian peasant. If he were asked to pay for the improvement of the province generally, or for the construction of public works the effect of which he could not foresee, it might be reasonable to assume that he would be unwilling. But in this case he is asked to pay for works the utility of which in time of drought he already perceives, and the utility of which at all times is capable of being proved to him by plain figures and actual examples.

A water-rate is not the only tax about the application of which to Orissa great differences of opinion exist. The Government duty on salt in Bengal, including Orissa, is nearly double what it is in the adjoining Presidency of Madras. Some Indian physicians object to this tax altogether, as tending to reduce the consumption of salt below the amount which the health of the population requires. Mr. Hunter has carefully examined the statistics adduced in support of this theory, and his conclusion is that, even at the present rate of taxation, "the general population of Orissa can afford to use as much salt as keeps the criminal classes in good health under the unfavourable conditions of prison life." There seems no reason, therefore, for reducing the salt-tax in Orissa. But there is one very sufficient reason against levying different duties on the same article in Orissa and in Madras. The Mahānadi is the natural channel through which the rice, grain, cotton, and other rural products of Central India should be sent down to the coast to be exchanged for salt :—

But the salt duty of Bengal and Orissa so greatly exceeds the rate in Madras, that the peasantry of inner India find it cheaper to send their goods by a long and costly land route to the Madras district of Ganjam than to float them down the Mahanadi to Cuttack on the Orissa side of the Customs line. . . . It is as if we had thrown a wall across one of the finest trade routes in the world. Our salt duty practically blockades the Mahanadi just as effectually as if we had filled it up with rocks.

Either, therefore, the Madras rate ought to be raised, or the Orissa rate ought to be lowered. The fact that the people of Orissa—as poor a population as any in India—can afford to use all the salt they really want while it is taxed at the highest rate, leads Mr. Hunter to pronounce in favour of the former course. It would, he argues, immensely increase the Imperial revenue, involve no new machinery for collection, decrease Indian expenditure by enabling the Government to do away in part with the internal Customs lines, and restore to Orissa its sole source of commerce—the trade of Central India. With this increase there should, Mr. Hunter suggests, be coupled a provision for remitting the duty on salt used to cure fish. The peasantry of Orissa consume great quantities of fish imperfectly dried in the sun, and more or less rotten. The decomposing mass is stored up in baskets, and sparingly doled out to the household as the only dish they can afford to their monotonous rice diet. Were it not for the high price of salt, this relish, made wholesome as regards quality and immeasurably increased in quantity, would become the staple food of the province. The estuaries of the great Orissa delta yield an endless supply of fish; all that is wanting to give the people a great additional security against famine is the means by which this fish may be kept for eating throughout the year.

The most striking part of the Annals of Rural Bengal was the description of the Santals, the aboriginal population of Boerbhoom. The second volume of Mr. Hunter's new work contains a scarcely less interesting account of the Kandihs, the aboriginal race of the hill-country of Orissa. Kandh society depends on two principles—family and election. In each family the absolute authority rests with the father. The sons have no property during their father's lifetime, and "all the male children, with their wives and descendants, continue to share the father's meal, prepared by the common mother." These families are united in common villages, and also in septs and tribes. The sept and the tribe are alike governed by a patriarch, who represents the common ancestor, and the eldest son of the patriarchal family has a natural title to the post. If, however, he is considered unfit for it, he is silently passed over, as though by family arrangement, and a brother or an uncle is taken in his room. The Kandh patriarch part of the family and property or cultivation on the part of the individual, and passes from vendor to purchaser by the symbolical delivery of a handful of the earth. Sales on so the right or land are determined by judicial ordeal. A lump of the disputed soil or rice, steeped in the blood of a sheep killed in the name of the Earth God, will kill the perjured seller. An oath upon a tiger's skin condemns the false avenger to be slain by a tiger. The Kandh religion is a strange compound of aboriginal and Hindu rites. They have adopted the worship of Kali, the wife of Siva, as being the aide of Hindu worship that best falls in with a religion which is exclusively one of terror. The Earth God, the chief of the native deities, could only be turned from his constant hostility to man by human sacrifices. Twice a year each tribe or village made its solemn offering of deprecation and sprinkled itself with the blood of the victims. In all times of public calamity additional sacrifices were demanded, and any special family disaster was commemorated in the same way. The victims were provided by one of the low castes attached to the Kandh villages, whose business it was to buy up or kidnap children from the Hindus of the plain. This was the character of their religion down to 1836. In that year the tribes passed under the care of the English Government, and the system of human sacrifices was at once attacked. Its extinction is due to a young English officer, Lieutenant Macpherson, and the means employed by him were the exhibition of the British Government in the light of an authority supplying certain admitted wants and exacting certain concessions in return. "The voluntary and permanent acknowledgment of our sovereignty by these rude societies," he said, "must depend upon our ability to discharge beneficially and acceptably towards them some portions of the duty of sovereignty." Each Kandh tribe submitted with absolute content to the patriarchal authority, but there was no power capable of arbitrating between different tribes; and this power, which centuries of feuds had taught the Kandhs the want of, though they had not taught them how to supply it, was furnished by their new rulers. A special agent was appointed for dealing with the Kandhs, who "confines himself to putting a stop to blood feuds, adjusting dangerous disputes likely to lead to them, and taking cognizance of any heinous crimes." When Lieutenant Macpherson has thus established the British authority "on a basis of mutual goodwill," he took in hand the system of human sacrifices. He left the Kandhs themselves alone, and addressed himself exclusively to the arrangements by which the victims were obtained. In a few years the supply was absolutely at an end. The low caste men who kidnapped or bought them for their masters had no religious motive in obtaining them, and any other motive, whether of interest or obedience, was overpowered by the fear of consequences. Lieutenant Macpherson's Report on the Kandhs, now thirty years old, still remains the great source of information as to their primitive state. It is to be regretted that Mr. Hunter has not told us more of their present condition. Especially it would be interesting to know what change has passed over their religious ideas since the abolition of human sacrifices. It is hard to conceive the position of a man profoundly believing in a God who can only be appeased by a particular kind of offering, and yet prevented from obtaining it. Has anything in the nature of a new revelation been resorted to in order to adapt the demands of the Earth God to the restricted powers of his servants? Or is the Earth God less esteemed since he has allowed his worship to be mulcted of its chief rite? Or have the efforts of the British Government, by making nature less hostile to man, diminished the dread of natural calamities in which the worship of the Earth God had its root? Or is the hold which a religion of pure terror has upon a people simply one of custom, which relaxes as soon as anything comes in to interrupt the immemorial tradition? These are all questions of the highest theological interest, and we wish that Mr. Hunter had helped us to answer them. We have only touched as yet on what may be called the practical and modern side of Orissan. The antiquarian side, including the remarkable religious history of the province, must be reserved for another notice.

The World economy is built by industry of cooperation on the

PALMER'S GREAT YARMOUTH!

YARMOUTH has been fortunate in her local antiquaries, from Marship down to Dawson Turner; and Mr. Palmer, to judge from the book before us, is in carefulness and accuracy of research fully equal to the best of his predecessors. Of the two fields of inquiry which an English town presents he has chosen, indeed, the humbler and less pretending one. The constitutional history of our boroughs still for the most part awaits its historian, for even the stirring municipal revolutions of London have not as yet found any one to do for them what Thierry did for those of Amiens or Leon. In the case of Yarmouth the attraction of the story is undoubtedly very great. It presents almost a unique instance of what is common enough abroad—the town dependent on another town. The relation of the Cinque Ports to their subject municipalities on the Southern coast was almost exactly equivalent to that of the Hanseatic League towards the dependent ports along the coast of North Germany, but their control over Yarmouth had the peculiarity of being suspended only during a limited period of the year. Throughout the whole time of the town's

The Substitution of Great Yarns with Gaskets and Sealings
by Charles John Wilson, F.R.S. Vol. 1. Great Yarns; George Allen 1972.

herring-fair, from Michaelmas to Martinmas, the higher justice of the town remained in the hands of two of the Cinque Ports Barons; and even after the Charter of King John had conferred on Yarmouth the full privileges of self-government, the only concession which could be wrested from the great merchant league of the South was that the town-bailiffs should be joined with its own in the exercise of their oppressive jurisdiction. Struggle followed struggle, and on one occasion a bailiff of the Cinque Ports was killed in the streets of Yarmouth, but it was not till the time of the Great Rebellion that the yoke was finally shaken off. Edward Owner, who plays the most conspicuous part in its history during the Civil War, seems to have been the leader in this effort of municipal patriotism; he was accused before the Earl Marshal, on the very verge of the greater national struggle, of having received the bailiffs with "insolency," and "infringed their rights and privileges in place and precedence," and he was no doubt the instigator of the refusal of Yarmouth to contribute to the annual compensation for their expenses. Perhaps the only parallel to so late a struggle for municipal freedom is to be found in the effort made by both Oxford and Cambridge at the opening of the Civil War to shake off the supremacy of their Universities; but while this effort failed, that of Yarmouth was rewarded with success, for we find no record of any visit from the officers of the Cinque Ports after 1662. Nor is it only in its outer history that Yarmouth recalls the Hanse Towns. The source of its mercantile prosperity was the same as that of the great German League. The weavers of Flanders seem to have made a settlement in the town during the reign of Henry I., but its real prosperity dates from the moment when it took to herring-curing. There is a touch of the mythical in the alleged origin of the famous "Yarmouth Bloater." "At a time," Nash tells us in his Lenten Stuff, "when chimneys were not and when coal was unknown, a fire of wood was placed in the centre of the principal room of the house, and the smoke was allowed to escape through the roof, a fisherman who had hung up several rows of fresh herrings, and forgotten to take them down for some time, found them, when he did so, of a golden colour, and the meat deliciously cured." There is in Nash's tale a smack of Charles Lamb and his account of the discovery of roast pig; but, whatever the origin of it, the process of curing remained confined to Yarmouth for many centuries, and its great herring-fair drew dealers not only from England, but from France and the Low Countries. The port seems to have attained its greatest importance in the fourteenth century, when it furnished Edward III. with a larger number of vessels and mariners than any other single town along his coasts. But even two hundred years later the commercial features of Yarmouth are described in a striking passage from a contemporary pamphlet by Tobias Gentleman on English trade:—

Hithor, he says, "do resort all the fishermen of the Cinque Ports, and all the rest of the west countrymen of England, as far as Bridport and Lyme in Dorsetshire; and these herrings that they take they do not barrel because their boats are but small things, but sell all unto the Yarmouth herring buyers for ready money; and also the fishermen of the north countries beyond Scarborough and Robin Hood's Bay, and some as far as the Bishoprick of Durham, do hither resort yearly, in poor little boats called five-men cobbles; and all the herrings that they take, they sell fresh unto the Yarmouth men to make red herrings. Also to Yarmouth do daily come into the haven up to the keel; all or most part of the great fleet of Hollanders, that go in sword-pinks, Holland-toads, crab-skulls, walnut-shells, and great and small yeares, one hundred and two hundred sail at a time; and all the herrings that they do bring in, they sell for ready money to the Yarmouth men; and also the Frenchmen of Picardy and Normandy, some hundred sail of them at a time do come hither, and all the herrings they catch they sell fresh unto the Yarmouth herring-mongers for ready gold; so that it amounteth unto a great sum of money that the Hollanders and Frenchmen do carry away yearly from Yarmouth into France and Holland;" and he complains that the Hollanders, not content with taking the fish when quick, take them again when dead, for when the Yarmouth buyers had converted the catch into red herrings, they again stepped in and conveyed them to Civita Vecchia, Leghorn, Genoa, Marseilles, Toulon, and other places.

"In all His Majesty's dominions," adds the writer, "there is not any town comparable to it for house buildings." It is curious that the eulogy seems to have been deserved for some time longer, and that, in spite of its narrow rows and gridiron ground-plan, Yarmouth at the opening of the Georgian era was still looked up to as pre-eminent in beauty among its commercial rivals.

With such matters, however, Mr. Palmer meddles little. The field which he has chosen is one of less general interest, though of great local value; he wanders, in fact, up and down the various streets of the town, noting the past history of almost every house, and registering the past fortunes of their successive inhabitants. The mass of information which he has accumulated in this way, immense as it is, is a little burdensome to the general reader; but there are some leading facts which at once strike one in wading through it. One is, the importance of the great civic functions of towns like these. In a rough way we are in the habit of setting town against country, and of identifying the democratic principle with the one and the oligarchic with the other. But, whatever truth such a contrast may possess nowadays, there is only one short period in the past history of our English boroughs up to 1832 in which it possesses any truth at all. The period of the communal revolution, which was in fact only one phase of the great movement towards progress and liberty which found its representative in Simon de Montfort, is the only break in the oligarchic character of our municipal institutions. The merchant Guild which preceded it was in fact reproduced in the civic Corporations and Common Councils which followed it. Till the Municipal Reform Act, in fact, the government of English boroughs rested wholly in the hands of a knot of wealthy families, by whom the municipal property was distributed for the benefit of the freemen. It is curious how little research has been expended on these great civic houses, and how generally their very existence is forgotten. In Oxford, for instance, the wisdom of the civic authorities has within living memory swept away the name of "Penyfarthing Street" as ridiculous and vulgar, and replaced it by that of "Pembroke," from the adjacent College. But the older name was really that of an illustrious city family, the Penyverthings, whose memory was preserved by it, as that of another family of the same eminence is still preserved in the "Peckwater" Quadrangle of Christchurch. Mr. Palmer has at any rate made blunders of sheer ignorance in such matters nearly impossible in Yarmouth. The Cubitts are a good instance of the industry with which he has traced the fortunes of a family which still remains essentially of the commercial class. As early as the fourteenth century we find a Cubitt joining the insurgents in the great communal rising which bears in common history the name of Wat Tyler. Throughout the hundred years which follow, the family seems to have held a certain ecclesiastical rank, and not only to have given vicars to a good many Norfolk livings, but even an abbot to the great monastery of St. Benet at Holme. About the time of the Reformation a branch of it seems to have been settled in Yarmouth, and to have given bailiffs to the town under Elizabeth. From this moment the name is constantly found in the records of the Corporation, and John Cubitt seems to have played a conspicuous part among his fellow-townsmen during the Great Rebellion. He was probably a Royalist, as we find him appointed to assess ship-money in two of the wards, and at a later period dismissed from office for "having removed his habitation out of the town," which was then strongly Parliamentary, for a whole year, so as to escape his share in the common burdens. The connexion of another great mercantile house, that of the Gurneys, with Yarmouth, is of a weaker kind, though one of the name bears in some pedigrees the name of "Baro de Yarmouth," and the family seems to have had for a time the castle in its hands. A name, however, of far wider notoriety illustrates in a very remarkable way the character of these local oligarchies, and the ease with which the absence of any such marked distinction between the two classes as prevailed in the feudalised countries of the Continent enabled the merchant to become the country gentleman, or the country gentleman the merchant. A Fastolfe or Falstaff was Bailiff of Yarmouth in 1281, another is among the first of its representatives in Parliament, and from that time members of the family filled the highest municipal offices. John Fastolfe, a man of considerable account in the town, purchased lands at the close of the fourteenth century in Caistor, and became the father of Sir John Fastolfe, who, after a distinguished military career, was luckless enough to give his name to Shakespeare's famous character. In Yarmouth, however, he was better known as a benefactor to the great church of St. Nicholas. "A chasuble of cloth of gold and eleven tunics" were a gift which must have endeared the memory of the worthy knight to the mediæval devotees of his native town.

In a book of this kind nothing is more curious than to see the little glimpses of life which peep out through the antiquarian details of its pages. Among the Yarmouth families, for instance, we find the ancestors of the present Lord Dudley and Ward, a house whose origin adds a new story to the romance of the peerage. A younger son of the house, who had settled under the first of the Stuarts as a goldsmith in Cheapside, founded its greatness by purchasing for a song the contents of two sacks of rough diamonds:—

Standing one day at his shop door, as was then the custom, he asked a sailor who was staring at the display of jewelry, whether he wanted to purchase anything, to which the man replied he did, but must first sell what he had in his bag. Being invited into the back shop the sailor astonished Ward by pouring out a number of rough diamonds. A bargain was soon struck, and Ward invited the sailor and some of his comrades to supper at a tavern, where they were all very merry; and before parting the sailor promised to bring another bag of similar stones the next morning, which he did and parted with them on the same easy terms. Ward then became a money lender and was resorted to, among others, by Lord Dudley, who had greatly impaired his fortune. The jeweller suggested that his lordship might be accommodated without loss, by a match between the lender's son, Humble Ward (named after his maternal grandfather, Richard Humble of Surrey), and the granddaughter and sole heir of Lord Dudley. The marriage was arranged and the jeweller's son became the husband of Frances, daughter and sole heir of Sir Fernando Sutton, who on the death of her grandfather became Baroness Dudley in her own right; and her husband was created by Charles I. Baron Ward, and he was the ancestor of the Lords Dudley and Ward.

A curious trace of the tenacity of mediæval life is seen in the "hallooing of largesse," which lasted long after the beginning of the present century. After harvest-time the farm-labourers of the neighbourhood came into the town, asking for gratuities from the tradesmen of their employers. The present was rewarded by "hallooing largesse." A circle was formed in front of the houses, the men taking hands and shouting, at a given signal, "Largesse!" as loudly as they could, raising at the same time their hands in the air at each shout. Side by side with this relic of the middle ages we may place the odd account of the introduction of Methodism into Yarmouth. Oliver—was this the famous poet of the movement?—was the first missionary who attempted the introduction, and his attempts were rudely repulsed. "When he left the house in which he had taken refuge, he found himself ranged at the doors on each side holding banners, the contents of which, not very clean, were dashed at him as he passed." Oliver

Harris was more successful. He appeared in Yarmouth as a captain of Welsh Fusiliers, till chance turned him into a member of the church militant:—

On his arrival he enquired what had been done to introduce methodism, and was informed of the ill-treatment which Olivares had received. Harris adopted the following device to obtain a hearing. He employed the town-crier to give notice that at a particular hour a methodist would preach in the Market place. At the time named a savage mob assembled, armed with hudgeons and brick bats, who swore if the preacher appeared he should never leave the town alive. Harris, who was then exercising his men at a short distance, after dismissing them, mingled with the crowd and enquired the reason for such an assemblage. He was told that a methodist preacher had been expected, and that it was well he had not come, as he would certainly have been killed. Harris told them that by their leave he would address them himself, and a table having been procured, he mounted upon it, attired as he was in regimentals, and so astonished his hearers by the novelty of the exhibition, and so softened them by his eloquence, that they were induced to listen, and he was allowed to finish his discourse without molestation.

A very different arrival in Yarmouth furnishes a good story of Lord Nelson. A storm met him on his landing, but the danger failed to prevent his appearance on the quay. When the freeman's oath was tendered to him, the town-clerk noticed that the hero placed his left hand on the book. Shocked at the legal impropriety he said, "Your right hand, my Lord." "That," observed Nelson, "is at Teneriffe." From these later details we may turn back to earlier times. Some of the Reformation stories give us the "rough side" of the event. In 1535, for instance,

Whilst Sir Cotton, a priest, was preaching a sermon in the parish church, William Swanton, a chaplain, openly denounced the practices of Rome, maintaining that no honour should be given to saints, or to the pictures or images of them within the church; that a Christian man profited nothing by praying for their intercession; and ended by saying that holy water was "good sauce for a capon." He was supported by twenty-four persons, and a great tumult took place. Six years afterwards four merchants openly derided the elevation of the Host, speaking "heretical words;" and Thomas Hammond, a fish-merchant, bargained with one Thomas Allyn for the sale of a last of white herrings, within the church during divine service. These disorders called for suppression, and the offenders were fined; and the corporation made an order that whoever thereafter disturbed or "disquieted" any preacher, "should be committed to ward, there to remain at the discretion of the bailiffs."

Recent investigators into the "vestment" question may find some interest in one Richard Bohun, a churchwarden in the time of Edward VI., whom we find selling "so moche church plate as extended to the sum and value of one hundred marks"; which money was spent on the haven, but he was enjoined not to sell any more plate, jewels, ornaments, or bells, "the like of which could never be replaced." We should greatly like to know what became of Falstaff's chasuble and tunics? A mass of curious information has been accumulated by Mr. Palmer on the subject of inn signs, but of no specially local character. On the whole the book is a worthy and accurate one. We notice with some surprise an odd "Earl Guert," as Harold's brother, and another Guador as "a Saxon Earl," which is certainly the unluckiest of blunders. Mr. Palmer, too, evidently believes in one of his notes that inns as places of public entertainment sprang from the dissolution of the monasteries. We are afraid that Chaucer's pilgrims started from the "Tabard" some little time before that event, whenever it occurred. These, however, are trifles in so great a mass of facts, and we have only to hope that Mr. Palmer will complete the work which he has begun.

OVER VOLCANOES.*

OVER VOLCANOES is one of those titles against which, as we see them advertised among the publishers' announcements, or in the lending-library list of new works, or on the backs of volumes at the bookseller's, we feel a certain inexplicable prejudice. The title is to a book very much what expression is to a man, and titles admit of almost exactly the same classification. There are weak and fatuous titles, and insufferably conceited titles, and pompous titles, and priggish titles, and sly titles, and grinning titles, and simpering titles. In fact, we believe there is hardly an expression of which the human countenance is capable the analogue of which may not be observed on the shelves of a circulating library. As in the one case, so in the other, we are apt to fancy that the outward and visible sign is an index to character; and indeed there is always a certain relation between the two. But the relation is often a very subtle one, and books as well as men will frequently turn out upon acquaintance to be something very different from what we had settled in our own minds that they must of necessity be. The "Doctor Fell" kind of antipathy, too, may be inspired by the name of a book quite as well as by the expression of a countenance; there are titles which, you cannot tell why, set you against the book that bears them. We have to confess to some such feeling about Over Volcanoes. What it is that is objectionable in that title we cannot say. Perhaps it may be that there is in it a suspicious flavour of what, for want of a better term, we may call Mudicism—that somewhat catchpenny quality which seems to be inherent in all lending-library literature, or a suspicion of that forcible-feeble suggestiveness with which some writers try to elbow themselves into a front place in hope of catching the public eye.

Of course our objection matters very little—there was no thought of pleasing us when the book was christened; but we feel bound to own it, because it is one which possibly some of our readers may share, and we must confess that it is unjust to the work. The title, if it does savour of affectation, is the only thing about the volume that does so. What the author means by it is that he and his friends travelled through France and Spain at a critical time, just before the commencement of the reign of the Commune, and shortly after the assassination of Prim and the arrival of King Amadeo at Madrid. But, for that matter, so far as Spain is concerned, the title would have been equally applicable at any time since the death of Narvaes. The party, or to give it the title always claimed in these pages, "the Firm," consisting of the Senior partner, the Cashier, and Mr. Kingsman, the Junior partner and author, travelled over no ground that has not been written about some scores of times, and they have the rare grace always to bear that fact in mind, and to spare the reader the usual descriptions, more or less expanded from the guide-book, of the quays of Bordeaux, the mosque of Cordova, the Alhambra, and the Escorial. As their own honest declaration sets forth, "Stevens and Co. do not deal in secondhand goods; in other words, they do not describe places which previous writers have made their own." So rigidly is this rule adhered to, that the Junior, after having written a very respectable page about Valencia in the style of the ordinary book of travels, is ordered peremptorily by the Senior partner to stop, on the ground that "Murray has probably printed the same before, and a great deal more, in a better style." The chapter which the head of the Firm suggests as a substitute is composed on a plan which we heartily recommend to tourists about to write their travels. If they must make a book and thrust it upon a public that has never asked for it, let them at least make it a book that will be of some little use; and this they may do if, as the Senior points out, they bethink themselves of the sort of information they required before leaving home but could not find anywhere, and print that instead of matter which is as much within their readers' reach as it was within theirs. In the specimen chapter given here we have, for example, a page inserted from the Spanish railway time-table, and its terminology explained in a conversation, after which follows a genuine hotel bill, treated in the same way, then a sample of the Valencian dialect with a translation, the whole winding up with a few short notes on matters to which the writer thinks it worth while to call the attention of intending travellers. An entire book constructed on this plan might be somewhat deficient in interest, but a chapter or so would be, we are inclined to think, a welcome addition to the ordinary book of travels, at any rate a welcome exchange for some of the padding with which those books are so often swelled out. But then due care should be bestowed upon the composition, and the specimens should be judiciously selected. We cannot say that the Senior has done this in the chapter before us. Why, for instance, if he wished to give the reader a fair idea of the cost of hotel-living in Spain (which, we gather, was his object in printing an hotel bill in full), did he choose such a bill as the one he has given? There is, we believe, only one hotel in Spain—there are certainly not more than two—capable of making such a charge, and from internal evidence it would seem that "the Firm" sojourned at the one we mean; but as the Senior abstains from mentioning names, we shall follow his example. In Spanish hotels, as the reader probably is aware, a fixed rate per diem is charged for board and lodging. In the first-class hotels in the chief cities the regular rate is 40 reals, or 8s. 4d.; in the smaller towns and second-rate houses, 30 reals, or 6s. 3d., and often even less. But to judge by the document before us, "Stevens and Co." in this instance paid at the rate of 80 reals, or 16s. 8d., per head per diem—a figure calculated to convey a very erroneous impression of the traveller's average daily expenses in Spain, and by no means "the sort of thing," to use the Senior's own expression, "to give strangers a good idea of the country." He would have served the purpose he had in view far better if he had made his partner insert the bill of one of the more typical and more unpretending inns, like the Alameda at Malaga, which Mr. Kingsman praises so much for comfort and cheapness, or the capital Fonda del Norte at Burgos, or the Fonda de Lino at Toledo, or the Miranda at the Escorial, to which we are glad to see justice done in these pages.

The main portion of the book is quite as unconventional as this, and just as unlike the kind of article which the irrepressible tourist so frequently produces after he has been restored to the bosom of his family. It is pleasant, unaffected, and chatty, being indeed chiefly composed of the conversations of the members of the Firm as they discuss the Coas de España sitting in the railway carriage or strolling about the towns. This mode of treatment gives it a sort of easy "Friends-in-Council" flavour, which suits the record of a rapid tour over a beaten track much better than the descriptive monologue of the ordinary book of travels. In one of these railway conversations the Senior takes up his parable against the Guardia Civil, "those policemen," as he calls them, and inveighs against the folly of the Spaniards in spending so much money upon such a force. To which the Cashier very sensibly replies, that whatever may be the errors and extravagance of the Spanish Government, the keeping up of the Guardia Civil is certainly not one of them, for without that corps there would be very little order or security for life or property in Spain. Why, he says, "if the railway were not watched, the carriages would soon be thrown off the line, and the passengers pillaged." We mention this conversation because there was something almost prophetic about it. It took place only a few stations south of the spot where, the other day, the carriages were thrown off the line, and the train pillaged, though the passengers' effects seem to have escaped. The affair—in which it may be remembered two men of this Guardia Civil behaved with remarkable gallantry—affords strong proof that the ubiquity and watchfulness of the force are neither so excessive nor so uncalled for as the Senior considered them to be. Indeed it may be doubted whether Spain would not be much the better for a larger Guardia Civil and a smaller army. Scattered as it is in small detachments all over the country, and composed almost exclusively of steady wild soldiers, it is far less available than the regular army for the purpose of those military pronunciamientos which have been for years past the curse of Spain; while, from the local knowledge of the men, it is far more useful for putting down Carlist or Republican insurrection. One of the few faults we have to find with the author, or perhaps we ought to say with the Firm whose bookkeeper he is, is one which he shares with the great bulk of foreigners in Spain. Indeed, even that great and wise being, the "Own Correspondent" of the newspapers, is not wholly free from it. We mean the weakness, we will not say of believing, but of lending an ear to, that peculiar sort of political scandal with which the atmosphere of Spain is always highly charged. There is no gobemouche in the world like the Spanish gobemouche. His appetite and swallow are prodigious. Whether it is his fervid Southern temperament, or his ingrained credulity and love of the marvellous, or the infinite subdivision of parties separated more by mutual hatred than by difference of opinion, or an utter disbelief—for which indeed it is hard to blame him—in the existence of such a thing as political morality; whatever may be the cause, there is no tale about an opponent so monstrous that a Spanish politician will not swallow it greedily. We who in our cold Northern way seldom go beyond accusing our statesmen of stupidity, or obstinacy, or weakness in yielding to pressure, or, at the worst, of lavish expenditure or cheese-paring economy, have but a faint idea of the sort of charges current in party warfare in Spain. The character of Napoleon III. as painted by a Victor Hugo or a Henri Rochefort is as the driven snow compared with that of any leading man in Spain when handled by one of the faction opposed to him. Here is a specimen of the sort of thing one hears in Spain:—

* Over Volcanoes; or, Through France and Spain in 1871. By A. Kingsman. London: King & Co. 1872.

"Many people," replied the Junior, "will tell you that Serrano, so far from loving Prim, hired those Toledo ruffians who assassinated him; and they argue that so many men could not have been engaged in such a plot, and have executed it at such a place and time, unless with the connivance of the very highest powers; and it is further said, that a bet was made on the subject, viz. that Prim would kill Serrano, or Serrano Prim, in a given time, which bet was just won."

"And some," added the Cashier, "attribute the same amiable feelings and homicidal intention to Montpensier; while others aver that it was an act of private revenge, and only connected with politics remotely. For they say that, some years ago, Prim planned the assassination of Narvaes, and had another person killed by mistake, on which the family of the murdered man vowed vengeance, and executed their purpose in the Calle del Turco."

It is only fair to the Cashier to add that he says he does not believe "these stories." But why give them a moment's attention? What "They say" is seldom worth notice in any part of the world, and in Spain "They" will say anything. It is difficult for an unprejudiced foreigner who listens to the sort of talk that is constantly in the air in Spain to avoid a suspicion that possibly Isabel II. may, after all, be an injured woman. Had she been chaste as ice, pure as snow, she could not have escaped calumny in Spain.

A chapter that will interest a good many English readers is that on "Cabrorismo," as the Protestant movement in Spain is called, from its acknowledged head Cabrera, who, it is hardly necessary to say, is not to be confounded with the Carlist general of the same name. Of all places in Spain, heretic-burning Seville, where there was an auto da fe so lately as 1781, has been made the head-quarters of the movement, and here the Firm learned something of the progress it is making, and encountered some of the members of the Synod:—

Many of the lower classes [Mr. Kingman observes] seemed to know them well, and respect them highly. Constantly there was a kindly greeting, a shake of the hand—even a kiss; and, it must be confessed, a brotherly spirit seemed to pervade them all. And this might well be the case, for at present the Reformers are a feeble folk, and in peril of their lives every day; but out of such weakness strength has come before now, and it may come again. There will, however, be a struggle, and a deadly one; for in Spain it is a serious matter when ex-priests openly hoist the standard of rebellion against the National Church.

We cannot close our dealings with "Stevens & Co." without a word in acknowledgment of their patriotic denunciations of that national nuisance, the British travelling mob. From all the accounts we receive, it seems that this nasty creature is becoming more and more numerous, and each season extending his range, and carrying his vulgarity, stupidity, and ill-breeding into new regions. Our travellers met with specimens at several points of their route. That he should have been encountered in France at that particular period is only natural; every one recollects what a rush of sightseers there was the instant communications were reopened with Paris, and how enterprising managers "conducted" tourists—who, we suppose, could not conduct themselves—on pleasure trips in omnibuses round the rains. Of course such an opportunity would bring out strongly his ungovernable curiosity and his shocking disregard of the feelings of others, and Mr. Kingman describes with pardonable indignation the behaviour of one with whom he entered Paris, "who had evidently come for a day into France, and was determined, in utter disregard of its inhabitants and their distress, to see and hear all he could." But it would seem that he has penetrated even as far as Spain. The Firm observed two or three strongly marked instances of the breed there; in particular one refined gentleman, whose playful way it was to say audibly, "Confound all Yankees!" when General Sikes, who was staying in the same hotel, happened to pass within earshot. What can it be that people of this sort travel for? It cannot be for enjoyment; for art, architecture, scenery, and manners must be thrown away upon them, and as a matter of fact, their life abroad is one continued grumble, from the time they leave England till they get back. Here is the Junior's theory on the subject:—

"Which being the case," said the Junior, "his object in journeying to Spain is clear enough. Of course he has plenty of acquaintances, when he calls friends, and all those he delights to take down a peg. And now, when he gets back to England, he will have a fine chance of doing this. For Brown, one of his friends, will have gone perhaps to Cologne, with the same amiable object of crowing over those who have not been there. Then some day Brown will say, 'The cathedral at Cologne is a magnificent thing; Sponge, you should see Cologne.' To which Sponge will reply, 'Have you been to Spain, Brown? oh! oh! No, sir, you have not? Well, then, no one should talk of Cathedrals who has not been to Spain. When I was in Spain, &c. &c.' So Brown will be silenced until it occurs to him that he can see a bit of Spain almost as easily as a bit of the Rhine provinces, after which he will follow in the footsteps of Sponge, and will leave the same odour of vulgarity behind him, to the disgust of all foreigners."

"The mischief," said the Senior, "which such men do is too obvious for argument. But the question is, how can it be prevented?"

CALENDARS OF SCOTTISH SAINTS.*

WE assume that the Bishop of Brechin in snatching the time needful to publish these Kalendars intended them to be of general use, and that, in writing his elaborate preface and in collecting together in alphabetical order the notices of above a thousand Irish and Scottish saints whom very few people have ever heard of, he meant to illustrate a subject which, to say the least of it, is one of considerable obscurity. But unfortunately the form in which he has published his volume is little adapted to benefit those to whom his studies are likely to be most interesting. A quarto édition de luxe, with leather back and gilt top leaves, ranges no doubt with the Roxburgh series, but its circulation is necessarily limited to the subscription list and a few exceptional purchasers. Under the most favourable circumstances a work of antiquarian research such as this is would command but a very limited sale; and we must express our regret that so much information has not been compressed into an ordinary octavo volume of somewhat less than half the size of the one now before us. We should not have taken the trouble to offer this exception to its shape were we not impressed with the extreme value of the book, the contents of which have evidently been put together con amore, and come with a particularly good grace from a Scottish ecclesiastic. As far as we are ourselves concerned, we are well satisfied to have a volume to read and to review which, from the beauty and size of its type, is specially inviting, and which presents such ample margin to its pages, and so much of the blank paper which, we believe, in the trade goes by the name of "fat."

The main part of the work consists of twelve different Kalendars, the dates of which range over a period of four centuries, commencing with a MS. of the thirteenth century and ending with the Liturgy of 1637 which Laud attempted to impose upon the people of Scotland. The last is of course a mere reprint, as also are some of the others. Most of them are, however, now printed for the first time from the original or one of the few original MSS. that are known to exist. Amongst these the Calendar of Aberdeen is noteworthy. It was printed in 1854, but the author has been induced to reprint it, in order to incorporate the manuscript additions of the copy now at Glamis Castle in the possession of the Earl of Strathmore and Kinghorne. He mentions the practice of inserting additions in ink in order to accommodate old breviaries to modern usage as being peculiarly Scottish. Two sections of the volume, Nos. VII. and VIII., are devoted to extracts from the Aberdeen Breviary—the first consisting of its Kalendar in full, the second containing the entries in the Martyrology of Aberdeen, specially relating to Scottish Saints. We observe that in the title of the latter the name of the city is printed Aberdeen by a mistake, for which the extraordinarily large size of the type seems to leave no excuse. And a comparison of the first page of the Martyrology with the first page of the Breviary suggests also another oversight on the part of the editor, which, though more excusable, we nevertheless regret. On the 13th of January—we have duly entered, no doubt as an exact copy from the MS., "Kentigern episcopi et confessoris, majus duplex." Corresponding to this we have in the entry printed from the Martyrology, Idibus Januarii, followed by several lines detailing the fame of St. Kentigern as recognised not only in the Scottish Church, but also by the English and Irish. Here the author in his preface says that one reason for giving the Kalendar of this Breviary may be found in the great importance of the book in any hagiological work, as well as in the fact that has been made of the lections from it in the biographical notices of the Scottish Saints at the end of this volume.—P. xxxi.

* Kalendar of Scottish Saints, with Personal Notices of their Lives, Labours, and Martyrdoms. An attempt to fix the Dates of their Births, Deaths, and the Churches where they were chiefly worshipped. By Alexander Forrest Forbes, D.D., Bishop of Brechin. Edinburgh: Edmonston & Douglas. 1872.

We have already referred to these valuable notices, but upon turning to Kentigern, who duly appears in alphabetical order, we find him calendared under the date November 13, A.D. 603. No explanation of this is given; and though it is possible that here, as in other cases, there may be no account to be given of the variation, yet the fact of the apparent discrepancy ought, we think, to have been noticed, if only for the sake of those who might in ignorance have thought that November 13 was a mistake of the writer's for January 13, the day on which, as far as we know, his name appears in all Kalendars. We observe that in another instance of a similar duplication of dates—namely, the festival of Margaret of Scotland, Queen and Confessor—the editor has given the explanation, namely, that the feast was moved from the day of her death, which was the 16th of November, to the 10th of June, by Innocent XII. in 1693, at the instance of James VII., that day being the birthday of his son.

It is this discriminating and critical element that we often desiderate throughout the work. We will illustrate what we mean by reference to the life of the same Saint as given in the appendix. The editor in his preface notices the almost entire dearth of authentic information with regard to the history of Scotland before the time of St. Margaret, and therefore being, as he says we ought to be, thankful for the slightest hint with regard to the politics and conditions of life of those obscure times, he reproduces a good deal of matter without either comment or any, the slightest, attempt to distinguish between the ordinary and the marvellous. He says:—

With any abatement caused by [we suppose he means allowed for] the unsentimental nature of the compositions, we get from the legends a very definite picture of a state of society in which violence and barbarism alternate with results of strong religious conviction, and in which we seem to discover those fumes of civil and ecclesiastical life which are manifested to us in the other nations of the Celtic family. We should not have exhibited the whole case had we supposed all the miracles which form so great a proportion of the incidents in the lives. Some of these are such as to excite a smile upon the gravest countenance. The nature of this work being untheological precludes the necessity of touching on this subject from any other than a literary point of view. Even those who reject them must admit their historic value as illustrations of the domestic life and manners of epochs of which we know so little.—P. xli.

Now the life of St. Kentigern is the longest and most important of all the notices given by the Bishop of Brechin. He carefully gives the authorities from which the life as a whole has been derived, and in speaking of the different accounts of the Saint's birth he was not bound to protest against the absurdity of some of them, as he remarks upon the story of his being supposed to be born of a virgin, as detailed by Joceline, some six hundred years afterwards, and quotes this author's opinion that he was born after the regular course of nature, but that his mother was as ignorant of the cause of her conception as Lot was. This odd expression is of course due to Joceline, who meant that she was as unconscious of any intercourse as Lot was when he became the progenitor of the Moabites and Ammonites. We do not object to this or any other of the curious alleged miracles in connexion with this Saint being reproduced, provided the authority is quoted so as to enable the reader to form his own judgment on their probability; but we should have been glad if some attempt had been made to distinguish between what is certain, what is false, and what may be classed under the respective heads of the probable and the improbable. At the end of the life, amidst other facts which the editor is plainly telling in his own words and without reference to authority, it is stated that "he died on a Sunday, when he was an hundred and eighty-five years of age past, in the year 601 according to some, and in the year 612 according to the Annales Cambrie. His day is the 13th of November, and Sunday fell on that day in the years 603 and 614." Now if the reader will deduct 100 years from his life, it will be easy to believe that the Saint died at the advanced age of eighty-five, as is stated in Alban Butler's life of him; but he certainly did not die on a Sunday in either of the years 603 or 614 on the 13th of November, for that day fell on a Wednesday in both those years; nor again could he have died in 601 or 612, if he died on Sunday the 13th of November, for in both of those years this day fell on a Monday. But as January 13 fell on Sunday in both the years 603 and 614, we are inclined to think that November is really a mistake for January, either in the original manuscript from which the account is derived, or else brought in by a scribe in copying, or a printer in composing. Again, we could have wished for some historical account, amongst all these legends of which the life is mostly composed, of his dealings with the Paganian heresy, which he is said to have entirely extirpated from the church of the Picts.

And now we will proceed to notice another of these biographies, that of Queen Margaret of Scotland, the wife of Malcolm III., who died in 1093, on the 16th of November, but was not canonized till the year 1251. There is a document lately come to light from the archives of the Vatican, published in Theiner's Monumenta Historiarum Scotorum, which contains the Commission issued at the request of James III. to inquire into the habits and character of the Queen, and the number and kind of miracles alleged to have been performed at her tomb. It is very curious that the cultus of the Queen should have existed from the time of her death for a hundred and fifty years before she was canonized. The Bishop of Brechin is certainly, we think, right in his conclusion that the suggestion of the canonization from the King of Scotland to the Pope has no reference to the case of Margaret of Denmark, who had died in the course of the preceding year. This view had been propounded by a writer in the Christian Remembrancer, vol. i., p. 333, and had also been adopted by ourselves in articles published some years ago (see Saturday Review for July 29 and August 12, 1865). We have no doubt that Papabroch was wrong when he asserts, without any evidence, that there had been a previous canonization of Queen Margaret, which he thinks necessary to account for her cultus; whereas it is in reality the cultus that led to the petition for her canonization.

And now we must turn to the Kalendars themselves, which will be found to contain several curiosities. Some of them chronicle various superstitious as regards certain days of the year. Amongst these the Kalendarium de Hyrdmanistoun is conspicuous. We regret to say that the Kalendar is a little damaged, so that some of these quaint lines cannot be produced in their integrity. At the end of most of the months are a few Latin hexameters, occasionally varied by an inserted or a concluding pentameter, giving some explanations, which are not always of the clearest kind, as to when the dog-days and other similar periods commence and end. These are sometimes preceded by a line or two which details some local, or perhaps in some cases more general, superstition. Thus, to the month of January in this Kalendar is appended the following rhyming line:—

Nona parat bellum set quinta dat horn flagellum.

In February we have—

Nullus ut octave vel dene dixerit ave;

and in this month we have a couplet informing us that when the year will divide by four without a remainder it is a leap-year. It would puzzle a scholar to put this information into a neat couplet of elegiacs. Those who object to the following may try their hand at a better:—

*Tunc bisextus erit quando per quatuor equos
Annos partiri cum poteris domini.*

Omitting all intermediate entries, we come to the character given to certain days of August, which are very curious. The line at the beginning of the month is—

Prima necat fortem, perditque secunda cohortem.

That at the conclusion is—

Cuspide prima ferit quem septima perdere quatit.

For an explanation of the first of these lines we turned to the Ninth Kalendar, that of Adam King, printed at Paris in English (or rather Scotch) in 1588, where we find that the slaughter of the Macdonalds is attributed to the first of August, and the defeat of the Romans at Caune to the second of the same month. Still there is difficulty in such an allusion to classical history in a Calendar of the thirteenth century. The coincidences, however, is curious. We observe that some of the descriptions of these days apply to any except the earlier days of the month. In one instance only does the number reach as high as fifteen. It is evident, therefore, that the exigencies of hexameter verse have interfered with the descriptive powers of the writer, whoever he may have been.

Some of these lines are very uncouth, not to say unaccountable. The following one—comes under both these heads, even after adopting the obvious emendation of taking the initial (a) from the penultimate word, and annexing it to the preceding word.

Quinta dat Octobris que non avenona colubris—

The first Kalendar printed in the work—namely, the Kalendarium Drummondianum—has none of these rhyming lines; but the fourth and sixth, that of Arbuthnot and that of Novus Furina, give most of the same initial lines as the book of Hyrdmanistoun; but they are in most cases more carefully copied, and in one or two instances they are purposely varied in the Novus Furina.

In the Celtic Kalendar the editor has added the English to the Celtic for the sake of the unlearned. The entries at the beginnings and ends of months in the Kalendar of the Aberdeen Breviary are all of them of the nature of rubrical directions.

We had not intended to say anything about the first Kalendar which appears in this work, and which is the only one that gives at least one event for every day in the year. Some of these entries are nevertheless very curious, and will hardly be thought to be possessed of much authority in point of chronology; as, for instance, when the 6th of September is fixed upon as Natale Zachariæ Profete. However, our reason for noticing this Kalendar here is that the editor has printed in facsimile its first and last pages as a specimen of the mode in which such a book was produced in the eleventh century. Neither of these pages is very easy to read. The first contains a form of exorcism which the editor has not reproduced in print. The other enables us to test his accuracy in transcribing, and we are obliged to say that certain oversights in it throw some suspicions upon the other parts which we have not the same means of testing. In the entry against the 26th of December the editor prints:—

In Hiberniis passio Sancti Stephani protomartyris et Levite Duxoni qui a Joanne lapidatus aliquo Genualeto sancto sepultus est et in Hibernia sanctum confessorium servatus est.

The word Hiberniis is distinctly Hibernicis in the facsimile both here and in other places in which it occurs in the Kalendar, and there is no other before the word Genualeto, and Comen ought to be Commen. The mistakes themselves are of little consequence, but they just suggest a fear whether there may not be others of more importance in the Kalendar, which it must be admitted is very closely written and very difficult to read.

Again, against the 28th of December on the same page we have the following entry:—

Bethleem passio sanctorum infantum qui sub Herode rege coronati sunt numero duorum milium ducentorum.

In this entry the editor has printed Herode rege for Herodis regno, and has omitted a half line which is inserted in a vacant space above the first line, and which ought to come in after the word regno—namely, perfidia pro Christo fuso sanguine.

We have noticed other mistakes in this page, which we will hope has been an unfortunate specimen. They are not of much importance, but one of the chief values of such a reproduction of a MS. is its exact accuracy. We have been minute in our criticism of the Bishop of Brechin as to minor details of his work. We must not omit to thank him for the great amount of information he has put together and for the labour he has bestowed on a work which can never be remunerative for the cost of its publication.

MISS BRADDON'S LAST NOVEL.*

IN this tale the author of Lady Audley's Secret has struck out a new line. In place of the conventional hero made up of yellow moustaches and selfishness, and the heroine with yellow hair, indomitable will, and shady antecedents, we are introduced to a picture of Arcadian simplicity and innocence of a kind quite unusual to meet with even in a novel. Not that the villain of the piece is not a thoroughgoing villain of the approved sort, quite equal to anything of the kind that has been painted before, ready to commit forgery, abduction, and any other crime on the smallest provocation, or indeed often from no apparent motive whatever. But then the hero proper is a young man of the most unexceptionable character; while of the two heroines, the one, if slightly insipid, yet is the very pink of propriety, and if the other does make a slip in early life, she endeavours to recover the lost ground and become an honest woman by a judicious bigamy very soon afterwards.

Robert Ainsleigh is brought up from early childhood by a worthy couple, the warreners on an estate in Berkshire and his wife, his only companion and playmate being their pretty little daughter Margery. When ten years old, Robert—or, as his foster-sister calls him, Robin—is removed from the care of these good people, and taken to reside at the great house, tenanted at that time by the steward, one Mr. Grimshaw, and his wife the housekeeper. This lady, for some reason at present unknown, cherishes a bitter dislike to the youngster whom she has taken under her care, and snubs and bullies him persistently during the next nine years; her husband the while, who, although fulfilling the humble office of house-steward to Lady Barbara LeStrange, is yet a scholar of extraordinary mark, acts as Robert's tutor. The pupil is worthy of the tutor, for at nineteen he could not only turn a love-ditty by Rochester into Anacreontics "in pure Greek," besides reading "alike easily in English, French, Italian, and Latin," but he had also gained a smattering of Sanscrit—a remarkable feat to accomplish in the year 1750, or thirty years before the existence of that language was discovered by Europeans.

While leading this peaceful and useful life, he learns by degrees something of his own history. Lady Barbara LeStrange, the owner of the house and estate, at present at Madrid with her husband, the British Ambassador there, had in her youth been attached to a cousin, one Roderick Ainsleigh, who however, instead of marrying his wealthy and beautiful relative, went to the bad, and disappeared one day simultaneously with the pretty daughter of a neighbouring parson. Shortly afterwards the young lady dies in destitution in London, leaving an infant, our hero, whom Lady Barbara adopts, its father being supposed to have been killed in a brawl in the alums of the town. The orphan has now arrived at manhood, and besides attaining to the degree of scholarship already mentioned, is so gentle-mannered that, when the stern housekeeper, Mrs. Grimshaw, calls him an unmannerly jack-anapes, his reply is couched in language almost touching from its mildness. Mrs. Grimshaw had evidently taught him manners while her husband was teaching him Sanscrit. At this juncture Lady Barbara returns home from Madrid, accompanied by her husband's niece, Miss Dorothea Hemaley, a young lady with a "pale, white-rose face," and a large fortune, and her stepson, Mr. Edward LeStrange, the "first villain" of the tale, and destined to be married to the heiress. Lady Barbara forthwith sets to petting Robin, who receives her kindness with becoming humility, and is over ready to sit on a stool at the feet of "dear madam," and to slobber morally like a human spaniel on every occasion. The consequences were what might be expected. Miss Hemaley, a courted heiress, accustomed to the society of the Spanish Court, would naturally fall in love with so well-conducted a youth, who, to the polished manners acquired in the warreners' hut and in the excellent Mrs. Grimshaw's society, no doubt added the charm of a fine Berkshire accent. Robin returns her affection, but, warned by his kind benefactress, promises her to conceal his feelings, and thereon straightway takes the first opportunity of making them known. Mr. LeStrange, perceiving this interference of Robin with the matrimonial arrangements destined for himself, bestows on him a portion of the hatred which is his leading emotion, but meanwhile amuses himself by seducing the warreners' daughter Margery, now grown up to be a young woman of surpassing beauty, whom he beguiles to London by a promise of marriage. To complete the arrangement, he throws the suspicion caused by her disappearance on Robin, by forging a letter in the handwriting of the latter, making an assignation with the girl, in which his signature is so adroitly counterfeited that our hero stands aghast, and Sir Marcus LeStrange, now returned from Madrid, turns him out of the house.

Robin thereupon goes to London to read for the Bar, and with his usual good sense admits to share his chambers and intimacy a man who is an evident rogue, and who of course is the "second villain" of the story—an agent of the first, employed to work Robin's further ruin, which is very soon accomplished. For on Lady Barbara coming to town with her ward, what more natural than that she, being, as we are given to understand, a peculiarly strong-minded woman, and a model of propriety, with a large fortune in her own right, and entirely independent of her husband, as was also the young lady, should bring the lovers secretly together, and propose a clandestine marriage between them, her scheme being that Robin should carry off the young lady from a masquerade at Ranelagh? What more natural, also, than that this gallant and discreet young man should confide the plot to his chance acquaintance, Mr. Hay—the "second villain" above referred to, and whom even he suspects to be a rogue—and that he should join that gentleman and one Sergeant O'Blagg of the East India Company's service in a dinner on the evening of the performance; that these two worthies should drug his wine; that when the lady meets him according to appointment, and they repair to the house where the Fleet marriage is to be celebrated, his suggestion to take the obvious precaution of ascertaining that he has got hold of the right lady by lifting her veil is silenced by Mr. Hay, who objects that the lookers on might discover, as well as the bridegroom, who she is? It need hardly be said that, when the veil is lifted, after the ceremony, Robin finds he has married a person he did not intend to marry—namely, his old acquaintance Margery, now the cast-off mistress of LeStrange, who of course has arranged the whole affair with the aid of his accomplice Mr. Hay, and who now himself appears on the scene to enjoy the spectacle of his rival's discomfiture. While Robin is protesting feebly against the trick, in come a party of crimps, headed by Sergeant O'Blagg, who claims him as a recruit for the East India Company, in virtue of some remarks let fall during the dinner party above mentioned. Robin is next described as struggling with his captors (a proceeding in the occurrence of which we disbelieve wholly, so sensible a line of action being utterly inconsistent with his known antecedents), whereupon he is knocked down, and eventually carried on board a troopship bound to India, in company with Mr. Hay, whom Mr. LeStrange has also made over to the crimps, thus cleverly killing two birds with one stone, and getting rid at the same time of his rival and of the accomplice whose revelations might prove embarrassing. Why the crimps did not improve the occasion by carrying off Mr. LeStrange himself, as well as the parson and the landlord of the house and the bystanders generally, is not explained; but it would apparently have been just as easy to do so. However, the kidnapped gentlemen (who continue to be fast friends, the gentle Robin feeling no improper resentment against the ruffian who has ruined him) are accompanied on their voyage to India by the sergeant, who has at any rate the courage of his opinions, and cheerfully shares with his compulsory recruits the horrors of the seven months' passage, finding apparently a sufficient recompense for his own sufferings in the knowledge that our hero and the other recruits have also to undergo them.

Arrived at Calcutta, Robin soon attracts the attention of Mr. Holwell, mainly from his acquirements in Sanscrit, which must undoubtedly have created a sensation; and on being taken up by that gentleman and promoted to a subordinate clerkship, he forthwith attaches himself to him in the spaniel-like fashion which invariably characterises his relations towards his patrons. We are now treated to the episode of the Black Hole and the battle of Plassey, for putting which scene on the stage there has been a great show of historical properties; and indeed so far as regards calling the Hindoos Gentoos, and the Mahomedans Moors, the description may be pronounced quite lifelike, for that is just what the Anglo-Indians of those days used to do; but the actual verisimilitude of the picture may be gleaned from the following extracts. The scene of the Black Hole is thus described:—

The first impulse was one wild burst of rage. A block of living creatures rolled desperately against the door, in the hope to force it open. But, alas! the door opened inwards, and this dead weight could do nothing against it. Some of these unarmed wretches next tried to drag it open with their hands and nails, and fell back presently with bleeding, lacerated fingers, howling with pain.

Considering that there were nearly a hundred and fifty persons jammed into a room eighteen feet square, any such action could obviously not have occurred. A very small amount of imagination might have prevented such a blunder as that of describing these unhappy creatures as rolling about like a street crowd, and a part of them "falling back" from a rest at the door. But this is nothing to what follows. Among the victims is Mr. Hay, who in his dying moments reveals an important secret to Robin in the following words:—

* Supposing you ever escape from this hell and get back to England, which is doubtful, would you bless me if I told you that the marriage in Fleet Street was no marriage—that Margery Hawker is no wife of yours? She is my wife. I had helped in the elopement, you know, and was his gentleman body-servant, henchman, bully, and hanger-on in general. The poor child fretted over her dishonour, and as proposed to make an honest woman of her by marrying her—to me. . . . Then arose the notable scheme of marrying Margery to you, to prevent your marriage with Miss Dorothea, and thus make assurance doubly sure in the event of our kidnapping plan proving a failure. A tangled web of intrigue, is it not? I left the certificate of my marriage in the safe keeping of a friend in London, in case it should ever be wanted."

* Robert Ainsleigh. By the Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," &c. &c. London: Maxwell & Co. 1872.

"What friend?" I asked eagerly, for I felt him growing heavier as he hung upon me, while his whispers sounded fainter in my ear. "Your friend's name, Phil?" I cried; "for God's sake tell me that!"

"A lawyer, and a fellow I can trust. A scoundrel, Bob; but your thorough-paced scoundrels can trust each other. It's only your half-and-half rogues who turn traitors."

"His name?"

"Too late. His arm loosened upon my neck, and he slipped down, &c. &c."

Of course it was too late, for the exigencies of the tale require that the correct address should not be discovered till the third volume; but it must be admitted that for a man dying of suffocation under every circumstance of horror this statement was tolerably coherent. The felicitous painting of nature embodied in the description will be recognized by every reader. Of all the absurdly unreal death scenes to be found scattered among the sensation novels which it has been our ill fortune to read, this is about the most absurd.

Robin eventually returns to England, with three thousand pounds in his pocket, bent on obtaining revenge upon his enemy Lestrangle. Going to the theatre on his arrival, he recognizes in the beautiful actress who shares with Garrick the foremost place on the stage, and whom all London is talking about, his quondam foster-sister and would-be wife, Margery, who it appears, on explanation, had joined a strolling company of actors after the Fleet marriage, which happy condition naturally enabled her to shake off any vulgarity of manner or accent imbibed from previous associations down in Berkshire, and to develop into a refined and finished personifier of Shakespearian heroines; and, her genius being first recognized by Mr. Garrick, she straightway sets the town on fire by her grace and beauty. To her Robin imparts the information that her husband is dead and herself a free woman; and going away he forthwith discloses like a sneak the secret of the famous actress's past history to the first acquaintance he picks up in a tavern. But indeed a capacity for keeping secrets was not among the young man's qualifications. However, his object is revenge, and having waylaid Lestrangle in the street with a horsewhip, it might be supposed that he would take the opportunity of giving him a thrashing. But this would have been by far too sensible a course for our hero, who lets his enemy go on the condition that he will fight a duel with him. He is now at last to have the revenge which he has been looking for so many years; nor does he allow his satisfaction at the prospect to be alloyed by the reflection that fighting is a game two can play at, and that, since Lestrangle is an accomplished duellist while he has never handled a rapier, it is just possible the revenge may be the other way. As he philosophically puts it, "I held my life as a possession so worthless, that I did not even take the trouble to consider the hazard of its coming to a sudden end within a dozen hours"; if he had, he would not have been the constant donkey he is described to be throughout the book. However, Lestrangle, who seems to have been a good-natured fellow at bottom, lets him off cheaply, first winging Robin's second, whom the latter with his usual happy tact has managed to drag into the quarrel, and then wounding Robin, without killing him; whereupon Margery, who has been madly in love with him for the last ten years, her raison with Lestrangle and marriage with Mr. Hay notwithstanding, nurses him through his illness, a duty for which her past life as member of a strolling company and her present engagement as the star of a London theatre eminently qualify her. Robin in return, out of gratitude, getting over the little difficulty of her having lived with Lestrangle, and her intended bigamous marriage with himself, offers to marry her regularly.

How Robin afterwards goes down and establishes himself in Lestrangle's Berkshire house, without the owner's permission, thereby perloining a will which gives him the latter's property; how, when still weak after his illness, and dogged by a spy of Lestrangle whom he knows to be following him, he takes a walk on a lonely common instead of following the straight road to the town, solely in order that the said spy may fall upon him, when of course his pistols miss fire, and the spy knocks him on the head, for no apparent object, however, since nothing comes of the adventure; how, when arrested on suspicion of the murder of Lestrangle, he immediately despatches the only friend in London who could be of use in the emergency to look after some business in the country that might very well have waited, and desires another witness who could have proved an alibi not to trouble himself about coming up to town; how, when brought before a magistrate nearly as wise as himself, he was at last got out of the difficulty by the only member of his family possessed of any common sense; how the excellent Margery, impressed with a sudden happy thought, determines to eschew regular matrimony and set Robin free to receive the hand of a lovely, if somewhat insipid widow, who has been devotedly attached to him all the time her husband was alive—all these interesting and lifelike incidents the reader may find recorded. Given, in short, a fatuous donkey, always ready to tumble into the most obvious traps; three weak-minded women and a couple of unscrupulous but inconsistent scoundrels; disguised consistency and daff probability, and you may bring any amount of sensation within the compass of three volumes. Robert Litchfield is just the sort of book which might have been produced by some country Miss in her teens, whose notions of real life had been derived from the novels of the authors of Lady Audley's Secret and Guy Livingstone. Of anything natural, whether of incident or character, there is not a trace. Miss Litchfield should stick to her long-moustached men and yellow-haired female demons. If not very probable creations, they had at any rate some stuff in them. Attempting to paint a hero of more simple type, she has described a mere blockhead of supernatural stupidity and insipidity, while the plot of the tale is as feeble as the character ascribed to Robin himself.

RECENT EXPOSITORS OF EURIPIDES.*

THE lovers of the most pathetic of Greek dramatists will gladly welcome two volumes which, each in its own way, aim at the rehabilitation of Euripides; and their satisfaction will be enhanced when they find that in these instances the dramatist has no need to cry "Save me from my friends!" Euripides has more than once of late years been unlucky in this respect; but Mr. Browning's Balanstion seems to have marked the turn of the tide, which is not likely to ebb when it gains a fresh impetus from such well-considered surveys of the poet's life and works as that for which we have to thank the veteran Licensor of Plays, or when the charm of a particular drama can enlist the sympathies of a practical man like Mr. Thorold Rogers. The spirit of our age is such that it will be no marvel if we veer round towards "Euripides the human," and do our endeavour to redress the unfairness of ancient bias towards the rugged beauty of Æschylus or the refined æstheticism of Sophocles; and assuredly in the two volumes before us there are satisfactory tokens of a change in this direction.

Mr. Donne's earlier chapters will be found extremely serviceable in helping to a right conception of the times, the scenes, and the characters amidst which Euripides was matured. In no "Theatre of the Greeks"—and there have been half-a-dozen attempts at this sort of thing within the last half-century—do we find so vivid and distinct an expression of the aspect of the Attic clime, its amusements, and its representative men, in the days of the youngest member of the dramatic triumvirate; when philosophy was beginning to be more popular than muscularity and Marathonian rudeness, and the Sophoclean reverence for the "composure of art" had become liable to a suspicion of sameness, if not tameness. We are reminded in these pages how the genius of Euripides discovered its true bent despite the advice of sooth-sayers who would have persuaded him to court failure as an athlete rather than success as a dramatist; and how the best of philosophic tutors and lecturers conduced to the development of a poet of finer fibre than the giant Æschylus, and of profounder human insight than the artistic Sophocles. It was his to humanize the stern gods of the elder superstition, and for this and kindred offences against Athenian Conservatism he incurred the persistent hostility of Aristophanes, which has unquestionably operated against him with posterity; but it is now time for advocates like the writer of the life before us to disabuse men's minds of slanders which were for the most part unfounded, and to explain away with temperate and not over-done zeal the libels which former generations accepted simply through incuriousness.

Take, for example, the charge of misogyny which has stuck so inseparably to Euripides; can there be a better illustration of the proverb about the flinging of mud? There was a tradition that he was a bigamist, and was unfortunate in his double dose of matrimony. It might fairly follow that, as Gellius gossips and our sceptic, David Hume, somewhat credulously believes, he ever after entertained an aversion for the sex. But how much of this are we to credit, when, as Mr. Donne notices, one report of the cause of Euripides's death was that he was killed by women when on his way to keep an assignation? It is hard to believe both stories, and perhaps neither may be wholly true. Euripides may have been henpecked and unhappy in his matrimonial life, but, if so, his fate has its parallels, as Mr. Donne shows, in the annals of modern poets and poetry. He may have relieved his feelings now and then by the portrayal of a bad woman, but assuredly it ought to be remembered, per contra, that no poet has given nobler pictures of good women. Polyxena, Macaria, Evadne, Electra, Iphigenia, as a daughter and sister and heroic woman, Alcestis, and Hecuba, are names that will occur to every one in proof of this; and what have we to set against them? Jocasta, in her calamity and involuntary sin, "braver and wiser than the men about her"; Phædra, "not a vicious woman, but the helpless victim of an irate deity"; Medea, "the fierce and revengeful heroine," whom the poet so depicts that she "has all our sympathy while Jason has all our contempt." It is perhaps tactically unwise, and superfluous also, in Mr. Donne to turn the tables on Aristophanes; and, when Euripides is charged with misogyny, to hold up the Lysistrata and Theophrastus, and, as it were, cry out "You're another!" but he makes a true point when (p. 71) he notes that, whilst all the heroines of Sophocles are ideal * Euripides. (Ancient Classics for English Readers.) By William Bingham Donne. Edinburgh and London: Blackwood & Sons. 1872.

The Works of Euripides, Translated into English Verse. By James E. Thorold Rogers. Oxford and London: Parker & Co. 1872.

heroines, those of Euripides are "human beings with strong passions, yet stronger affections," and actuated by "a deep sense of duty and religion." And as to the imputations of antiquity on the poet's moral opinions and practice, his bad citizenship and bad theology, is it not true that a great part of them arise from looking at Euripides through the spectacles of Aristophanes, who feared and suspected the student of physical science and of moral philosophy, and ranked him as a scoundrel with the greater teacher Socrates? As to his morality, it is too summarily disposed of when he is held to justify "mental reservation" from the famous line in the Hippolytus, or "usurpation and inordinate ambition" from the verses in the Phænissæ, without reference to the context or to the character of the speaker. If the poet's morals may be inferred from his writings, we may cite the chaste Hippolytus, or Parthenopæus in the "Suppliants," the modest Achilles of the Iphigenia, the "sweet holiness of youth" represented in the boy Ion. And if, depicting, as is his custom, men as he found them, Euripides has introduced not a few shifty, crafty Greeks (as some might say, not inconsistently with the national character in all times), what is there in this that is not common to his partners in Greek dramatic fame? We need but go to Mr. Donne for an instance:—"In none of his plays," he writes, "has he depicted such a thoroughgoing scoundrel as the Sophoclean Ulysses in the Philocetes." For a representative poltroon commend us to the same character in the Ajax. On the whole, thanks are due to our new vindicator of Euripides for his defence of him as a poet far in advance of his age in his views and feelings towards women, and slaves, and children; and we are disposed to endorse Mr. Donne's ascription of the preservation of so many of his works to this human element in them:—

Some attraction or charm there was in them that touched the heart of Hellas from its eastern to its western border, and so held above water a fourth at least of his writings, when the deluge of barbarism or bigotry swept away so many thousands of Greek dramas, and among them some that had borne off the crown from Æschylus or Sophocles. Sunt lacrimæ rerum et mentis mortalis tangunt. The very tenderness of Euripides, though treated with effluency or degradation of art by critics of the Aristophanic school, may have had its influence in the salvage of seventeen plays, and fragments of others, exceeding in number the sum of those of both his extant competitors.

In his sketches of the extant plays of Euripides Mr. Donne has displayed great tact, grouping in a couple of the later chapters comparatively unimportant works like the Trœades and Hæcchada, and such inartistic dramas as the Phænissæ, which, though fraught with stirring incident and effective situations, is a sin against Coriuna's maxim, "to sow with the hand and not with the sickle." Ten plays are thus somewhat summarily disposed of; but not the most determined stickler for the claims of Euripides can find fault with Mr. Donne's handling of the other seven. Of these he groups two, the Alcestis and Medea, in one chapter, as the most pathetic, we presume, of the Euripidean catalogue. In discussing the first, he notes a feature common to only one other play of Euripides, the personification of an evil in which flesh is heir; in this case Death, in the Hercules Furens, Lyssa or Phrensy. Both are depicted as strong-willed and active personages, having no little part in the action of the dramas which they characterize. The theory that the Alcestis is a semi-comedy, or a satiric drama, is justly discredited. It has indeed enough of the comic element in it to rank as a comœdia larmoyante, a title to which elsewhere Mr. Donne shows that the Iphigenia in Tauris has no real claim, because the suspense and dread that reign in it are to all intents tragic. But even in the Alcestis the comic element is comparatively slight, and we agree in Mr. Donne's view (p. 186-7) that the Helen fulfils in a far higher degree this comic character, being as it is a kind of satiric setting-things-to-rights, and making everybody happy—on the theory that whilst Paris eloped with a phantom, Helen spent the eventful twice ten years in a "grass widowhood in Egypt"—which rather reminds us of Thackeray's amusing trifle Rebecca and Rowena. Perhaps the tears of the Alcestis need some counterpoise of laughter, which is supplied by the jovial Hercules, as it is also in some degree by the grandfather Phœrus, whose objections to humouring his son Admetus by acting as a substitute for Alcestis are thrown into an amusing paraphrase by Mr. Donne. We are not sure that the Medea is not the finer and more satisfactory play, as indeed the favour which it has found at all times with translators and adapters would seem to show. In the pages devoted to it the wronged wife and mother's character is well discriminated, and care is taken to distinguish her from the mere vixen or shrew. By a strange slip two passages of a translation by Dean Milman, descriptive of Medea before she left her sire and home, are said to be from Valerius Flaccus, whereas of course they are from Apollonius Rhodius. The mistake calls the more urgently for correction, because in the context Virgil is said to have found much to borrow in the lines; which would have been impossible if Flaccus, a contemporary of Martial, had written them.

Another chapter is given to the two Iphigenias. The Iphigenia in Aulis is the best play of the "spectacular" kind, and one of the best for the delineation of character, in Euripides; while the Iphigenia in Tauris stands almost alone for the spirit and excellence of its plot. In the former, to say nothing of the famous opening scene, there is great skill in the portraiture of Iphigenia. "Not Thebes when first entering Wallenstein's palace and seeing the royal state by which her father was surrounded, not Miranda, standing for the first time on 'the brave new world,' are more delicate creations of poetic fancy than Iphigenia in her childlike amazement and delight on reaching the camp and the tent of her sire." As to the Iphigenia in Aulis, we will only remark that it is strange Mr. Donne should have drawn no parallel betwixt her and Jephtha's daughter, even as, when discussing the Alcestis, he is not led even to glance at the foreshadowing therein of the doctrine of atonement. The Euripidean counterpart of the youthful Samuel, the founding son in the Delphic temple, supplies our author with a theme for half a delightful chapter. The plot of the Ion is intensely complex, and in no play of Euripides is the suspense so breathless from the opening till the dénouement. It is rightly styled by Mr. Donne a romantic rather than a classical drama; and it would not be labour lost if some one of our modern translators would set his hand to a good version of a play which dramatizes the legend whereby Athens in her high estate aspired to consecrate her origin on the spear side, even as she realized it on the spindle side (p. 138, &c.). The quotations in this and several other chapters are of necessity from Potter; and we are spoilt for Potter when we have enjoyed extracts from Mr. Browning's Balaustion for the Alcestis, from Mr. Webster for Medea, and from Mr. Purcell Fitzgerald for the Hippolytus.

For the Bacchæ Mr. Donne has availed himself of the beautiful version of Dean Milman, to which it is no small compliment to Mr. Rogers to say that his translation is to some extent comparable. We have never shared the modern taste for unrhymed choruses, though it were idle to let prejudice interfere with our appreciation of the spirited "unrhyme" for which Milton's "Agonistes" is his precedent. Of the dialogue, speeches, and monostichs, Mr. Rogers's rendering is a transcript of the drift and sense, not the less telling for not being severely literal. Very seldom indeed can a blot or a fault be spied in it; and his preface, whilst it supplies all needful information touching the play, is moreover decidedly ingenious. Mr. Donne follows the usual theory that the Bacchæ, which was written and first exhibited at Pellæ and the Court of Archelaus, was a tribute to the favourite god of Northern Greece, whose worship was there, he hints, as devoutly observed in practice as in faith. Commonly this drama is cited as a proof that age and declining years had tamed down Euripides to orthodoxy, and that it was designed to be a sort of recantation. But Mr. Rogers ventures on another theory:—"It is possible that Euripides may have recognized in the rites of the Macedonian Bacchantes one of those correctives to the wantonness and insolence of an autocrat which enthusiasm always supplies." He sees a protest against the engrossing will of an able and unscrupulous monarch in the alliance of human liberty with religious enthusiasm. Certainly there are lines in the play which favour such a view, though it is a very speculative and problematical view after all. When the messenger says to Pentheus (670-1):—

τὸ γὰρ τάχος σου τῶν θνητῶν ὀδὸν ἄραξ, καὶ τοὺς ἐθέλοντας καὶ τὸ βασιλικὸν λαν, there is a hint to despots in the Greek, not lost sight of in Mr. Rogers's English:—

I fear the quickness of thy wrath; for, Sir, Thou art sharp-temper'd and right royal too.

Are we to suppose that the Macedonian King was fine-witted enough to take the hint, as he sat in the theatre, possibly not wholly unobscured by Bacchic influences? When, however, we compare this passage with another in the same play, it does not escape us that Mr. Rogers lets democracy down very lightly. Teiresias says in vv. 270-1:—

θρασὺς γὰρ δυνατὸς καὶ λίγην ὀλὸς ἴ' ἀνὴρ κατὰ πολίτης γίγνεται νοῦν οὐκ ἔχων;

or, as Dean Milman renders,

For the bold demagogue, powerful in speech,
Is but a dangerous citizen, lacking sense.

But audi alteram partem. Surely there is undue mildness in the vague rendering by Mr. Rogers:—

However skilled a man may be in speech,
If he be rash and reckless, he becomes
A bane to others, for his mind is void.

In judging the value of Mr. Rogers's theory, we incline to the advice of the chorus in vv. 427-8, and are disposed to Avoid the schemes and saws of those Who would be singular.

Yet though this be so, it does not detract from the merit of his translation, which is very even, sound, and metrical. The first antistrophe of the second chorus will prove our words:—

Lips that never check their speech,
Fully freed from due restraint,
Ever work a final woe;
But the quiet, patient heart,
Guided still by wisdom's rule,
All unshaken doth remain
And saves the household; for the gods of heaven afar,
Though dwelling in the glittering sky, behold the deeds of men.
That wisdom is not wise
Which aims beyond man's power.
Short is our life: to grasp at much is but to lose the present good;
And this to me seems like the deed of frantic and of foolish men.

Here we take leave of two tributes to the merit of Euripides, each of which is in its measure calculated to enhance the estimation of the most pathetic and philosophic of Greek dramatists.

EXTEMPORARY PREACHING.*

A QUESTION is sometimes put whether sermons ought to be extemporary. To such a question we should say that there can be but one answer. Extemporaneous preaching is simply detestable when we understand by it improvised preaching. It is nothing short of ridiculous arrogance for any man to get up into the pulpit and treat a congregation to the mere accidental skimmings of his mind. In the excitement of debate, a man already full of his subject may very probably pour out a more impressive oration than he could have elaborated in his study. The substance is there, and all he has to do is to give it the form which is most appropriate to the feelings of the moment; but then a preacher is not a debater. He has not the stimulus of a struggle, nor has he to discuss a merely personal question; and a sermon which has been delivered without premeditation will be forgotten without regret. If, on the other hand, extemporary be understood in a sense compatible with careful previous preparation, the answer is as plain in the other sense. No true orator who understands, as every true orator must understand, the primary importance of placing himself thoroughly in sympathy with his audience, can bear to be fettered by a previously written discourse. A spoken pamphlet is notoriously a most depressing production both for the speaker and the hearers. The words should come fresh from the brain, and be moulded on the spur of the moment. The preacher, indeed, should have the framework fully impressed upon his mind; he should be in no danger of losing the thread of his discourse, though he should be able to drop it and to take it up again, to insist upon the telling points, and to pass over more rapidly those which are uninteresting at a moment's notice. An orator is in many ways an actor; and as the most experienced dramatists fail to predict the fate of a play until it is actually performed, so the most experienced author can only be quite sure of his effects when he instinctively feels whether or not they are congenial to the mood of his hearers. From this it would seem to follow that, as the great body of preachers, like the great body of all other classes, are very poor orators, it is better for nine men out of ten to trust to written sermons, which may at least be sensible, if they are not stirring; and that only the tenth, who feels the true impulse, should aim at the higher effects which are obtainable by the extemporary speaker alone. And from this it would apparently follow again that a treatise on extemporary preaching is not likely to be of much practical use. It naturally falls into a more or less systematic collection of rides. Those only can make good use of them who do not require them. The heaven-born orator will regard them instinctively in most cases, and he will disregard them equally when he comes upon an exception. The orator manufactured in the schools will find them a clog upon his energies and a temptation to pedantic formality, and after all will be but a wooden imitation of the genuine speaker. In short, one would be inclined to say at first sight that extemporary preaching is one of those arts which can be no more taught than poetry. A treatise on the subject may possibly help critics to lay down sound canons for judging the works of men of genius; but it cannot provide even a tolerable substitute for genius. It may help us to understand why we have been moved, but can hardly enable us to move others.

Mr. Potter, who is a Professor of Sacred Eloquence in a Roman Catholic College, and whose book bears the imprimatur of Cardinal Cullen, has not been discouraged by these obvious considerations from writing a book upon the subject. Though he would apparently agree in much that we have said, he believes, as a professor is bound to believe, in the power of systematic training. His method of teaching indeed goes to show that he believes more in the efficacy of practice than of precept. The students over whom he presides have first to go through a two years' course of English literature. Then during three years they have to compose a sermon once every three weeks, on an appointed subject. A certain number of these sermons are delivered in public, and are criticized by the professor. Though of course the sermons are not likely to be valuable in themselves, the practice thus obtained is expected to give command of language and habit in arranging ideas, and to enable the students afterwards to take up extemporary preaching. We see no reason to doubt that the results, as the professor believes, are satisfactory, and we could wish to see a similar course of instruction carried out for the benefit of our own clergy. No one could wish otherwise who has occasionally had to witness the painful spectacle of a well-meaning youth suddenly put up to instruct an educated audience when he has never before put two words together in public. We only venture to doubt whether the simple habit is not of more value than the theoretical instructions on which it is supposed to be based. We should be inclined even to think that the best of all practice is that which is frequently obtained in the much ridiculed institutions called debating clubs. Silly as is most of the eloquence expended at the Oxford and Cambridge Unions, the training received is not to be despised. The lad learns to think upon their legs, not to be put out by the concentrated gaze of a few scores of human eyes, and to appreciate the importance of keeping silent their own intellects and the attention of their audience. The hearers have the great merit that they are not squeamish in expressing their feelings; and perhaps their spontaneous verdict is more efficacious than the formal criticism of a Professor of Eloquence.

However this may be, we have little fault to find with the doctrines put forward by Mr. Potter. They are sensible and often forcibly expressed; and the only remark we should be inclined to make is that they possibly run a little too much into a pseudo-systematic form. A professor is naturally inclined to classify and subdivide more than his subject will fairly bear. Nothing, for example, can be more true than his remarks on the importance of having a single leading idea and a definite practical aim. The student, he tells us, is to "remember that his sermon will be nothing more than the development of one great leading practical truth, and that this truth, embodied in a plain practical proposition, to be enunciated more or less formally as circumstances may require or suggest, will form the foundation of his discourse." We begin to hesitate a little when this doctrine is stated in the form that every orderly sermon should be reducible to a syllogism. "Ideopsis," says Mr. Potter, "explains this clearly and well. Every sermon, says he, is a syllogism, of which the major is contained in the introduction, the minor in the proposition, the arguments or proofs in the body of the discourse, and the consequence in the peroration." This fact is illustrated by the skeleton of a sermon on Mortal Sin. The leading idea is that there is only one real evil in the world, the evil of mortal sin. The introduction states that if there be only one real evil in the world, we, if we were really Christians, should be horror-struck at the thought of offending God by it. The proposition considers mortal sin severally as an offence to God, as an injury to ourselves, and as an egregious folly. And the conclusion is that we should do our utmost to avoid sinning. We confess that this meagre account of the sermon reminds us of one composed by a certain preacher of five years old. This text, he began, teaches us that we should all be good; and after some reflection, he added, and that none of us should be naughty. Perhaps as a teacher of Irish youths Mr. Potter is right in insisting upon the primary importance of strict logical arrangement; and yet we cannot help feeling that these syllogisms are the mere dry bones of oratory, and that oratory modelled upon them is likely to show the skeleton a little too clearly. Mr. Potter, indeed, goes on to insist very forcibly on the necessity of avoiding excessive formality, and he admits the impossibility of laying down any "very strict rules" in regard to the greater part of the subject. We feel indeed that his skeleton sermon might become the driest of all possible discourses in the hands of a dull speaker, just as it might glow with irrepressible fervour in the hands of a master of the art. All that he says is true enough and important in its way; but it goes a very little way. Clearness of aim and thorough command of the subject is necessary in all preaching; elaborate preparation, such as he suggests, is at least as necessary in extemporary as in other preaching; but after this has been done comes the real difficulty, and that is where all rules fail us. Mr. Potter himself gives the true secret of success in his concluding pages. "The popular preacher," he says, "must be thoroughly in earnest. It is one of the conditions of success which nature has laid down, and he must be content to abide by the general law." We should prefer to say that it is the one condition of success. To preach a really effective sermon, a man should believe every word that he says, and believe that it is of vast importance to his hearers. No sermon preached under such conditions, not even the sermon of poor Sammy Breese the Methodist, whom Mr. Potter appears to regard as the type of all Protestant orators, will fail to impress an audience. If a man really believes that you will be damned if you don't accept his preaching, he becomes a power at once. If he is secretly conscious that it does not very much matter whether you believe it or not, and if he is not very certain whether it is particularly true, he will fail to impress you though he speak with the tongues of men and of angels. If it be true, as Mr. Potter hypothetically suggests, that few preachers nowadays ever convert a sinner, because there are few who ever propose to themselves to do anything of the kind, there is no need of further reasons for explaining the want of good sermons. The successful preachers whom he mentions, from Sammy Breese up to Dr. Newman, all possess the same secret and may all be useful in their various ways. We do not of course mean to suggest that reasoning powers, or thorough education, or refined taste and oratorical practice may not be of the utmost value. But his rules seem of necessity to be either too narrow or too wide. If he confines himself simply to advocating simplicity and good arrangement of matter, his precepts, though sound and sensible, take us but a little way; when he goes further he is really exhorting his hearers to be genuine believers, powerful reasoners, and learned, warm-hearted, and genial men; and though such qualities are essentially requisite to the highest kind of oratory, they scarcely come within the scope of an oratorical treatise. So far, however, as Mr. Potter helps to impress upon young preachers of any persuasion the necessity of a careful study of their art, his book may be useful. We may say, in conclusion, that it is not confined in its application to any sect. He seems, as is natural, to assume very erroneously that grotesque and silly conceits are confined to Protestants, and that great preachers are naturally Catholics. It would be easy to produce abundant examples in opposition to both of these opinions, but the book deals very indirectly with controversy, and the author quotes with approval the works of men of radically different schools of thought.

* The Spoken Word, or, the Art of Extemporaneous Preaching. By the Rev. Thomas J. Potter. Dublin: McGlashan & Gill. 1872.

SHE WAS YOUNG AND HE WAS OLD.*

IF the title of this novel is somewhat cumbersome, it has the unusual merit of indicating both the plot and the character of the story. Running calmly through its three volumes, unbroken by sensational writing or incident, the story at times becomes tedious. We may describe it as a study of negatives; of indefinite unsatisfied longings, of innocence sacrificing itself to generous impulses, and appreciating the painful sacrifice at leisure. The young girl who has married her father's friend and her mother's benefactor learns slowly that she has marred her own existence, while evincing her gratitude at a cost to herself which her husband never realizes. She is a simple, unpretending, and exceedingly clever sketch; while the spoiled little sister to whom she is a mother is instinct with piquancy and quiet humour. The author—whom we venture pretty confidently to set down as a woman—is an exceedingly graceful writer, with a good deal of literary taste. Her pair of sisters have evidently been a work of love, and of some pride as well. We may congratulate her on a success. Faults we might pick out in the character of the elder girl. Prudish moralists might put harsher constructions on her conduct than we are inclined to do, and captious critics might urge that her free innocence of behaviour was inconsistent with her premature womanhood and sound common sense. We are inclined to say that critics and moralists would both be wrong, and to pronounce her not only possible, but probable. She is certainly made so very life-like that we have learned to look at her with her creator's partial eyes, and to regard her inconsistencies as no more than may fall to the lot of the most excellent and high-principled of mortals. Perhaps the sisters spoil us; but when we quit their society we do not care so much for the rest of the company. The most telling of the subordinate characters are foreigners, and they figure rarely and dimly in the remote background, and are dashed in in the faintest outline. Mr. Marshall, the elderly husband, is very much of a nonentity, although natural enough so far as he goes. But we should be loth to believe that English society as a rule is so very unattractive as the author would persuade us. We should be inclined to think she is most at home when abroad; that she paints her home-bred country people only at second-hand. She impartially attributes to all classes an unfair preponderance of vulgarity, eccentricity, and folly. We have no doubt it is of deliberate design that she makes so many persons moving in "the best society" vulgar in their instincts, and consequently in their demeanour. As she has shown in her heroine, few authors can identify themselves more absolutely with delicacy and refinement. But we English have so much to answer for in the way of social snobbery that we are sensitive as to suffering our country to be caricatured without a word of remonstrance. Not that the satire—if satire it be meant for—is likely to sting in this instance. All these secondary personages look not only dim, but blurred, by the side of the bright and sparkling heroines. We shrewdly suspect that the author knew something of Nellie and Georgie Urquhart in the flesh, but we are satisfied that the rest of them are far more ideal than realistic. The surly, cross-grained baronet, with his submissive, sickly wife; Mr. Nugent, the crotchety domestic tyrant, and his good-humoured better half; Mrs. Bland, the rector's lady, gushing and voluble toady of Miss Chesney, the overbearing spinster sister at the Hall; Amethyst Berners, the purse-proud beauty and heiress, who seems to us simply impossible in any decent society, and whom any gentleman must have been slow to admire, in spite of her charms and her heavy purse; the gossiping ladies of the little provincial town of Easterton, and Mrs. Ellison, the solicitor's wealthy sister—these on the whole have perhaps more lenient measure dealt them than their social betters; although we can quite sympathise with Mrs. Marshall's objections to a close intimacy with them. One other personage we have reserved to the last, and that is the hero. As his character and conduct mix themselves up inextricably with those of the heroine, we shall say no more of him here than that we take him as a proof the more that the book is written by a lady.

It is a case of liking at first sight, when we make the acquaintance of the heroine. Nellie Urquhart is tending her dying mother, in the mixed society of a Swiss pension. She is at once a woman and a girl, or rather a child. Her character is as firm as her heart is fresh. It has become a habit with her to consider herself after her mother and her sister. With her primitive foreign breeding, she has no sense of the superficial proprieties on which English society insists; and it is because the bloom of innocence lies still upon her nature that she speaks so frankly on subjects which most English girls would avoid. Her dying mother leaves her with a scanty income and a younger sister. It is evident to Miss Urquhart that she must do something for a livelihood, and her natural resource is the situation of a governess. It is her dream that she should light upon some genial and wealthy household, where her sister might be welcomed as well as herself. The dream fulfils itself in a more probable shape when Mr. Marshall, the well-to-do Easterton solicitor, appears upon the scene, and offers her his hand. In the arrangements that follow, the foreign side of Eleanor's English character is admirably worked out. Her mother is dead; Mr. Marshall is her guardian as well as the agent to her hand. She has an intimate Swiss friend, who had just married an elderly professor, and she has seen and almost envied their ménage. She is imbued with the foreign idea that well-regulated marriages are matters of family arrangement. She has been left "her own mother," and it naturally devolves upon her to discuss the affair and decide upon it. She shows even less consciousness than the elderly lawyer of the delicate ground she is often treading on. He is inclined to blush and be bashful when she touches on sentimental considerations, until, looking in her face, her intense unconsciousness reassures him. All the time we see, although she may not, that she has heart and plenty of it; for, ignoring possibilities of the future, she regards her marriage far more as a matter of business than of sentiment. She knows nothing of love in a matrimonial sense, and never thinks of it. The treasures of her affection she lavishes on her little sister. It is for Georgie that she consents without reluctance to discharge the family debt of gratitude to Mr. Marshall, and ungrateful Georgie has taken a strong prejudice against the family benefactor. Naturally the little girl cannot understand her sister's loving him, so she is scarcely jealous. Yet she has heard it said that husbands should have the first place in their wives' affections, and, puzzling herself upon that point, she puts her sister through a suggestive and searching cross-examination. The scene is delicious where the child, expressing precocious thoughts in infantine language, sets herself to embarrass her sister as of malice prepense. We do not say that Georgie is the best character in the book, because her sister Eleanor is, as she ought to be, the more highly finished of the two. Eleanor evinces more unobtrusive talent, both in conception and execution. But, unquestionably, Georgie does most to brighten the pages. She shows herself in reality the clever child she is supposed to be, and yet her cleverness is never overdone so as to seem unnatural. There are many of her speeches we have smiled over, and had we the space we should like to quote them. But quoting here and there would do her scanty justice, for the very reason that she is a child, and not a wit, and her sententious prattle is diffuse rather than epigrammatic.

The story opens in Switzerland, and it is in Switzerland that the dénouement occurs, such as it is. The rest of the scene is laid in England. She was young and he was old, and she gradually begins to find it out. He is all that is indulgent to her, but utterly unsympathetic with the deeper feelings that time and circumstances awaken. The discovery was inevitable, but she might not have made it so soon had it not been for a neighbour whose acquaintance she has formed—Maurice Chesney, the half-brother and heir of the disagreeable Baronet. We do not know precisely what was the author's original conception of him. We suspect she rather let him form himself, while she concentrated her own care on the heroine. At least under her hands he changes for the worse and the weaker, notwithstanding the ennobling influence of the heroine's society and loftier character. Maurice Chesney is presented to us as clever and eccentric, but we had no conception at first that he was intended to be so utterly feeble. We believed him one of those indolent characters who let the world slide, and do not think it worth while to brace themselves for the sake of coming off the conqueror in every petty squabble. We never doubted it was the author's idea that he should succeed Mr. Marshall in possession of Nelly, winning such a love with her as the worthy solicitor had never enjoyed. We do not think we were wrong. We do not believe that the author calmly contemplated from the commencement that the charming Nelly should end in cheerless solitude the life she had sacrificed to filial and sisterly affection. Of course Chesney falls imperceptibly but desperately in love with her. In her perfect innocence of intention she has always welcomed him to her house in her husband's absence; they have exchanged favourite authors, and together they have studied German. Eleanor is even more deeply touched than Maurice Chesney; but while he has awakened to the state of his feelings, she has been sleepwalking in ignorance of them to the very brink of an abyss. There is a Francesca da Rimini scene, although the termination is innocently different. Mr. Marshall might not have altogether admired the relations between his wife and his acquaintance had he assisted at their interviews, or been deeper in their secrets. But certainly he would have had no reason to impeach his wife's purity, or lose faith in her principles. We think the scene we have referred to very true to nature. Perhaps for the first time Eleanor feels that she is a woman and learns that she has a heart. Before that we may have doubted the warmth of her blood and her feelings. Now we awaken to the temptations she has to contend with, and are alive to the unhappiness of her lot. Although her lover holds her for a moment in his arms, although she rests there for a moment before she rouses herself to withdraw, yet she has only provoked the compassion of virtue, without alienating its sympathies. There is nothing in the scene akin to those which some of our modern novelists colour so sensually. It gives life-like reality to a candid character, without leaving a stain upon the page. The end of all this is what we most object to, and we object not merely on artistic considerations. We have come to care too much about Nelly not to be concerned in her fate. Her husband dies of apoplexy at an appropriate time, and although we do not think much of Maurice Chesney ourselves, yet she is earnestly attached to him. Weak as he is, he would make an excellent husband or husband to go. He has many admirable qualities, is highly accomplished, and will succeed to wealth and position. By her marrying him romantic justice will be vindicated, for he will install his wife at the Hall.

where his disagreeable half-sister has often scrubbed her. What then forbids the banne? We cannot conceive. But Maurice marries in India a woman whom he likes with a languid affection. Invalid as she is, she is not put out of the way when her husband and his old flame are thrown together in the last chapter over his little boy's sick-bed. Eleanor has shown the old self-sacrificing devotion, yet she is compelled to take refuge in good works and confirmed widowhood. Nor is the fate of the brilliant and beautiful Georgie what we might have anticipated, although we have reason to hope that she is happy. She becomes the wife of a Swiss provincial doctor, clever certainly, and strongly attached to her. For more reasons than one, we like the conclusion less than any other part of the book; but one of these reasons is that the book has so very much to recommend it.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

THE condition of Egypt, a subject of importance to all the leading European States, is in an especial degree the concern of England, while the connexion of German interests with it is comparatively remote. We are nevertheless unable to refer to any English work which precisely addresses itself to the task now successfully performed by a German writer, Herr Heinrich Stephan.* We have abundance of books of travel, many of them admirable in their way, and indirectly containing a large amount of information respecting the administration, the agriculture, and the commerce of the country. It seems, however, to have been reserved for Herr Stephan to prepare a work with exclusive reference to this end, resisting the seductions of Oriental manners and of archæology, and embodying all accessible data within narrow limits, yet with perfect lucidity of treatment. The work bears the impress of extreme industry, of a thorough acquaintance with the subject, and of a candour unusual in dealing with topics where private interests are so largely involved. The experiment now being carried out in Egypt is one of great importance, and may be defined as the unsparing application of European industrial and financial ideas to the management of an Oriental country, the corresponding moral and political ideas being kept in abeyance. The problem, therefore, differs materially from that proposed to itself by the Government in India, or even in Japan, where the independent spirit of the people would prevent any such systematic coercion of the toiling masses for the advantage of the wealthy as undoubtedly prevails in Egypt. There seems little doubt that Ismael Pasha's policy is entirely egotistical, directed to his own private gain rather than, as with Mohammed Ali, to the elevation of Egypt in the scale of nations. The point to be settled is whether the development of the resources of the country does not offer a sufficient compensation—whether the advantage of the ruler does not virtually include the advantage of the people also. Such would appear to be, on the whole, Herr Stephan's opinion, and indeed the utility of many of the important public works carried out by the Khedive is incontestable. Educational and similar institutions are, however, too often designed merely as traps for European public opinion, and it is a question with the author whether even the industrial activity of late years has been in all respects judiciously directed. The profitable manufacture of sugar, for example, in which an enormous capital has been invested, is impeded by the high price of fuel; while the amount already sunk in machinery compels the speculator to persevere. Want of fuel, indeed, is one of the chief difficulties of the country; another is the want of manure, which, by denying the wheat plant the phosphates essential for its perfection, hinders Egypt from being as of old the granary of nations. Both these drawbacks to prosperity might be remedied by patience and system, but the ruling powers crave rapid profits. Crops dependent on the fertilizing deposit of the Nile succeed as of old; so do more recent introductions, and the landscape, unchanged for thousands of years, is modified by the acclimatized novelties of sugar, cotton, maize, and indigo. The author treats the commerce of the country very fully, and with as much statistical precision as possible; he also does his best to throw light on the mysteries of Egyptian finance, which seems to be based on the principle of paying old debts by contracting new ones. An interesting chapter on the judicial system is accompanied by reflections on the condition and prospects of the Mohammedan religion, which the author apparently regards as destined to extinction in countries so immediately exposed as Egypt to the influence of Western culture. According to him, the phenomenon which is at present in course of manifestation in the Church of Rome has already occurred in Islam. The theologians have triumphed over the philosophers, and in achieving their victory have reduced their creed to a caput mortuum of ignorant fanaticism, with every possibility of improvement or development extinguished. A most interesting and instructive volume is concluded by a chapter on the Suez Canal, which, however, contains less of positive novelty than the rest of the book.

In the general confusion and distraction of Spanish affairs † it is something to say that they should at least be capable of affording material for an entertaining book. Herr Wilhelm Lauser's lively sketches, in so far as they relate to the political situation, produce somewhat of the effect of a show of Antisocial, or of a choreographic interlude between the acts of a serious drama. Sovereigns, pretenders, statesmen, generals, orators, priests, and mob, cross and recross the stage in motley masquerade, a picturesque throng, earnestly engaged in doing nothing. The clue to this busy sterility is apparently the absence of an intelligent public opinion, without which the attempt to endow the country with durable institutions can but result in the multiplication of the only description of châteaux which Spanish political architecture has hitherto been competent to produce. The situation is very nearly that which would exist in the neighbouring Latin nations if these had no dominant idea to stimulate and concentrate the national energies—if Italy had no hard-won unity to maintain, and France no lost prestige to recover. Could Spain unite in some common aspiration, all might yet be well; but at present her political sentence is plunged into the profoundest torpor, while obscure and shadowy adventurers flit around her couch like gnats, numberless, evanescent, and voracious. Herr Lauser's sketches of this condition of affairs are excellent in style and colouring, and are the more impressive from the apparent absence of all political bias. The leading personages of the time, such as they are, seem fairly as well as vividly characterised; and a description of the sitting of the Cortes, in particular, conveys a lively impression of that still courteous and dignified body. Chapters on Spanish literature and art, the drama, public lectures, and the Protestant congregation at Madrid, contain matter of more originality, and are so well executed as to make us wish that these subjects had been treated at greater length. In the Protestant movement, restricted as it is at present, in Señor Gil y Zarate's dramas, and in Señor Canovas's courageous exhortations to his countrymen to take pattern by the Teutonic races, we discover at least the germs of a moral and intellectual revival, which, could it but once obtain free development, would soon supersede the wretched dynasty of selfish military and political adventurers that has so long afflicted the country.

"The Realm of Tantalus and Ormus" ‡ does not, as we were at first inclined to conjecture, denote modern society with its paupers and its capitalists, but a region where both these descriptions of inhabitants are rare—ancient Lydia itself. Our tourist, Professor Stark, possesses a keen eye for scenery, and a gift of condensed and vivid description which enables him to depict the natural, social, and archæological features of the country with a precision agreeably surpassing expectations grounded merely upon the hasty character of his visit, and the restricted scale of his little book. The principal objects of his investigation were the tomb of Tantalus, the rock of Niobe (where the traces of human labour are clearly apparent), and the Acropolis of Sardes. Our curiosity is strongly excited by his mention of numerous sepulchral mounds in the neighbourhood of Sardes, none of which have been opened by any European. It may be hoped that they will not remain unexplored much longer, the operations of archæologists being now greatly facilitated by the Smyrna and Cassaba railway, of which Professor Stark amply availed himself. His account of the material condition of the district, except in Smyrna and the vicinity, is by no means favourable; at the same time it is but just to acknowledge that the present state of dilapidation and depopulation seems to be rather a legacy from the Byzantines than the creation of the Turks.

Dr. Gustav Gilbert's "Studies on the Ancient History of Sparta" § embrace a thorough and erudite discussion of all the problems which have tried the ingenuity of scholars in connexion with it, from the immigration of the Heracleides to the emigration of the Parthenii. Lycurgus finds no mercy as an historical personage; his identity with the sun is as clear as sunshine to the vision of Dr. Gilbert. We anxiously await the forthcoming identification of the Athenian lawgiver with the rival luminary; the affinity between Solon and Selene speaks for itself.

Professor Kinkel ¶ is an ardent admirer of Euripides, and contends that the spirit of the age of Pericles is most faithfully represented in his writings. Without disrespect either to the genius or the intellectual significance of the poet, it might have appeared more reasonable to regard him as the precursor of a new era than as the interpreter of his own. His affinities are surely with his successors rather than with his contemporaries; and there seems abundant reason for concluding that during his life he was rather the pet of a coterie than the favourite of the public. This point, however, does not affect the general scope of Professor Kinkel's little treatise, which is to establish Euripides's character as a connoisseur of painting and sculpture from the references in his writings either to those arts in the abstract or to particular examples of them. Another chapter enumerates the works in which artists, in their turn, appear to have been indebted to the suggestions of the poet. The whole essay is a charming study, displaying erudition without pedantry, ingenuity without paradox, and the most refined feeling for art.

Dr. Richard Volkmann's treatise on the rhetoric of the ancients § consists of a digest of the rules handed down by classical * Aus dem Reiche des Tantalus und Ormus. Von Dr. Bernhard Stark. Berlin: Loderitz. London: Williams & Morgate.

† Studien zur altgriechischen Geschichte. Von Dr. Gustav Gilbert. Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht. London: Asher & Co.

‡ Euripides und die Bildende Kunst. Von Dr. G. Kinkel. Berlin: Ebeling & Plahn. London: Williams & Morgate.

§ Die Rhetorik der Griechen und Römer in systematischer Uebersicht dargestellt. Von Dr. Richard Volkmann. Berlin: Ebeling & Plahn. London: Williams & Morgate.

* Das heilige Aegypten. Ein Abriss seiner physischen, politischen, wirtschaftlichen und Cultur-Zustände. Von Heinrich Stephan. Leipzig: Brockhaus. London: Asher & Co.

† Am Spaniens Gegenwart. Culturhistorien. Von Wilhelm Lauser. Leipzig: Brockhaus. London: Williams & Morgate.

THE

SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 869, Vol. 33.

June 22, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

STATE AND CHURCH IN GERMANY AND ITALY.

THE Bill introduced by the German Government for dissolving or controlling the institutions of the Jesuits has received some important modifications, and in its new shape has been passed by a very large majority in the Lower House of the Imperial Parliament. As the measure now stands, it altogether forbids the existence in Germany of any establishments belonging to the Jesuits or to kindred orders. The constitution of new branches of such orders is forbidden, and those at present existing are to be dissolved within a period to be named by the Federal Council. Foreign members of the prohibited orders are to be expelled from Germany, and, if Germans, may be ordered away from one part of Germany to another, and their residence may be fixed for them according as the authorities think fit. The highest class of police authorities under the special direction of a Committee of the Federal Council is to see that the provisions of the Bill are carried into execution. The noticeable features of the measure in its present shape are the explicit and unreserved prohibition of the orders, and the delegation to the Federal Council of the duty of seeing that the law is not left a dead letter. It is not only the Jesuits who are persecuted, but all orders like the Jesuits—that is, we presume, all orders which exist not merely for religious purposes, but to carry out the special policy of the Court of Rome. Every one acquainted with Roman Catholic countries is aware that there are many religious bodies which are organized on much the same principles as the Society of Jesus, although their organization may not be so complete nor their devotion to Papal interests quite so absorbing. But there are many bodies or orders as to which friends could see, and enemies would decline to see, a difference between them and the Jesuits. How far the law is to be applied to them will be a question of much practical difficulty, and its solution was therefore left to the Federal Council. But it was not only that there were orders as to which it might be doubtful whether the law should operate. The real difficulty which the Parliament had to face was how to ensure a common action of all the German Governments, when it is notorious that with some of them—as, for example, that of Saxony—the Jesuits stand on a very good footing. Prince BISMARCK could not interfere out of Prussia in virtue of any control he may have over Prussian administration; and if a mere general law had been passed, saying that the Jesuits and their allies should be expelled, the Government of any tiny State would have simply had to do nothing, and the Jesuits in its dominions would have been able to bid defiance to the German Parliament. This would have been worse than no Bill at all; for if the Bill is to be justified, it must be justified on the ground that the supreme safety of the whole Fatherland requires that it should be adopted in order that German unity may not be broken up by the machinations of its enemies. But if one State harboured the Jesuits and another did not, if Saxony or Hesse received the spiritual enemies of the Empire when Prussia sent them away, the very evil of internal division which the Bill is intended to prevent would have been brought about. It seemed therefore necessary to create a central authority for the special purpose of seeing the Bill made operative, the power of which should extend into every State, and which should not be thwarted by the caprices or predilections of particular Governments. A Committee of the Federal Council is the authority to which these powers have been assigned, and in such a Committee, although chosen and controlled by the Governments, and subject to the supervision of the Federal Council, it is possible to ensure a common action of all the German Governments, and to see that the law is not left a dead letter.

if it were represented on the Committee, it would be at once overruled. So long as the Parliament trusts the Committee it will leave much to its judgment. It will not inquire too nicely why one religious body is dissolved and another is spared. It will be content that a reasonable time should be given for the dissolution of existing bodies. But it will ask that the general objects it has sought to attain shall be attained. This Bill, it must be observed, is a very strong measure. It flies in the face of the principles of religious toleration, and it cuts across the chief basis on which German unity was supposed to be founded—that of the independent jurisdiction for all purposes of internal Government inherent in the separate States of the Empire. That the sacrifices thus made must have been much regretted by many of those who voted for the Bill is beyond question; and all that can be said is that the Parliament must have thought the danger a very serious one, when it was willing to risk so much and to give up so much in order to encounter it in what it considered an effective manner.

Italy appears to be treading in the same path as Germany, and the introduction of a measure in the Italian Parliament for the suppression of religious bodies has been made the subject of a Papal manifesto. The Pope denounces the continual encroachments which he alleges to be made on his authority in Italy as a violation of the principles of morality and justice. He owns that he might have escaped the sad spectacle of this disregard of all that is right by the simple expedient of going away, but he says that it would not answer for him to go; or, as he puts it, motives of the highest religious interest counsel him not to abandon his See at present. That he is free, he acknowledges; but no one must presume to think that he is independent. He is not going to surrender a single jot of his grievances. Above all, he scents the notion of any compromise being possible with the Italian Government. He has been robbed, and he is not going to negotiate with robbers, while he rejects all guarantees as utterly illusory. He sees no prospect before him but that of constant fighting with wicked men; and if they will make him fight, he wishes them to understand that he is quite ready for the conflict. Fortunately for the Italians, he does not content himself with resting on the safe ground of spiritual denunciations. He proceeds to touch on matters which all Italians can understand perfectly well. He ventures to assure the world, as if he were merely stating a notorious fact, that the Pontifical Throne, far from being an embarrassment to the greatness and independence of Italy, was a bond between princes and peoples, a centre of concord and peace, the source of Italian greatness, the guardian of her independence, and the constant support and rampart of her liberty. As to many of the claims of the Pope, Italians bred in the fold of the Catholic Church may often have uncomfortable twinges of uncertainty. No one can say what are the limits of the spiritual power of any one who chooses to assert that he has absolute spiritual power. The future of mankind is shrouded in mystery, and possibly the Pope may know more about it than others know. If several hundred bishops pronounce him infallible, it is of course possible that in some sense, difficult for Italians to determine, he may be so. But it must be extremely reassuring to Italians to find that in everything of which they can judge, and as to all the facts of recent history, the Pope is one of the most deluded and wrongheaded men alive. It is not two years since the French garrison occupied Rome, and yet Italians are quietly asked to own that the Temporal Power sustained by a foreign garrison was a rampart of Italian liberty. It is only a few years since Austria was upholding the Temporal Power, and there were enthusiastic rejoicings at the battle of Solferino when the battle of Solferino was supposed to be going in favour of the Austrians. Italians are now asked to believe that the Papal Court was the best friend and guardian of Italian independence. The only Italian Sovereign whom the people would allow to retain his Crown was also the only Italian Sovereign who quarrelled with the Pope; and Italians are now invited to admit that the Temporal Power was a bond of concord between prince and people. Everything that Italy has known, or seen, or done for the last twelve years is to be twisted round the wrong way, and then the world will see that the Pope has been always right. It is entirely impossible for persons outside the Papal circle to conceive what imaginable advantages it is supposed are to follow from childish folly of this kind. The inevitable effect of making such transparent misstatements must be to convince Italians that the Pope has not the slightest notion of what the independence and greatness and liberty of Italy mean. When he tells them they are very wicked, that is a matter of opinion, as to which they may have some anxiety; but when he tells them that the French occupation of Rome was the symbol of Italian greatness and freedom, they know he is talking nonsense. The ground on which religious orders are to be suppressed is that the political interests of Italy require their suppression, and when the Italians are asked to pause, they discover that the person who is so earnestly warning them stands as wholly out of the sphere of Italian politics as if he were a French corporal or an Austrian lancer. The world which the Pope understands and the world which the Italians understand lie wholly apart; and the Italians can therefore do nothing else than go on with the things they comprehend, unmoved by his eloquence or his wrath.

The suppression of religious bodies is perhaps the severest, but it is also the easiest, of the measures which Germany or Italy can take in the conflict with Ultramontanism. A religious body has definite members whom the police can disperse, it has ascertainable property which the police can seize. When the State sets itself to dissolve such a body, it has a visible work to do and a tangible object to attack. If public opinion in Germany and Italy would support the Government in the execution of its task, and if the Government thought proper to take the consequences, including that of a possible reaction in public opinion, all the religious bodies in the two countries might be suppressed in a twelvemonth. But the State has a much harder task in fighting Ultramontanism when it is merely occupied with the petty incidents of the conflict. What, for example, is to be done to a bishop who entirely declines to answer letters? The Bishop of BERGLAND lately incurred the displeasure of the Prussian Government because he threatened or pronounced excommunication in such a manner as to impair or imperil the civil status of a Prussian subject. The Government complained, and he condescended to answer that he went by canonical, not by Prussian, law. Nothing more can be got out of him. The Government has written for explanations, but he will not give any, and now he has been informed that, unless he breaks silence and gives some sort of answer within a week, the Cabinet will consider that he is not going to answer at all, and will act accordingly. This sounds very well; but what is it that the Cabinet intends to do when it "acts accordingly"? It is almost impossible in such a case for a Government not to do either too much or too little, not to seem to persecute for a trifle, or not to incur the ridicule of appearing powerless. Of course the German Government feels this, and, as one mode of avoiding indirectly the difficulty of dealing with small oppositions, it is said to have thought of the strange expedient of claiming a prescriptive right to share in that amount of control over the election of the next Pope which may be exercised by Powers having a conditional right to interfere. Perhaps in a petty war, such as a war with priests, must necessarily be to a great extent, Prince BISMARCK may think he must have recourse to somewhat petty arts and trivial means of embarrassing an enemy. But in these days the notion of lay Powers controlling the election of a Pope is absurd. The Popes are at least entitled to be chosen freely in return for the loss of their temporal power. Their force is now a spiritual force only. It is true that they, or those by whom they are guarded and surrounded, conceive that it is their duty and privilege to use this spiritual power for political ends. But to seize on the exact point where the spiritual power, even when thus used, is plainly abused, is not by any means easy, and the German Government will have many difficulties to endure, and many irritating though trivial questions to solve, before it can congratulate itself on having made the supremacy of the State sufficiently recognized.

THE GENEVA ARBITRATION.

THE Correspondence between the English and American Governments on the Supplementary Article and on the proposal for an adjournment still retains a certain interest, though its practical importance has been superseded by more recent events. The rumours and extracts of secret dispatches in various newspapers had so often proved to be authentic, that credit was attached to a spurious version of the addition proposed by the Senate to the Supplementary Article. The alleged stipulation that neither Government should hereafter be responsible for violations of neutrality committed by its subjects or citizens sounded like an unseasonable and discourteous jest. It is satisfactory to find that the amendment really introduced, though it was dangerously ambiguous, may well have been composed in perfect good faith. It is not only unfortunate, but absurd, that when both Governments were apparently anxious to adjust their differences, the chance of maintaining the Treaty should depend on a mere question of days or of hours. Ample illustration has been given of the inconvenience of telegraphic communication in cases where important interests depend on mere questions of language. The Senate can scarcely be acquitted of the charge of trifling with a great question when it refused to prolong its Session in the hope of arriving at an understanding. It was not absolutely necessary to adjourn of the day which had been previously fixed, when it was known that the President was powerless to adopt even the most acceptable form of the article under discussion. Lord GRANVILLE, who has received some blame in England for his unconcealed eagerness to save the Treaty, may at least be credited with a sincere desire to give favourable consideration to any American proposal. No explanation was given of the reasons for suggesting the wide and indefinite stipulation that claims for remote or indirect losses should not be admitted for the future as the result of failure to observe neutral obligations.

It would be a useless and ungrateful task to follow the details of the communications which have been exchanged between Lord GRANVILLE and Mr. FISH; but it is worth while to notice the exact nature of the issue which has for some months past been in dispute. That the Indirect Claims were unreasonable, preposterous, and unfounded, has been gradually but virtually conceded; but it has been thought that the honour of the United States was concerned in the proposition that the claims, whatever might be their character, were covered by the Treaty. The English Government were on their part compelled to accept the challenge, inasmuch as their sole objection to submitting the claims to arbitration was founded on a construction of the letter of the Treaty, and on the instructions and intentions of the English negotiators. If Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS had by a slight stretch of audacity demanded payment of the whole costs of the war, instead of two-fifths of the amount, the claim must nevertheless have been submitted to the Tribunal if it had been covered by the terms of the Treaty. But for the late speech of Lord CAIRNS it might have been thought that all competent English critics were agreed in Mr. CLAYTON's interpretation of the Treaty; and it was known, on the authority of Sir STANFORD NORTHCOTE, that the English Commissioners had supposed a promise to have been given that the claims should be concluded. The question, therefore, was not whether the English Government should pay for the cost of the war after the battle of Gettysburg, with seven per cent. interest, but whether the American interpretation of the Treaty should be sustained by the submission of the claims to the Arbitrators. It might have occurred to the SECRETARY OF STATE that his admission of the unfounded nature of the claims furnished a strong argument in favour of the English contention. It was probable that the Commissioners intended to exclude demands which could not decently be pressed or supported by argument. If the insertion of the Indirect Claims in the American Case was inconsistent with justice, it would have seemed reasonable that they should be simply withdrawn. The President, who had through his Ministers and their agents framed the Case on his own responsibility, might naturally have modified its terms without requiring the consent of the Senate.

Mr. FISH told Sir E. THOMSON that Mr. Adams would, on his arrival in London, unofficially convince Lord GRANVILLE that he was entirely opposed to the principle of claims for consequential damages. It may be fairly assumed that Mr. FISH concurred with Mr. Adams, though he had some months before professed the same claims in the most unqualified manner. The calculated violation of the Treaty, the general character of English statements, the position of the American Government against the English Government, would have been sufficient to the assumption that any of the American demands were presented without any purpose that they should be granted. Mr. Fish has since persuaded himself that, in asking for some hundreds of millions, he had never attempted to obtain pecuniary compensation for the Indirect Claims. The inquiry whether claims which were at last acknowledged to be baseless had been covered by the Treaty strongly resembles the Jansenist controversy at the beginning of the eighteenth century. The Holy See having declared that certain propositions maintained by JANSEN were heretical, his followers willingly acknowledged the validity of the decision; but some of them ventured to object that JANSEN had in fact neither believed nor propounded the objectionable dogmas. The Jesuits, on the other hand, insisted that the Pope was infallible in matters of fact as well as in articles of faith; and at their instigation the enlightened theologian LOUIS XIV. persecuted the Jansenists, and even furnished occasion for a proverb by prohibiting the relics of one of their confessors from performing miracles at his tomb. The Americans admit that the Indirect Claims are heretical, but they maintain that they are recognized in the inspired document of Washington. Mr. Fish gravely declared that the United States were quite as much interested as Great Britain in procuring a decision adverse to the claims which had been still more gravely advanced by Mr. FISH himself. Lord GRANVILLE had, on the other hand, maintained with unanswerable force that claims which a competent Tribunal would not have sanctioned could not without a forfeiture of self-respect have been allowed by England to become the subject-matter of a reference. It is highly probable that if no remonstrance had been made Mr. CALDWELL would have employed all his eloquence in supporting the propositions which had been affirmed by Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS. If Mr. EVARTS had preferred professional self-respect to patriotic devotion, it is conceivable that the Arbitrators might have yielded to the arguments of his more thoroughgoing colleague. Lord GRANVILLE made a large concession when he consented to discuss an equivalent for the withdrawal of the claims. A litigant cannot acquire a fresh right by preferring an unjust demand. When the English Government refused to allow the Indirect Claims to be referred to the Tribunal, it virtually protested against any pretension which might be founded on concession to its arguments. The denial of a right amounts to a refusal to buy it off; but perhaps Lord GRANVILLE may have been justified in consenting to pay a colourable price for the withdrawal of a chimerical pretension. That the English Government should repudiate the monstrous doctrine invented by Mr. SUMNER was absurd; but it was not inconsistent. When the Senate required that some further modification should be introduced into the law of nations, it was at least excusable to hesitate. The Americans are the sole judges of the provisions of their own Constitution, but it is inconvenient to negotiate the details of a Convention with an irresponsible body which is incapable of being represented by a plenipotentiary.

The prevailing impression that the Arbitrators will themselves find an outlet from the present complications may perhaps be justified by the result; but it is difficult to understand how they can reject the Indirect Claims without deciding the question which the English Government has refused to submit to their discretion. If they can adjourn for a day or for a week, it would seem that they must also have power to adjourn for eight months or for an indefinite period. If the American agents successfully object to the postponement of the inquiry, it only remains for England to retire from an arbitration which has been already sought with undue eagerness.

THE NEW BALLOT BILL.

THE Lords made very short work of the Ministerial Ballot Bill on Monday night. It took them only a few hours to undo all the work at which the Commons laboured so incessantly night after night. They rushed through the clauses, trampling out everything that gave the Bill the slightest meaning or value, and substituting a very extraordinary measure of their own. The basis of this invention of the Conservative peers is what is called the optional Ballot. No one is to vote secretly who does not wish to do so. The voter is to sign his voting-paper as openly as he pleases, and every one who knows how he votes will be able to spread his knowledge as quickly and widely as he may think fit. If he likes the Peerage may go into a private room and fill in his paper secretly, but the mode in which he has voted will be perfectly well known to any one who cares to find out his secret. In order to check peroration the Lords have sanctioned a scheme by which the mode in which every vote is given will be known to the agents of the candidates. Further, they have taken no efficient precaution against the agent cheating, or at whom it might concern, the real course pursued by the voter who fancied himself secured against risk by the mysticism of the private compartment in which he had voted. Finally, the Lords decided that this Bill should only remain in force until 1880, as they wished to see how the experiment would work. There was a touch of humour in this last provision which has a merit of its own. It would, as the Peers thought, be a subject of legitimate curiosity to ascertain whether at the end of eight years the nation would have had enough of a measure which no Government has supported, which no constituency has ever heard of, which would cause an immense amount of unnecessary inconvenience, which would lead to much foul play and petty fraud, and which could not possibly produce any single advantage of any sort to anybody. Eight years of such a Bill must be enough for any one, and then England would be disgusted with the Ballot, and return to the good old practice of open voting, and it would be seen how wise the Lords had been in 1872, and how thoroughly they had gauged the secret wishes of the country.

It is true that the majority by which the great scheme of the optional Ballot was carried was not very large, and was insignificant by the side of the decisive majority which countenanced the adoption of the Duke of Richmond's plan for defeating personation. The Duke said that this was exactly the same plan which two years ago had been recommended by the Government. The Ministerial speakers retorted that the safeguards by which the plan had then been accompanied were now omitted, and that the Government, having seen through the fallacy of the proposal even in its best shape, ought now to be saddled with no responsibility on account of it. This is evidently true. The proposal must be judged on its own merits, and in view of the results which it would produce in conjunction with other clauses of the Lords' measure. A scheme to prevent personation has at least an excellent object, and it appears to us quite practicable to invent a plan by which a scrutiny might be facilitated without the main purpose of a Ballot Bill being sacrificed. But what the Lords adopted with so much rapture was the particular proposition made by the Duke of Richmond, and it was of a kind to make every clause directing or even permitting the voting to be secret a perfect farce. The voting-paper, according to the amendment carried in the Lords, is to have a number printed on its face, and is to be separated from a counterfoil having the same number printed on it. The presiding officer is to enter on the counterfoil, in the presence of the agents of the candidates, the number of the voter on the register. The agent, therefore, who wished to know how any one voted would at once discover that the paper of this voter bore a particular number. When the poll is closed the votes are to be counted, and the agents may inspect every paper, and object to it on several grounds, such as that it is wrongly marked, that too many votes are given, and so forth. Every paper must come before the agents, who would have ample opportunity of finding out how the paper was marked which bore the number given to the voter about whom manner of voting they felt specially interested. The Duke of Richmond at the last moment offered to concede that the distinguishing number should be printed on the back, and not, as his amendment provides, on the face, of the paper. But the Bill directs that the agents when the votes are being counted shall have a right to see that the proper official stamp is on the back of the paper, so that in any case they could get at the number and so at the name of the voter. The Duke of Richmond's Bill is therefore, properly speaking, a Bill under which, if an agent takes a little trouble, there is to be no vote whatever kept secret; but under which the voter may, if he likes, vote openly at once, and so save the agent a slightly laborious process.

Argument for or against such a Bill is almost useless. No one in the Lords ventured to say either that this optional Ballot was in itself a good form of voting, or that it was necessary to secure the objects which the Government Bill was designed to secure. As between the present state of things and an optional Ballot Bill, there can be no question of the advisability of letting things go on as they are. There are too many advantages in open voting. It is by far the simplest and most easily understood. It avoids all the difficulties of a secret vote, which are only too obvious to the eyes of those who are not sufficiently qualified to check the honesty of the voter, but who cannot read or write. They can see the voter's name and repeat it at the poll. There is something honest and manly in giving a vote publicly, especially when the duty is discharged, as it so often is, at great personal risk. It also adds immensely to the interest men take in politics that they should be known at once by friends and foes to be contributing something appreciable towards a desired result by saying publicly what candidate they prefer. All these advantages are either destroyed or diminished by the device of an optional Ballot. The illiterate are to be annoyed by the farce of getting a public officer to mark a paper publicly for them when it would be so much simpler to sing out the name of their favourite. The man who announced that he wished to go into a secret compartment would be marked with instant dishonour. The permission to vote in the secret way is, as was carefully explained in the Lords, a concession to the weakness of a small minority of cowards who have no right to degrade honest electors to their low level. Having proclaimed himself a coward and on a lower level than his neighbours, the voter is to retire into his cave of ignominy, and is there to fill up a voting-paper, which is so numbered and ticketed that he knows it will be very possible for the presiding officer, and his clerks, and the agents, and through them every one interested in the election, to have a clue as to how he voted. Not that his vote would always be known. The agents might not care to know it, or a very scrupulous and zealous official might try to throw obstacles in the way of the agents knowing, and might guard himself even against gaining this knowledge inadvertently. But the voter would never be sure that his vote was not known. It would, under the scheme of the Lords, be so easy to know it that the unhappy and ignominious coward would never be able to shake off the suspicions akin to his base and timorous disposition. All those whom bribery or intimidation could reach easily would of course not be allowed to go through this dark and useless process. They would have to mark their papers openly in the sight of the agent appointed to see that they kept to their bargain, who would immediately report them if they did not do as they were expected. Moreover, as all knowledge gained in the place of polling as to the names and number of the voters may, under the Lords' scheme, be at once communicated, it would be known, at any rate in small constituencies, how the poll was going, and the ancient guilds of "Lambs" purchasable at the last hour would be as flourishing as ever. What can be the good of altering the present law in order to introduce the optional Ballot? What can be the use of waiting till 1880, or indeed till next month, to ascertain whether the country would like such an absurd novelty? If the Lords had been asked to pass a Bill introducing the optional Ballot, it is easy to imagine the noble scorn with which they would have rejected the Bill on the second reading.

No doubt at different times very different functions may be properly discharged by an Upper Chamber. Sometimes it may do useful work by rejecting a bad Bill, sometimes it may with equal profit amend the machinery and language of a Bill which it wishes or agrees to pass. Sometimes it may be its duty to allow measures to pass of which it disapproves, in order that the Government may go on and that the decisions of the Lower Chamber may become law. But the Lords on Monday night took a perfectly new view of what it is wise and proper for an Upper Chamber to do. They proposed not to reject a Bill, nor to amend it, nor to ratify the decisions of the Commons and yield to the pressure of the Government, but to make a great and sweeping alteration in the existing law of which alteration they do not themselves approve, which the nation has never asked for or discussed, which no one of note in any political party has advocated, which stultifies the long labours of the House of Commons, and which was strenuously opposed by the Government of the day. There were very warm words in the House on Monday night, and an ancient order of the House, prohibiting acerbity of speech, had to be read before quiet was restored. Feeling perhaps conscious that they were not playing a very prudent or very dignified part, many Conservative peers were in a state of great excitement, and, as always happens, the most useless members of the party were the most violent. The Marquis of BATH, who has scarcely ever attended to his senatorial duties during the many years he has sat in the House, took upon himself to rebuke the CHANCELLOR. The Duke of RICHMOND complained that on a minor point the Ministry actually voted in a majority by keeping dark the manner in which they were going to vote, so that the Conservative peers only knew too late which side must be wrong. Lord GRANVILLE complained with more latitude of expression than he usually allows himself of the despotism of the majority, and for the moment it looked as if the Peers were going to forget their good behaviour altogether. Passing scenes of this kind are soon forgotten, and the Lords are generally so decorous that no one would attach much weight to rare ebullitions of heated party feeling. But the temper shown in the debate of Monday night may perhaps be taken as a sign that the majority of the Peers were somewhat aware of the futility of the proceeding in which they were engaged. That the Commons will cut short the life of the optional Ballot Bill is of course certain, and it was not improbably from the conviction that their new Ballot Bill had no chance of becoming law that the Conservative majority thought they might have their fling for one evening and play a sort of mild practical joke on the Government. The worst is that when the optional Ballot Bill has disappeared, the harm done by the farce of adopting it will not also disappear. The Lords will have lost a portion of the influence which always belongs to them when they act in the spirit of high and impartial statesmanship. The only gainers by what took place in the House of Lords last Monday will be the members and friends of the present Government. The Liberals have had a monopoly of blundering lately, and nothing has done them so much harm as the general impression that their leaders had a special aptitude for going wrong. Now their rivals have equalled if not surpassed them, and Liberals who are pressed with the misdeeds of the Cabinet will be able to retort triumphantly by sketching the history of the optional Ballot Bill.

FRANCE.

THE recent Parliamentary history of France is like nothing so much as a recurrent series of lovers' quarrels. M. THIERS plays the part of the imperious and capricious beauty who will brook neither criticism nor remonstrance, and is ready on the slightest provocation to break off the engagement. The Assembly represents to perfection the sober middle-aged suitor, who finds his mistress so indispensable to his happiness that he prefers to endure all the annoyances she chooses to inflict on him rather than accept the freedom she offers. Several times in the course of the Session the majority plucks up courage and remonstrates with M. THIERS about his flirtation with Republicanism, the alterations he has introduced into the Army Bill, or any other of the questions upon which a shrewd President and a not over-wise Assembly are likely to disagree. M. THIERS listens, frowns, lets drop a few sharp words in the lobby, and finally steps into the tribune and gives the Deputies their choice between absolute submission and immediate separation. On the last occasion on which this performance was gone through, M. THIERS seems to have made the mistake of straining his authority without any adequate reason. The Assembly had rejected one proposed modification in principle of a five years' service for half the annual contingent, and it might have been safely trusted to reject every other. There was no need for M. THIERS to tell them that he would not remain in office if he had to carry out a law which he disapproved. There was not the least chance that the Assembly would lay any such burden upon him. The majority knew what had been determined on between him and the Committee, and they had no intention of disturbing the compromise. So far as can be judged from the comments of their organs in the press, the effect of M. THIERS's threat has been to convince them of a fact of which the rest of the world has never had any doubt. They have suddenly discovered that when M. THIERS speaks, he speaks, not as Chief of the State, but as First Minister. The principal end which they had in view in naming him President is therefore defeated. They thought that by changing his title they might change his nature—that M. THIERS as President would submit to restraints which had had no meaning for him when he held the undefined and anomalous position of Chief of the Executive Power. It has once more been brought home to them that, in thinking this, they reckoned without their host. M. THIERS carries his anomalies about with him. As President of the Republic he acts and speaks in precisely the same way as when he was President of the Council of Ministers. He chooses his Cabinet not as a constitutional sovereign, who accepts whomsoever the popular Chamber may impose upon him, but as a Parliamentary chief who sets to work to find colleagues or subordinates agreeable to himself. The majority in the Assembly see the power they have repeatedly slipping away from them. The luxury of dominating a Ministry is denied them, except upon the costly condition of overthrowing the Executive Government at the same time. Rather than face the anarchy into which M. THIERS's retirement might plunge France, they submit to see the Administration becoming more and more Republican every day that M. THIERS lives.

The most serious and measured expression of the discontent which this state of things naturally excites is to be found in a letter from M. D'HAUSSONVILLE which has appeared in the Journal des Débats. M. D'HAUSSONVILLE complains that the Government of France has never been more purely personal than it is now. Upon every matter that comes before the Chamber the majority have to take their orders from M. THIERS, not M. THIERS his from the majority. When, as in the case of the tax on raw materials, he cannot bring the Assembly over to his own view, he takes care that no definitive decision shall be arrived at. Instead of choosing his Ministers from the majority in the Assembly, he chooses them from all parties, without regard to any consideration beyond their willingness to carry out the policy he sets before them. The result of all this is to habituate Frenchmen to accept under the Republic institutions with which they had grown disgusted under the Empire. The mischief of such a reaction is seen in the general disposition to account for political events by the most trifling and personal explanations, in the revival of an official press, and in the loss of dignity and consequently of self-respect on the part of the representatives of the people. M. THIERS, says M. D'HAUSSONVILLE, cannot really wish to govern as well as reign; he knows too well to what end such a policy leads those who pursue it. How could his career, already so glorious, be better crowned than by practising at the height of his power the political precepts which he has preached through years of opposition and discouragement? "M. THIERS, as the Constitutional President of a moderate Republic, governing France with the help of a responsible Cabinet, would be the WASHINGTON of the Continent." Even the Radicals ought not to object to Parliamentary Ministers being recruited from the Parliamentary majority for the time being, since, if they have that preponderance in the country which they claim, the application of this principle will in the end give them a similar advantage. When M. D'HAUSSONVILLE has proved to his own satisfaction that it is time for the majority to ask M. THIERS to govern constitutionally, that M. THIERS is bound in common consistency to grant the request, and that the Radicals have no business to object to his granting it, he goes on to consider what will happen in the event of M. THIERS refusing to govern constitutionally after being asked. Even then, M. D'HAUSSONVILLE says, there is no need for despair. "France numbers among her children more than one dauntless man, with an honest heart and an unselfish soul, to whom, if she cannot help herself, she may confidently entrust the burden of her fortunes." If such a hero is really forthcoming, one scarcely sees why France should wait till she cannot help herself before employing him.

M. D'HAUSSONVILLE's reasoning would be conclusive if it did not leave one important consideration out of sight. The title of a Parliamentary majority to control the Government rests on the fact that it represents a majority out of doors. If it does not do this, it is nothing better than an accident, and an Executive which submitted to be guided by it would sacrifice constitutional substance to constitutional form. If the majority of the Assembly wish to deprive M. THIERS of all justification for disregarding their wishes in the choice of his Ministers or in the general conduct of his administration, they have nothing to do but to entrust him with the power of dissolution. There is a very general belief in France that the opinion of the country is not fairly represented in the present Assembly. If the PRESIDENT shares in this belief, as there is little doubt he does, he would be bound in ordinary cases to put it to the test of a general election; and if in the new Assembly the relative strength of parties remained what it had been in the old, he would have no excuse for setting it at defiance. In the particular case the PRESIDENT has not the means of applying this test, and so long as the majority refuse to give him the means, he has no option but to govern in accordance with what he thinks to be the wishes of the country as distinct from the wishes of those who nominally represent it. Of course the machinery which he possesses for ascertaining the wishes of the country is very much less perfect than it would be if, like every other constitutional sovereign, he possessed the right to dissolve. He can only study the results of occasional elections, the votes of Councils-General, the tone of the press, and other indications of a similar kind. But the majority have no right to complain that the PRESIDENT pays them less than due deference, so long as they prevent him from satisfying himself that they have any solid title to deference. Something of this kind must have been in M. THIERS's thoughts when he received the delegates of the Right on Thursday. No direct reference seems to have been made to a dissolution, partly perhaps because for other reasons a dissolution would not be desirable at this moment, and partly because the Right is never able to control itself when any hint of such an expedient is given. The majority in the Assembly hates to be reminded that it cannot live on for ever. Still, as the drift of M. THIERS's reply was that the Republic is for the future the only possible Government for France, while the known desire of the majority is the displacement, as soon as may be, of the Republic by a Monarchy, the conclusion* that the majority does not represent the country is sufficiently obvious. There is no need to dispute M. D'HAUSSONVILLE's assertion that there are as good men in France as M. THIERS. The action of the Right will probably be determined by the reflection that he can hardly be deposed without a formal appeal to the nation. If their object is to keep the present Assembly in being, they will accept M. THIERS's supremacy as an indispensable, though disagreeable, element of success.

PARLIAMENT AND PRIVATE BILL COMMITTEES.

BOTH Houses of Parliament by an undesigned coincidence established on Tuesday last a dangerous precedent. The House of Lords threw out the Mid-London Railway Bill on the second reading without inquiry; and the House of Commons, with somewhat more excuse, but on the motion of an interested party, threw out on the third reading the Birmingham Sewerage Bill, which had been unanimously passed after full investigation by one of its own Select Committees. A grave responsibility is incurred by members who disregard the results of a judicial inquiry. When a division is taken in the House on a private Bill, it scarcely ever happens that the merits of the question are understood, or even professedly considered. Some objection which strikes the general fancy is exclusively urged on the attention of the House, while the compensating public advantages are carelessly regarded, or perhaps entirely forgotten. It is possible that the Birmingham Bill and the Mid-London Bill may have been bad measures; but it is certain that their merits and demerits were not ascertained by the majority in either House. Even if a large assembly were in any case competent to adjudicate on conflicts between private rights and public interests, it is notorious that attendance on such occasions is the result of solicitation and canvass. The trivial arguments which the Duke of MARLBOROUGH thought sufficient to justify his motion for the rejection of the Mid-London Bill would scarcely have been addressed to an impartial audience. The House of Lords acceded to the proposal of crushing the scheme on the Duke of MARLBOROUGH's assertion, not that the proposed railway would be either injurious to property or useless, but that it might perhaps at some future time facilitate another undertaking which in the Duke's opinion would be found objectionable. It is a grave misfortune that either House should expose itself to the suspicion of yielding in such matters to prejudice or to influence.

The Mid-London Railway, as originally projected, extended from Kilburn to the East of London; and it included the formation of a new street which would, as it was said, have relieved the press of traffic in the most crowded part of the City. In accordance with common practice, powers were separately asked for the construction of the Western Section, extending from Kilburn to the neighbourhood of the Marble Arch. The whole scheme was vigorously opposed on various grounds, and especially on account of the displacement of population which it would have involved. The Duke of MARLBOROUGH, either in ignorance of the facts, or in well-founded reliance on the ignorance of his hearers, urged the philanthropic objection on the attention of the House of Lords, although the part of the scheme which affected crowded districts had been previously defeated. After a prolonged inquiry the Committee of the House of Commons refused to pass the Bill for making the Eastern Section, on the ground that no sufficient evidence had been furnished of the financial condition of the undertaking. The line which terminated at the west end of Oxford Street had never been seriously opposed, and it was considered by the Committee not to require the provision of any amount of capital which would exceed the resources of the promoters. It was afterwards understood that the London and North-Western Company would be prepared to work the line, which would have provided a new and convenient station for passenger traffic. It is not too much to say that the project was sufficiently plausible to deserve a fair consideration of its merits, even if it had not been approved by the competent authority of a Committee of the House of Commons. Whether the line should be afterwards extended eastward would have been a proper subject of investigation, if the original project had been at any time renewed. The precipitate decision of the House of Lords on an ex parte statement is greatly to be regretted, not so much on account of the alleged utility of the proposed line, as for its tendency to disturb general confidence in the impartiality of the House.

Sir ROBERT PEEL, in his passionate and successful opposition to the Birmingham Sewerage Bill, might at least claim the merit of candidly disavowing all pretensions to judicial impartiality. A tribunal in which a litigant acts as a judge can command neither confidence nor respect. Sir ROBERT PEEL, even if he profited by his position as a member of Parliament to advocate his own interests, ought in common propriety to have abstained from supporting his argument by his vote. In his first attack on the decision he abused the Committee, the counsel, and the promoters of the measure; and from first to last he dwelt on his own special grievances as the principal arguments for rejecting the scheme. Sir C. ADDERLEY, who was also interested in resisting the plan, supported Sir R. PEEL in more temperate language. Mr. OSBORNE went so far as to contend that property which had once belonged to an illustrious statesman deserved a special exemption from liability to a possible nuisance. Few persons would, in the present state of the controversy, voluntarily part with their land for the purpose of accommodating sewage; but unfortunately there is no other feasible mode of disposing of the obnoxious matter; and all land has some owner. The Corporation of Birmingham is morally bound to provide for the health and cleanliness of the town, and it is also legally compelled by a Chancery injunction to find some alternative outlet for the sewage which is now discharged into the river. A Bill was consequently promoted for the compulsory acquisition of a thousand or twelve hundred acres of land of which less than three hundred acres belonged to Sir ROBERT PEEL. It was open to reluctant landholders to show that more suitable land might be provided elsewhere, or that some other process could be devised for the abatement of the existing nuisance. Sir ROBERT PEEL had been at liberty to urge on the Committee all the arguments which he repeated in the House, and he would have still had the opportunity of convincing a Committee of the House of Lords. He had contrived to persuade himself that the death of his late colleague was caused by the agitation of the Birmingham Sewerage Bill; and it is possible that the statement might, if it had been thought credible, have influenced the judgment or the feelings of the House of Lords. By its vote against the third reading the House of Commons utterly disregarded the necessities of Birmingham, and afforded a special and exceptional protection to the property of one of its members. It would not be difficult to show that the decision tends to impair the respect which is paid to the rights of landowners; but it is unnecessary to consider any additional objection to a proceeding which violates the rules and customs of the House.

Mr. BOUVIER, who has on other occasions consistently vindicated the jurisdiction of Committees, was naturally unwilling to adopt Sir ROBERT PEEL's simple-minded indifference to any consideration except that of personal interest. The general principle of the application of sewage to land had, as Mr. BOUVIER contended, not been formally sanctioned by Parliament; and consequently the adoption of any particular scheme of the kind was not a proper subject for the consideration of Committees. If Mr. BOUVIER's assumptions had been correct, and if his deductions were sound, it would scarcely be possible to try hereafter the most promising of modern sanitary experiments. Parliament cannot lay down the rule that any land should be compulsorily taken whenever it was required for the distribution of sewage; but legislation has approached as nearly as justice would allow to the recognition of the expediency of putting the sewage on the land. Under the provisions of two successive General Sewerage Acts, local governing bodies may take land for sewage purposes by Provisional Order, to be subsequently confirmed by Parliament. Any objecting landowner has a right to be heard before a Select Committee against the confirmation of the order, but the Act is founded on the assumption that the application of the process is in itself expedient. The Birmingham plan was probably more objectionable than the ordinary system of a sewage farm, inasmuch as the sewage was confessedly insufficient, but any imperfection of the scheme would have been fully considered by a Committee. There is no doubt that the abstraction of a large extent of land from any property is, in the majority of cases, a serious hardship to the owner. In some cases a third or a fourth part of a well-sized estate has been compulsorily taken for a sewage farm. It is difficult to believe that the reduction of the size of the property by three hundred acres would render Drayton Manor uninhabitable. The risk which may be incurred by landowners in the neighbourhood of great towns is not without compensation. The proximity of Birmingham probably adds largely to the value of Sir R. PEEL's estates, although it is his misfortune to be placed in the same watered somewhat lower down the valley. His contention that other and nearer lands ought to have been taken for sewage purposes may perhaps have been well founded, but questions of local expediency, of engineering, and of the price of land are peculiarly within the province of Select Committees, and it is impossible that they should be fairly discussed in the body of the House. Every owner of land near a great town ought to be as fully prepared for the chance of expropriation for public purposes as for the contingent conversion of his farms into building land saleable by the square foot. Ample pecuniary compensation is in all cases paid for property which may be taken under compulsory powers. The Birmingham Corporation and the promoters of the Mid-London Railway could have had no ground of complaint if their respective schemes had been rejected after a judicial investigation. They have just cause of indignation in the peremptory reversal of the judgments which they had obtained in their favour from competent tribunals.

'THE FRENCH COMMERCIAL TREATY.

WHEN Mr. GRAVES lately exposed in an argumentative speech the perversity of French commercial legislation, he was told that the House to which he addressed his complaint was not responsible for the revocation of the Treaty. Mr. GRAVES might have explained in reply that, not occupying a seat in the French Assembly, he did his best to call the attention of M. THIERS and his Ministers to the error and injustice of their recent policy. His motion was ostensibly directed against the resolution of the English Government to refuse any modifications which are inconsistent with the spirit of the Treaty. From the commencement of the discussion Lord GRANVILLE consistently expressed his readiness to facilitate any fiscal measures which might be rendered necessary by recent disasters; nor indeed would the assent of the English Government have been required to a mere increase of internal and external duties. It was provided by the Treaty, not that a fixed tariff should be maintained, but that the difference between Excise and Customs duties should not be altered to the detriment of England. The addition of the same percentage to both classes of duties might perhaps have increased the French revenue; and it would not have affected either the letter or the spirit of the Treaty. The question which was raised by the proposal to increase the differential rates of duty was not without difficulty; but on the whole the House of Commons appears to approve of the decision of the Government. Mr. GRAVES quoted in support of his argument the authority of the English Ambassador in Paris, who urged upon the Government the political expediency of yielding to the French demands. It is probable that the termination of the Treaty may to a certain extent disturb the friendly feeling which might have been cultivated and encouraged by a renewal in a modified form of commercial relations. It is the business of diplomatists to make treaties and not to break them; but it must not be inferred that if Lord Lyons was professionally in the right, Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord GRANVILLE were in the wrong when they overruled his judgment. A certain number of manufacturers were anxious to retain, even under additional difficulties, their connexion with French markets, but the mass of commercial and industrial opinion preponderated against any alteration of the Treaty. The French Government has probably been surprised, and perhaps it may have been instructed, by the general indifference with which the denunciation of the Treaty has been received. M. THIERS had always persuaded himself that the Entente Cordiale had in 1860 paid an excessive price for an English alliance, and he now finds that the withdrawal of the boon neither provokes remonstrance nor perceptibly impairs the cordiality of England to France, though on the other side there may be a certain amount of irritation.

Several speakers in the debate on Mr. GRAVES's motion expressed their belief that the Free-trade party in France is increasing in numbers and influence; but it is difficult to judge whether sound principles are likely to prevail during the lifetime of the present generation. It seems that the trading communities of Marseilles and Havre are opposed to the rupture of the Treaty; but the manufacturing towns still adhere to the doctrine of Protection. The agricultural population is too ignorant and too inactive to protest against the artificial dearth of textile fabrics and cutlery, or to demand facilities for the exportation of its produce. The abolition of the alcoholic standard of duty on wine, which has long been one of Mr. GLADSTONE's favourite contrivances, would probably alarm the wine-growers of Gascony by exposing them to the competition of Spain and Portugal, but no other retaliatory change in the English tariff is likely to be proposed. Although the supporters of unrestricted commercial intercourse will perhaps fail to attain ascendancy in France, there is no doubt that they are far more powerful now than they were in 1860. The Treaty and its results had a great effect in rendering their doctrines popular, and it is probable that the revocation of the Treaty may accelerate the process of conviction. M. CHEVALIER and his friends would perhaps have been discouraged if the English Government had been more pliable in the recent negotiations. Although logical consistency is of comparatively little importance in political arrangements, it would have been undesirable to admit, by yielding to the representations of the French Government, that protective duties are financially and economically advantageous. From the first, and even before the fall of the Empire, M. THIERS rested his demands for a modification of the Treaty on an unsound basis. He uniformly contended that the tariff agreed upon was injurious to France, and he at the same time professed his readiness to make a limited sacrifice to satisfy the supposed exigencies of England. The consideration for French embarrassments which was recommended by Lord Lyons would have been interpreted by the French Government as a proof of the anxiety of England to retain a part of the benefits which had been too liberally bestowed by the Emperor NAPOLEON. M. THIERS never disguised his opinion that, as far as French interests were concerned, the abolition of the Treaty would be preferable to any compromise which could be suggested. His soundest argument was derived from the expediency of resuming the fiscal liberty which an independent nation ought not to surrender except for the most urgent reasons. The English Government and Legislature also will welcome their release from covenants which might perhaps hereafter have become practically burdensome. It is not likely that any duty will be imposed upon coal; but Parliament ought to possess the power of discouraging exportation, or of raising a revenue from the trade. In certain cases a troublesome conflict of obligations might arise from an undertaking to supply a belligerent with a commodity which is sometimes held to be contraband of war.

One scandalous inequality has resulted from the abrogation of the Treaty, or rather from the precipitate eagerness with which it was originally framed. In his anxiety to commence the era of universal peace founded on the sacred principle of buying in the cheapest market, Mr. CORDEN forgot to insert the clause which ought to have secured to England in perpetuity the commercial privileges accorded to the most favoured nations. The consequence is that the Convention which served as a model for all the other French commercial treaties, being the earliest in date, expires the first, and leaves England exposed to an unfair competition with the countries in which the treaties have still several years to run. Differential dues on English shipping might be comparatively endurable if they were impartially applied to all foreign flags; but under the surviving treaties the majority of maritime States will be enabled to continue their trade for some years, while English vessels will be practically excluded from French ports. The derangement of trade which must ensue principally accounts for the opposition of Marseilles and Havre to the abolition of the Treaty. The foreign competition which will still continue will prevent French shipowners from profiting by the suppression of English rivalry, especially as they are gratuitously crippled by a prohibitive duty on the purchase of vessels built abroad. In this instance M. THIERS has ingeniously inflicted a common injury on producers and consumers.

To apologists of the French Government who attribute the unfair treatment of English shipping to Lord GRANVILLE's refusal to modify the Treaty, it is a conclusive answer that the fiscal liberty which M. THIERS receives need not be wantonly abused. Any tariff on goods or on shipping which could have been made matter of agreement may be enacted at pleasure by the French Assembly on the proposal of the Government. The Emperor NAPOLEON had a strong reason for negotiating the Treaty in the constitutional provision by which at that time international contracts were exempt from the control of the Legislative Body. Notwithstanding the absolute nature of his power, the Emperor would have been unable to procure from his Assembly the enactment of a liberal tariff. By concluding the Treaty of 1860 he exercised, in that case with undoubted advantage to the country, exclusive powers of legislation. His scheme was rendered practicable by the active concurrence of Mr. CORDEN and Mr. GLADSTONE, who were eager for the extension of commercial intercourse, while they were not responsible for the evasion of French constitutional restraints. The French Assembly, not being subject to any similar disability, can, if it thinks fit, provide a complete substitute for any form of treaty which M. THIERS or the majority would have preferred. It is well known in France that the English Government meditates no menace or act of commercial hostility, for the simple reason that it had from the first regarded one half of the Treaty as equally beneficial with the other. If France objects to cheap cotton yarn, England is content to obtain cheap claret; and even the Coventry weavers have ceased to lament in public over the importation of Lyons silks. All the benefits of the whole, or of half, or of the smallest fraction of the Treaty are within reach of the French Government and nation whenever they desire to enjoy them. To punish England by iniquitous navigation laws for refusing to afford a nugatory concurrence is neither just nor rational. The hardship will find compensation in the comparative exclusion of the French marine from the general trade of the world. The American tariff has greatly promoted English commerce, and it has more especially given an approximate monopoly of the carrying trade to English vessels. The not less perverse legislation of France will afford another illustration of the unprofitable nature of economic heresies. Foreign nations will hereafter discover that the commercial prosperity of England is closely connected with adherence to sound principles of trade.

THE SCOTCH EDUCATION BILL.

THE sixty-fourth and sixty-fifth clauses of the Scotch Education Bill occupied the House of Commons for two morning sittings. The speakers and the speeches were alike familiar to those who remember the discussions provoked by the corresponding clauses in the English measure. Mr. COLLINS proposed an amendment providing that, in the distribution of the Parliamentary grant, no preference shall be given to any school on the ground that it is or is not provided by the School Board. The principle of the amendment was not contested by the Government. Mr. FORSTER was pardonably anxious to be spared the necessity of voting against a section of his party, but the inexorable Mr. COLLINS would not hear of his evading the dose, and the amendment was carried. Mr. TREVELYAN made the curious mistake of asking the House to strike out the only restraint which the Bill imposes on the multiplication of Denominational schools. He was allowed, however, to withdraw his amendment, and the LORD ADVOCATE himself then took the clause in hand. As it stood originally, it provided that no grant should be given to a new Denominational school, unless the Scotch Education Department shall be satisfied that "it is specially required in the locality where it is situated, and that a majority of the children in attendance are of the denomination to which the school belongs." The reason assigned by Mr. FORSTER for the omission of these latter words is not very conclusive. There would have been no hardship in a "creed investigation" which only went the length of requiring the parents of children in attendance at voluntary schools to state to what creed they belong. Indeed there is much to be said in favour of a creed register in contradistinction to a Conscience Clause, as the instrument by which to protect parents against having their children subjected to religious instruction of which they disapprove. The fact pointed out by Dr. PLAYFAIR, that the effect of the words would be to exclude Episcopalian schools from receiving any share of the Parliamentary grant, was more to the purpose. In this case a minority is willing to contribute largely to the secular education of the community on condition of being allowed to give religious instruction to its own children. Unless voluntary aid is to be repudiated altogether, and no schools recognized by the State except such as are provided by itself, there can be no reason why Denominational liberality should be subjected to any restraints beyond such as are required to guard against proselytism.

An attempt was made by the Secularist party in the House of Commons to import into the Bill the compromise by which in the English Act no distinctive religious formulary is allowed to be taught in public schools. The real argument against Mr. ANDERSON'S amendment is the acknowledged failure of the compromise as an expedient for getting over the religious difficulty. That a minority should object to be taxed for the teaching of a religion which they believe to be untrue is intelligible, if not reasonable. That they should object to be taxed for the documentary teaching of a religion which they believe to be untrue, while they permit themselves to be taxed for its vivâ voce teaching, is not even intelligible. Religions are usually less exclusive in their authorised formularies than in the unauthorised glosses of individual instructors. The very idea of authorisation implies some amount of caution and some sense of responsibility. A man who thinks Calvinism wrong will probably be less offended by the expositions of the system contained in the Shorter Catechism than by any oral reproductions of them on the part of the village schoolmaster. Under the absurd compromise embodied in the English Act, School Boards are left absolutely free to teach what religion they like; they are only forbidden to teach it in the most obvious and convenient way. To repeat an illustration which we have formerly used, the English Act goes on the principle that, while the teaching of geometry should be allowed, the use of Euclid's Elements should be strictly forbidden. This was no part of the principle on which the English Act was originally framed. It is simply a later disfigurement which has satisfied no one. The principle of the English Act as regards the religious difficulty is that it shall be made over to the local authorities. To prohibit them from dealing with it in the simplest and most straightforward manner is, so far as it goes, a departure from this principle, not a further carrying out of it.

Mr. Dixon supported the amendment on the ground that in educational legislation the Empire should be treated as a whole. This theory is the most inconvenient that a Government or a Legislature could possibly adopt. No doubt there are some points on which uniformity of treatment is necessary; but what need is there to go out of our way to include in them a matter upon which uniformity is peculiarly galling to those upon whom it is imposed? The admission that people differ greatly upon religion seems to imply as its natural corollary that religious questions should be differently handled according as the local feeling inclines to one or another mode of treatment. Mr. Dixon protests against "the principle that 'you are to consult the religious feelings and prejudices of 'the country for which you are legislating.' " The most marked application of this principle of late years has been the disestablishment of the Irish Church. In this case a majority of English and Scotch Protestants concurred in pulling down an institution with which on the whole they sympathized, because they deferred to the religious feelings of the people of Ireland. According to Mr. Dixon, they ought to have waited until the Established Churches of the three kingdoms could have been involved in a common overthrow. Indeed the argument most in favour with the opponents of the Irish Church Bill was the precise counterpart of Mr. Dixon's. The decision for or against an Established Church ought, it was said, to be made in the interest of the whole Empire, not of any one part of it. If the principle is good for England and Scotland, it ought not to be imperilled merely to conciliate the religious feelings and prejudices of Irishmen. It is obvious that if there are three separate sections of the Empire taking different views of a question of this kind, it will be very much easier to make three separate arrangements each of which shall be in substantial conformity with the wishes of a particular section than to bring all three into perfect accord. What is true of religious questions proper, such as Church Establishments, is true in a still greater degree of questions which are only incidentally religious, such as education. Before Mr. Dixon's plan of legislating in the same way for all the three kingdoms can be carried out, one of two things must have happened. Either the people of Ireland and Scotland must have been converted to secularism, or the people of England must not only have made up their minds to accept secularism for themselves, but also to force it upon the inhabitants of the other two kingdoms. We question whether Mr. Dixon has quite faced the latter alternative. Supposing that Irish Roman Catholics and Scotch Presbyterians refuse to hear the voice of the charmer, how is Mr. Dixon prepared to treat two such companies of deaf adders? Is he prepared to allow elementary education in those countries to languish from the want of any sympathy between the teachers and the parents whose children need teaching? Or will he undertake to compel parents, not only to send their children to school, but also to send them to the sort of school to which Mr. Dixon thinks they ought to go? Perhaps the quaintest of the many crotchets which have been called into publicity by discussions on the Scotch Education Bill is Mr. M'LAREN'S wish to make the reading and teaching of the Bible compulsory in all public schools in which religious instruction is given. Mr. M'LAREN is not, as might be suspected from his amendment, a supporter of Mr. GORDON. He has no objection to secular schools, and if his amendment had been carried, any public school might have got rid of the obligation to read the Bible, provided it had been content to give no religious instruction whatever. No religion Mr. M'LAREN can understand; a religion like his own he can understand. But a religion different from his own, a religion which finds text-books and catechisms a more convenient machinery for teaching young children than a whole literature accidentally bound up in a single volume, he cannot understand. And to judge by the division, there are 189 members of the House of Commons who can understand it no more than he.

The evening sitting on Thursday was devoted to the Compulsory Clauses. An important alteration was made at the instance of Mr. W. H. SMITH, by which the power of remitting fees is to be vested in the parochial authorities, instead of in the School Boards. That the Legislature will in the end have to abandon all attempts at distinguishing between educational and other pauperism appears more probable every day. The opponents of compulsion did not go to a division—a remarkable proof of the progress which the idea has made in public estimation during the last two years. The clauses which impose on employers of children a concurrent duty with the parents as regards education were made more stringent, while the direct penalties on parents were considerably softened. It was objected by some members that too much of the permissive character still lingers about this part of the Bill. But compulsion in the matter of education is still a novel theory, and it is not desirable to ride it too hard upon the occasion of its first introduction.

THE CASE OF DIBLANC.

IT is obvious that the growing disinclination to inflict capital punishment, especially on women, is producing a disastrous effect on the administration of justice. A jury have found MARGUERITE DIBLANC guilty of murder, but have recommended her to mercy on the ground that the crime was not premeditated; and the Judge who tried the case does not appear to have thought it necessary to point out the contradiction which was involved in a verdict of murder qualified in this manner. If the killing of Madame RIEL was not premeditated, it would be, of course, not murder, but manslaughter. It is possible that the jury may have fallen into confusion over the legal argument as to the distinction between murder and manslaughter; and that what they meant to say was, that in their opinion DIBLANC had no thought of killing her mistress before the latter came into the kitchen and abused her, and that the suddenness of the impulse and the provocation she had received seemed to them in some degree to excuse her violence. In such a case it might have been supposed to be the business of the Judge to clarify the thoughts of the jury, and to induce them to express themselves clearly and consistently, especially as the question they raised was about to be submitted for the decision of the HOME SECRETARY. From one point of view—that is, if they had disregarded the medical evidence, and assumed death to have arisen from a sudden blow not intended to kill—they might have found a verdict of manslaughter; but unpremeditated murder is not a crime which has hitherto been known to English lawyers. Premeditation, or, in technical language, "malice aforethought," is of the essence of murder, and does not necessarily imply deliberate and careful planning. It is a mental process which may be carried on for days or months, or even years, or which may be compressed into an instantaneous flash of thought. Premeditation is, in fact, only another word for intention. To constitute murder there must be an intention to kill, and the question for the jury was simply, what was the intention in the mind of the prisoner when she inflicted on Madame RIEL the injuries which resulted in her death. Up to a certain point the case is clear enough. DIBLANC was not on good terms with her mistress, whom she thought to be exacting and discontented. One Sunday morning Madame RIEL went into the kitchen, and there DIBLANC killed her. The rest is, apart from DIBLANC's own story, which was given in the evidence of the French policemen, a matter of inference and conjecture. It does not appear that the crime was planned beforehand or committed with a view to plunder. DIBLANC carried off banknotes to the amount of seventy pounds, which she found in the safe, but she did not ransack the house with a view to pillage; and though it is doubtful whether—her fellow-servant being in the house—she could have removed the jewel-box which was left in the safe, it may be admitted that she might probably have taken more than she did. It is certain that DIBLANC killed her mistress, but the question is whether she meant to kill her. According to the medical evidence, Madame RIEL was either throttled by hand or strangled by a rope, and such was the pressure applied to the throat of the victim that the cartilages of the throat as well as the jaw were crushed and broken. Dr. WADHAM said that "a single blow on the throat or jaw would certainly not, in his opinion, have produced the injuries he saw. It would have required very great force to produce the breakage of the framework of the jaw which he observed." The prisoner's counsel pleaded that she had not time to think of or consider the physical effect of her acts; but it can hardly be argued seriously that a savage clutch at the windpipe, which not only chokes but breaks the bones, is an accident or inadvertence. It would be just as reasonable to say that stabbing a man to the heart, or discharging a pistol at his ear, had "unexpectedly proved fatal." The physical effect of throttling or strangling must be held to be known to all persons not absolutely bereft of reason.

It is conceivable that the first blow which DIBLANC struck may not have been intended to kill; but it is impossible to doubt that she despatched her victim with resolute ferocity before she had done with her. The condition of the body supplied conclusive proof of an intention to kill on DIBLANC's part, or of that indifference to the natural and probable consequence of her acts which is very properly held in law to amount to intention. As to what passed between her and her mistress we have only her own story, which must be supposed to be the most favourable to herself which she was able to concoct or invent. There is nothing inherently improbable in her statement that Madame RIEL found fault with her work, and wished to dismiss her without a month's notice and wages, and in the course of a hot altercation called her by a very bad name. If it had been possible to cross-examine the prisoner on this story, we should have been better able to estimate its value; but even if it had been satisfactorily made out in all particulars, there is, as the Judge explained, nothing more certain in criminal law than that no words or gestures will constitute that kind of provocation which is held to reduce murder to manslaughter. As far as we can see, the jury had, on the facts of the case, no alternative but to return a verdict of wilful murder. By their recommendation to mercy they appear to suggest that the killing of a fellow-creature from a sudden impulse on the provocation of abusive language is to be regarded as a comparatively venial offence, but the HOME SECRETARY will incur a grave responsibility if he is weak enough to afford any countenance to so startling and dangerous a proposition.

It has been observed by a French writer that an English Judge usually treats a prisoner who is on trial before him as an unfortunate being, and that in this view he is sympathetically seconded by the benevolent feelings of the whole auditory, people, counsel, and jury. It is possible that this amiable tendency is now being carried somewhat too far. A few months ago a clergyman who had murdered his wife was reprieved because he was an old man, and it was conjectured that his wife had not the best of tempers. The case was in some respects similar to that of DIBLANC. There was no witness of the murder, but it was good-naturedly assumed that a clergyman would not kill his wife on a Sunday unless she had been particularly aggravating. In a similar way we are now asked to take it for granted that a cook would not strangle her mistress if the mistress kept her own place and showed proper consideration for the feelings of her servant. There appear to be several reasons which incline popular sentiment in DIBLANC's favour. She is a foreigner; she was unjustly suspected of having been a Communist, and perhaps a pétroleuse; she wears a nice white cap, and looks a quiet sort of woman; her mistress was perhaps no better than she should be, and ought at any rate to have been at church on Sunday morning instead of staying at home to be murdered. Mr. CHARLES READE, who has made women, and especially, as he intimates, cooks, a subject of profound study, has undertaken to show that DIBLANC behaved with singular delicacy and forbearance to her victim. A successful writer of fiction, who is professionally engaged in the analysis of human nature, has perhaps as good a right to be heard as an expert on such a question as any of the mad doctors who are so fond of lecturing from the witness-box on "paroxysms of motive"; but Mr. READE's sentimental devotion to the inmates of the kitchen leads him to some extraordinary conclusions. The kitchen, it seems, is the cook's castle, and a mistress who intrudes there in order to find fault with her domestic, especially on a Sunday, "when even a cook is entitled to a little bit of peace," should be thankful if she is only knocked down and beaten or throttled by hand. The kitchen is "an arsenal of deadly weapons," with every one of which a cook is familiar; and it is monstrous to make a fuss about a cook merely scrunching the bones of her mistress's throat in her vigorous grasp when she might, if she liked, stab her with a carving knife or chop her up with a cleaver. From Mr. READE's point of view, DIBLANC is the victim, and the murdered woman the real criminal. It makes one's blood boil to think of what "insulted labour and contumace" must have endured before it took justifiable vengeance on insolent and merciless "luxury." If Madame RIEL had not gone poking about in a kitchen which was not hers, but her cook's, the cook would not have taken her by the throat; and if she had not weakened her constitution by habits of luxury, she would have been able to defend herself, and a crime would not have been consummated, "when between two working women there would only have been a fight." It is obvious that Madame RIEL had no right to allow herself to be cravée, and thus to bring poor dear MARGUERITE into all this trouble. Mr. READE's namby-pamby sentimentalism supplies us with an irresistible reductio ad absurdum of the argument for the defence. We agree with Mr. READE that in recommending the prisoner to mercy the jury gave their own verdict the lie, for if there is any truth in the indictment the prisoner is a most unfit subject of mercy. It seems to us difficult to imagine a more savage or atrocious murder; and nothing can be more dangerous than to countenance the argument that because a mistress uses hard words her servant has a right to spring upon her like a wild beast and choke her. It is significant that the philanthropists who are so very chary of taking life as the punishment of murder have no hesitation about allowing people to be put to death, without trial, for bad language. There are, we fear, other aggravating wives and "worrying" mistresses in the world besides Mrs. WATSON and Madame RIEL, and they know now what they have to expect. It has hitherto been supposed that the object of the law was to teach people to control the impulses of passion; but this new theory of killing no murder will be apt to have an opposite effect.

THE BUILDERS' STRIKE.

THE strikes which are just now in progress simultaneously in different parts of the world exhibit in a remarkable manner the diversities of the labour market. While the London carpenters have led the way in a general strike of the building trades for a working day of nine hours, the engineers of Berlin are striking for a day of ten hours, and all kinds of mechanics and artisans in New York for a day of eight hours. The London workmen can look back on a time when they were striking, like those of Berlin, to get their hours reduced to ten, and it is probable that they look forward hopefully to some day placing themselves in as good a position in this respect as the workmen of New York. There is no reason to suppose that if the conditions of the labour market in England, Germany, and the United States could be equalized, workmen would not be hired on the same terms in the three countries. There is a school of sentimental economists who are in the habit of arguing that there is such a thing as a just wage, and we suppose there must also be a just day's work. It is amusing to observe the anger and contempt with which people of this class repudiate the doctrine that the worth of a thing is what it will fetch; but it has not yet been shown on what other principle the commercial relations of men can practically be regulated. No means have yet been discovered of compelling people to buy what they do not want, and the question whether a commodity is really wanted is usually determined by the price at which it can be procured. There are few things which people cannot do without if they choose, and it is certain that they cannot buy everything. The carpenters and other workmen in the building trades calculate that the wealth and population of the metropolis must continue to increase, that more houses and better houses will be required, and that the masters can either afford to surrender some of their profits, or can easily recoup themselves at the expense of the public. It is obvious, however, that the cost of house-building cannot be seriously augmented without a corresponding rise in rents; and it is possible that not a few householders, under the pressure of the present high prices of everything, may be compelled to consider whether they cannot procure cheaper instead of dearer dwellings. Any one can see for himself that some parts of London are ludicrously overbuilt, and that it has been found impossible to get tenants of the class for whom the houses were originally intended. It may happen that one result of the strike will be the discomfiture of the speculative builders who are ruining so many neighbourhoods in this manner, and if it is, there will be no reason to regret it. There can be no doubt, however, that though London might perhaps contrive to shift for a time with its present stock of houses, it must continue to expand, and it will also have, to a great extent, to be rebuilt. We should not be surprised to find a reaction setting in on the part of the middle classes against dismal exile to remote suburbs, where they have none of the advantages of being in or near the country, and all the disadvantages of being at a distance from business and social pleasures. Houses in flats in the central parts of the town might then be expected to come into fashion. However that may be, there is no reason to fear that there will not be plenty of work for the builders in succeeding years, and it can scarcely be doubted that before long, if not at once, there must be a general rise of wages. The cost of living is very high, it appears to be increasing, and it presses in every way much more heavily on the working classes than on the middle and upper classes. As a working-man has now to pay more for everything he uses than he did a few years ago, he has a substantial reason for demanding an increase of wages; and we cannot help thinking that the masters committed an error in not at once meeting the demands of the men with a distinct and definite offer of an increase of wages. The masters in this, as in almost every other instance, appear to have made it a rule to concede nothing except under the coercion of Unions and strikes, and yet they profess to be surprised that the Unions should have such a hold upon the men, and that strikes are so frequent.

If the question at issue between masters and men in the building trade were simply a question of wages, there would probably be little difficulty in settling it. But, at the same time that the men want, for good reasons as we think, to earn more money, they also want to do less work. In effect, the masters are asked to make every man in their employment a present of not less than 4s. 3d. a week. The masters may, or may not, get this out of their customers; but in the first instance they will have to pay it themselves. In addition to this, the men demand that the code of working rules shall be altered very much to their advantage. It will be seen that the men hope to carry the masters' position with a rush, at a moment when the latter are embarrassed by a temporary pressure of business. Whether they will succeed in doing this, whether their strike or the lock-out with which the masters have answered it, will be abandoned first, we cannot presume to say. It is simply a trial of strength, and the issue depends not merely on the circumstances of the trade at the moment, but on the temper of the antagonists. It is usually assumed that those who do not approve the policy and tactics of Trade Unions must necessarily be hostile to working-men, and anxious to see them oppressed and despoiled. For our own part, though we have never been able to understand why the working-man, in the cant sense of the word, should be an especial object of sympathy and compassion above all other classes of the community, we should be very glad to see him and everybody else getting the highest wages for the least amount of work. The Saturday half-holiday has not been an unmixed advantage to the working-men, or at least to their families; but there can be no doubt that a life of constant labour has a depressing effect, and that a reasonable amount of leisure is essential to the intelligent and wholesome enjoyment of life. When the men get more accustomed to leisure, they will perhaps be able to make a better use of it; and as there has been of late years a gradual reduction of the hours of labour, the process may be expected to continue, although it is clear that it cannot be indefinitely prolonged. There is no pretence, however, for saying that ten hours at carpenter's work or bricklaying is injurious to health; and the object for which the reduction of hours is asked is avowedly to establish an artificial system of employment. There are a great many carpenters, bricklayers, &c., out of work, and the managers of the Unions feel bound to do something for them. The working-man would probably be amazed and disgusted if the grocer told him that, because tea was too abundant in the market, it had been decided that three-quarters of a pound should be reckoned a pound, and that sixpence a pound should be added to the price. But the working-man thinks this very good logic in his own case as against the grocer and the public. It is possible that some day it may be found practicable to limit the working-day to nine hours, or even less; and as a step in that direction it is natural to begin by fixing the normal limit of the day at nine hours, and making all labour beyond that overtime at a higher rate. This was the result of the engineers' strike at Newcastle, but the real object of that strike, as of the present, was of a more serious character, and was in fact to put a stop to overtime altogether. In this the engineers failed, and it is probable that the carpenters and masons will fail too, inasmuch as they are endeavouring to coerce, not merely their employers, but a considerable section of their own class, who are anxious to increase their earnings by overtime. In the building trade it might perhaps be a fair compromise that the men should continue to do ten hours' work in the summer-time, when business presses, and nine—or, for the matter of that, eight hours—in the winter-time, when there is less work and shorter daylight. It is perhaps significant that in the United States the law fixing the day's labour at eight hours remained a dead letter till a few weeks since, when, under pressure of the Presidential election, the Government gave orders that it should be enforced in the public works. After the election the law may again be forgotten, and though in some trades the men have carried their point, the resistance to the movement is still vigorously maintained by private employers.

As the carpenters persist in their strike, and have refused the arbitration proposed by the masters, a lock-out has now commenced. The result will no doubt be a heavy loss both to masters and men, and the abstraction of a considerable amount of capital which might otherwise have been devoted to developing the trade and providing increased employment for the men. At first sight arbitration in such a case has a plausible and prepossessing look; but on examination it becomes very doubtful whether much good could be expected from it. Even if arbitrators could be chosen who commanded the implicit confidence of both parties, on what principles would they proceed to give their decisions? They would have not only to find the facts, but to invent the law which they would have to apply to the facts. How can arbitration be expected, for example, to settle such a question as the limitation of the day's work to nine hours? The masters want to make money fast and to get through as much work as possible, and therefore they insist upon ten hours. The men, who have no prospect of retiring on a comfortable fortune, and who know that they will have to work all their lives, prefer to take the journey more easily and to rest a little as they go along. Each party wants to do what is most convenient for itself, and how could an arbitrator determine which should give way? It is a sheer trial of strength. And much the same may be said of the question of wages. Have the men a right to a proportionate share in the profits of the business? With what amount of profit should an employer be contented? What are the employer's risks, and how much in the shape of a margin should be allowed for them? These are all questions as to which there are, so far as we know, no settled principles or rules for the guidance of arbitration, and until some kind of understanding was come to about them, the arbitrators would be quite at sea. It is unfortunate that the dispute cannot be settled without a conflict in which the combatants and the public will alike suffer; but it is difficult to see what else could be done.

THE TYRANNY OF CUSTOM.

THE gentlemen who delight in calling themselves Philosophical Radicals are fond of preaching a doctrine which from some points of view seems to be in curious contrast to their practice. The great evil of the present day, as they delight to inform us, is the growing tyranny of the majority. Society is becoming painfully monotonous, and we are compelled more and more to cut our cloth according to the taste of our neighbours. The black hat, under which all adult males of a certain social standing groan with an ever-increasing sense of helplessness, is a fitting emblem of our subjection. Accordingly, they naturally in such weather as that which has probably distinguished the last weight of the season, by some thousands of men, and they

it is about the most detestable head-dress ever invented. It is hideous, uncomfortable in all weathers, and provocative of sun-stroke in heat. And yet we are all condemned to wear it; and to appear in midday in a really convenient form of costume requires greater courage than to walk up to a battery. The ancient legend of Gessler's hat may possibly be considered at some future day, when dates have been blended together by the mists of time, as a myth expressive of that humiliating bondage; but the Tell who is to protest against it has not yet appeared. To shoot at an apple on one's child's head would be disagreeable, but what is that to making oneself ridiculous in the eyes of the respectable public? It is to be remarked that the people who protest most vigorously in theory against this despotism are also the very people who do their best to render it inevitable. The so-called tyranny of the majority is a logical result from the general levelling of society. When the distinction between classes, and even the distinction between sexes, obtains no legislative or social recognition, public opinion will naturally have a unity and an intensity hitherto unknown. The effect of mixing all classes together and giving the same weight to the opinion of every individual will naturally be that all mankind, being exposed to much the same influences, will have much the same opinion; and all the preaching in the world will hardly animate the insignificant unit in a mass of many millions to have any really independent views. If, that is, the Utopia of these theorists could ever be reached, it is probable at first sight that the evil against which they most strongly protest would be aggravated to the highest possible degree. We will not ask at present whether any ingenious changes of political machinery, such as Mr. Hare's scheme of voting, offer any chances of escape. It is not improbable, to say the least, that any such devices, however cleverly they might be constructed, would turn out to be the flimsiest of cobwebs when opposed to the deeper moral influences naturally generated by a perfectly dead level of society.

We are not, however, prepared at the present moment to discuss the very difficult problem thus suggested, or to inquire into the means by which our grandchildren may possibly escape from being ground down into multitudinous repetitions of an identical type. It will be enough for the present to dwell upon one particular branch of the argument which is not unfrequently misrepresented. The writers of whom we speak appeal to the growing uniformity of various social observances as if that tendency necessarily implied a diminution of social liberty. In one sense this is of course true. A man's choice of hats is restricted. Instead of suiting his own fancy or convenience, he is bound by an unwritten but inexorable law to choose the pattern which society in its wisdom has chosen to prescribe for him. In the same way, however much the practice may commend itself in the eye of reason, he is absolutely forbidden to chew tobacco, to eat peas with a knife, or to sit down to dinner in his shirt-sleeves. It requires, however, very little thought to see that this is in many cases the price which one pays for liberty. We can do what we please so long as we make the necessary sacrifice to the idol, just as a man may say what he likes when he is dressed in a commonplace domino at a masquerade. It is impossible sufficiently to admire the efficiency of the contrivance as it is exhibited in any social meeting in London. If we consider the set of persons who are often gathered round a single dinner-table, we may easily satisfy ourselves of the advantages of this cloak of darkness. The Giant-killer in the story sits down by his bitterest enemy and eats and drinks in perfect security owing to his fairy armour. On the same principle there may be hatreds and jealousies and dark intrigues enough in a single dining-room to furnish out a whole batch of tragedies. Capulet and Montague are enabled to meet on equal terms, to shake each other by the hand, and put on all the conventional appearances of goodwill. What is this but saying that we are infinitely freer than we should be if everybody had to wear a distinguishing badge? In rough savage times, two enemies cannot meet without flying at each other's throats. Hatred, therefore, could only be indulged under severe penalties, whereas we may now indulge in the most delicious antipathies as freely and fully as our hearts can desire. There is no bad passion which we may not cherish, so long as we do not give it open expression. A man may be a misanthrope, and yet show himself every evening in a white tie and with the conventional smirk on his countenance. In earlier days he would have had either to abandon his misanthropy or to retire into a cell. That is to say, there are in this respect much fewer obstacles to the hatred of our neighbours than was formerly the case; and the same remark applies to any other passion in which our idiosyncrasies may lead us to indulge. The external uniformity of society should therefore not be described as a grinding each other down in the social mill, but rather as the adoption of a method by which our passions, at the simple price of not showing themselves on the surface, may have practically more ample room and breathing space than they would have at the antipodes. Anybody who has frequented circles which make a boast of being unconventional will probably have observed that such people are practically far more awkward and flat than their respectable neighbours. Nothing imposes so really galling a restraint as the understanding that your actions are to be interpreted, not as a mere tribute to social decency, but as a sincere expression of your feelings. In London people are bound to observe certain rules from which they are exempted in the country; and in London they are practically infinitely freer from the censures of their neighbours. Yet have, it is true, to wear a black hat and coat, and you cannot smoke a pipe with the same freedom in the public streets. But, on the other hand, nobody knows what your income is or how you spend it, or thinks of asking, unless you invite the question, whether you attend the sermons of Mr. Spurgeon or Cardinal Manning, or sit under Mr. Voysey, or simply spend your Sunday mornings in the retirement of your own library. The tendency of things is to force all the little oddies into the main stream, and to make everybody live in a crowd instead of retiring to a hermitage. But then the crowd itself becomes a protection, and, by making a small external sacrifice, you receive in return the utmost possible freedom of action in far more essential matters.

These are sufficiently obvious considerations, but it seems as if the conclusion was not always observed. Phenomena which are really significant of an increase of liberty are noticed as though they implied a growth of social tyranny. Society imposes a certain code of laws; they are applied with greater uniformity to different classes, and it may even be that they are imposed with greater rigour than of old. But it does not necessarily follow, as seems to be frequently assumed, that they touch the individual on a greater number of points, or upon points of more vital importance. The black hat, to recur to our example, is clearly a grievance; it is devoutly to be wished that the mysterious powers which preside over such details would invent a more comfortable and becoming uniform. Perhaps it would be better still if we had arrived at that pitch of civilization at which everybody could be trusted to suit his individual taste. But that is not the issue which has been practically decided. The alternative hitherto presented to mankind has been only whether we should all wear the same uniform, or whether each class should wear its own uniform. When the artisan in his Sunday best wears the same costume as the prince, he is far freer than if he were bound to mark his trade and his geographical position by every detail of his dress. The disappearance of the old provincial peculiarities may be a subject for regret from the æsthetic and perhaps from other points of view, but to the provincial himself it means that he is shaking off some of the narrow shackles within which his mind and his person were confined, and is becoming part of a larger community with more varied interests, thoughts, and opportunities of exerting his energies. The levelling process may be merely a stage towards a further improvement and a classification of mankind according to their individual tastes, instead of the arbitrary divisions of caste and locality. It must in that case be accepted as a necessary step in the process of development, though not regarded as the ultimate goal of progress. However this may be, it would be easy to suggest many other cases in which our lamentations seem to be rather thrown away. Mr. Mill, for example, tells us that eccentricity is now regarded with so much disgust that we are inclined to set anybody down as mad who deviates from the ordinary paths of conduct. Is that entirely a disadvantage? Suppose that a gentleman comes to the conclusion that, on the whole, it would contribute to his happiness to blow his wife's brains out. He acts upon this resolution with complete disregard of the views upon the subject generally current in civilized society. In simpler times he would have been hanged by the neck till he was dead. At the present period we feel that there is very much to be said on both sides of the question, and we therefore resolve to make a judicious compromise by presenting him with a pension for the rest of his days, whilst, at the same time, we put him under certain restrictions to prevent him from acting upon his theories to the disadvantage of other people. The difference is that we have learnt to call an action silly which we used to describe as wicked. Murderous propensities have such an obvious tendency to make society unpleasant that, even on the wildest doctrine of human rights, it is admitted that they ought to be put under certain restrictions; but if the special idiosyncrasy of the individual is developed into a taste for crime, he can certainly gratify it with less practical inconvenience than in former times. To do what other people do not generally do has always been considered a legitimate ground of offence. If it was formerly set down as a sin, and is now only regarded as a disease, we are no far less hampered than of old. Originality of character may possibly be growing rarer. We by no means intend to deny that it is so; and still less to deny that the diminution of originality is a natural consequence of democracy. The moral atmosphere becomes less favourable to vigorous growth, and in some cases government tends to become more rigid and more inclined to force particular modes of action upon the individual. But before we decide that the prevalence of a given custom is an instance of this tendency, there is a previous question to be considered. The new rules may be a substitute for old ones of a different character, or they may be a device for allowing deeper differences to exist under cover of superficial uniformity. To live in society is to play a game which requires a certain amount of skill. Those who possess the necessary accomplishments may flatter themselves that, even if things come to the worst, they can, at the price of a little lying, indulge any evil propensities they please to the fullest extent. There is no opinion which they may not hold, and no vice which they may not practise, with as great impunity as ever. Whether the nobler influences may not be at work which tend to promote the growth of original character, is another question; but there is really no cause to complain of the tyranny of public opinion when it is a serpent who can be evaded by such very easy compliances.

THE ALFRED MILLENNARY DINNER.

THE millennium has come and the dinner has been eaten. University College has assembled to celebrate after the manner of Englishmen the anniversary of an event which never happened, and to defend as ingeniously as might be a proceeding which has at least had the merit of providing resident Oxford, and most likely non-resident Oxford also, with a source of merriment not likely to be soon forgotten. But in truth, grotesque as the whole business is, it is not merely subject for laughter. The whole affair, and the comments which have been made upon it in various quarters, show how very lax are the notions which some minds entertain of historic truth. We have of course nothing to say against the Oxford resident who so kindly served up our own remarks cold a few days before the festival took place. Perhaps we had by that time been forgotten; perhaps we had dealt with the subject in too light a vein, and it was found needful to put forth our arguments afresh in a form grave enough for the readers of the Academy. But the way in which some other papers talked about the matter, the sneers at carping antiquarianism and the like, serve, together with the first idea of the dinner itself, and with the speeches made at it, to show how hard it is to make many people understand that the difference between truth and falsehood is a matter of any importance at all. "Antiquarianism," like "pedantry," is one of the charges which are always hurled at the heads of those who care about truth by those who do not care about it. Anything it seems is good enough to dine about, and anything is good enough to make a joke about. We say No. When people deliberately celebrate a certain event, whether by dining or in any other way, they profess a belief in the truth of that event. If they do not believe in the event which they commemorate, the business is something beyond a joke—it is a mere piece of dishonesty.

Let us compare the mock anniversary which was kept last week with the real anniversary which was kept a few years back by the most ancient College in Oxford. The Merton College festival differed from the University College festival in the degree in which a real antiquity of six hundred years differs from a sham antiquity of a thousand years. The University College festival stood to the Merton College festival in the relation in which the Eastern believers in two creative principles hold certain animals to stand towards nobler animals of their own order. Ormuzd created the man and the horse; Ahriman, trying to imitate his work, could produce nothing better than the monkey and the ass. It is in this sort of relation that the University College sham stands to the Merton College reality. When Merton College came together to celebrate a real founder, none of its members were put to the pitiful shifts by which the speakers at University College strove to defend the celebration of an imaginary founder. No Merton man had anything to defend at all; no Merton man had any need to be ashamed of what he was doing. The members of Merton College came together to keep the anniversary of the real calling into being, by the act of a wise and bountiful man, of a noble foundation, the oldest in Oxford, at least of its kind, and which has lived on with but little change to our own day. Such a gathering needed no apology, no defence; it needed no such searching after far-fetched parables as has distinguished this pitiful attempt to ape it. Every man at Merton must have felt that he was taking a part in a ceremony in which he might well be proud to have a right to take a part. He must have felt that he was celebrating a great and beneficial revolution in Academical history, a revolution of which he was in some sort a personal representative. But every man who dined at University College in honour of the imaginary foundation of King Alfred must have known in his heart that he was dining in honour of a lie. We use, as we used before, the one word which rightly expresses the state of things. We repeat that the alleged foundation of University College by King Alfred is not a myth, it is not a legend, it is not a tradition; it is a lie, a lie invented at a known time and with a known purpose. This at once does away with the one parallel which has been found in the whole history of the world for celebrating the thousandth anniversary of an event that never happened. Dean Stanley has lighted on what he thinks an analogous case in the celebration by the Emperor Philip of the thousandth anniversary of the foundation of Rome. The foundation of Rome, he tells us, was as doubtful as the foundation of University College. He calls up, perhaps from the depths of his internal consciousness, the various objections which were brought against the ceremony, and tells how cynical critics doubted whether Romulus was really suckled by a wolf. Dr. Stanley forgets that, if there were nothing to be said against the foundation of Rome by Romulus except that a legend asserted that Romulus was suckled by a wolf, the foundation of Rome by Romulus might stand firmly as any fact in history. Cyrus, so legend said, was suckled by a kindred animal, yet Cyrus really founded the empire of Persia. So Alfred certainly did not found University College, and it is very likely that he never had anything to do with the burning of cakes; but Alfred was not the less a real man who did great things. Modern criticism leads us to disbelieve not only that Romulus was suckled by a wolf, but that Romulus ever existed at all. But we may be sure that when Philip celebrated the millenary of Rome, though many may have disbelieved the story of the wolf, there were few or none who disbelieved the fact or the date of the foundation of Rome by Romulus. Could Dr. Stanley or any other man there stand up and say that he really believed that University College was founded by Alfred in the year 872? Dr. Stanley at least could not. With a characteristic confusion of truth and fiction he tells us that "he considers that the connexion of Oxford with King Alfred has no grains of historical truth, but is a very fine legend." And he goes on to talk about Alfred and Arthur as "two ideal kings in English history," about Cambridge and her charter, and the Poet Laureate, and what not. And then he goes on to compare the imaginary foundation of a University or a College by Alfred in the middle of the Danish wars with the real foundation of the University of Leyden in the midst of the Dutch War of Independence, and with the story, which there is at least nothing to contradict, about the sale of the ground on which Hannibal's camp was pitched. There would be something amusing, if it were not pitiable, in the state of mind which not only cannot distinguish between the honest growth of legend and the wilful invention of lies, but to which truth and falsehood in any shape seem to be matters of utter indifference. Truth must indeed be in a poor way if it is thought to be a justification of falsehood that something a little like it can be found in real history. To Dr. Stanley, the falseness of a story is, the more utterly it contradicts all truth and all possibility, the clearer it seems to become. "Viewing it as a legend," he tells us, "872 is the proper date." That is to say, it is the date which, if there are degrees in utter impossibility, is most utterly impossible. And all this comes from the mouth of one who, with the bitterest unconscious satire, exhorts his hearers to "be the true sons and disciples of Alfred the Truth-teller, and carry this"—that is, we suppose, the confusion of truth and falsehood—"on for another thousand years."

This is the main and the most characteristic feature of Dr. Stanley's speech, but one or two other points are remarkable. One of the parallels which he finds between the millenary of Rome and the millenary of University College is that "some thought, and this suspicion was not ill-founded, that Philip was a Christian in disguise." Who was the Christian in disguise at the University millenary we are not told. The only guess we can make is that, as Mr. Morgan later in the evening referred to Lord Westbury as an ornament, if not of the College, at least of the University, that eminent Christian may have been present in disguise at the dinner. But there is another part of Dr. Stanley's speech which is more remarkable still, and which we cannot help thinking must by some fault of the printer have wandered out of the speech of Mr. Lowe. Dr. Stanley is made to complain that Philip's millenary "was even on a more magnificent scale than" that of University College; "many elephants and elks came; and there was even one hippopotamus and one rhinoceros." Whether this is rightly reported we know not; as the words stand in the Times, any one would think that at all events the elephants and the elks, if not the hippopotamus and the rhinoceros, came as invited guests, at a time when, as the speaker goes on to say, "all classes feasted and enjoyed themselves for three nights and three days." We fear, however, that the truth of the case will hardly bear out this view with regard to the classes of elephants and of elks, to say nothing of such unclassified personages as the hippopotamus and the rhinoceros. We fear that they were there for quite another purpose, and this is what makes us think that this part of the speech must really belong to Mr. Lowe, and not to Dr. Stanley. The speaker, as his speech is reported, evidently regrets the absence from the University millenary of the elephants, elks, and other huge beasts which had their part in the Roman millenary. Now we cannot for a moment suspect Dr. Stanley of any hankering after the bloody scenes of the amphitheatre, but a delight in them would be quite consistent with the avowed sentiments of Mr. Lowe. Nothing, as we know, causes such admiration to the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a good railway accident which kills many more people than the paltry slaughter of Marathon. It would then be quite in character with Mr. Lowe to regret that elephants and elks, a hippopotamus and a rhinoceros, could not be butchered to make an Oxford holiday. But that any such sentiment fell from the lips of the Dean of Westminster we cannot lightly believe.

The reported speech of Mr. Lowe is such mere chaff and buffoonery that it does not call for any serious criticism. But we may remark that he keeps quite clear of the ticklish points which his appearance in the University he has so egregiously misrepresented could hardly fail to suggest to every mind. His great point seems to be to make a joke of the argument that no College at Oxford could have been founded by Alfred in 872 because in that year Oxford formed no part of Alfred's dominions. It is, Mr. Lowe tells us, easy for a man to give away that which is not his own. Does Mr. Lowe find it so? Does he find that his control over the revenues of the United Kingdom gives him any control over the revenues of France or Russia? Mr. Lowe had better come forward and prove his own point by founding a college on some other man's land, at some other man's expense—a college in which, instead of such antiquated subjects as Greek and Latin and Geometry, the Discipline Mathematica and Physica shall take the form of the art of getting up good railway accidents, and the Littera Humaniora shall consist of the ideal theory of history as set forth by Dr. Stanley.

The other speeches do not call for much notice. The Master, Mr. Bradley, takes care not to commit himself to any belief in the Alfred fable. It is enough for him that the judgment of a Court of law has decided that the College is a royal foundation, and he rejoices in the practical advantages which the College gains by being so. This is all likely enough, but it has nothing to do with the matter. There are plenty of foundations to which no king really gave anything, which by a fiction of law have been declared to be royal foundations. If legal fictions of this kind are to be accepted as historical evidence, historians may as well give up their business altogether. Dr. Stanley of course catches with delight at the hint of the Master. Dr. Stanley, if he is consistent, must believe that all the victims of Henry the Eighth were guilty because courts of justice and Acts of Attainder declared them guilty. He must believe that all the abbots of the greater monasteries surrendered of their own free will, and he must believe that all the doings of Henry were done "of his most excellent goodness," because both assertions are to be found in the preambles of Acts of Parliament. But of course, when a man has once come to look on truth and falsehood as things indifferent, and to judge of history and legend by an "ideal" standard, he may get to believe this or anything else. He may even come to believe with Mr. C. S. Parker that "King Alfred hanged three Judges and thirty-four magistrates for corruption." We remember that there is some late legend of the kind, a legend which Mr. Kemble once refers to with that supremest form of contempt which consists in taking it as the standard of his contempt for some other story. But we should really like to know what are Mr. Parker's ideas of Judges and magistrates in the time of Alfred. Can he tell us the exact form of the Commission of the Peace, and whether their clerks were paid by fees or by salaries?

The thing is now over; those who had a hand in it will perhaps be glad that it should be forgotten as soon as may be. One thing is significant. We see no mention of the presence, we see no allusion to the absence, of those members of University College who have earned a real right to be listened to on matters of history. Dr. Stanley's ideal talk may perhaps by this time have awakened some little laughter in Yorkshire and North America. As for those who did keep the feast, we know not what their carnal repast consisted of, but we gather from Dr. Stanley's speech that at least they did not feast on elk and hippopotamus. As for the more ethereal part of the entertainment, we can only say that it reminds us of the diet spoken of by the prophet when he complains that Ephraim feedeth on wind.

THE LONDON SEASON.

NO one who happens to be in Hyde Park at six o'clock in the afternoon will venture to say that the material signs of prosperity have decreased in this country. Four, or perhaps five, lines of carriages touching one another stretch for more than a mile along the road, each containing two or more occupants whose dresses, whose servants, and whose horses represent an enormous amount of labour and expense. If they do not convey the impression of culture, they certainly convey the impression of wealth. The spectator may imagine himself to be in the chief city of Utopia, until he remembers that in that State there were no idle persons nor any occupied about unprofitable exercises, and that the dress of the citizens consisted of leather or skins which would last seven years. Though this can hardly be predicated of the over-dressed women who display their riches as they stare vacantly around them between Prince's and Stanhope Gate, yet the spectacle is a most gratifying one to the national vanity. Surely we may exclaim with triumph, "Thank God, we have got rid of the poor at last, and poor relations, and all the disagreeable incumbrances which wearied our forefathers, diminished their incomes, and doubtless shortened their lives. We have nothing to legislate for except these lines of carriages, and who can doubt for one moment that these heaps of muslin ought to have the franchise as soon as possible, and bring their information to bear upon the proceedings of Parliament?" Society is, it would seem, a concourse of beings who are able to spend at least five thousand pounds a year upon themselves, and are only kept in subjection by hearing that one amongst their number has left three hundred and twenty thousand a year to his heir. The chief difficulty they have to contend against is that of spending their incomes, and millionaires plaintively lament that they do not know how to get rid of their money. Who does not feel sympathy for them in their troubles? Many of them have found themselves suddenly in their new position through successful speculation; after investing in a moor, a yacht, one or two houses, new furniture, and the refuse of the Academy, they can think of nothing further. Fortunately for them, circumstances over which they have no control enable them to spend a little more money than they might otherwise find it possible to get through. The rise in the price of labour, the short hours' movement, and other causes operate in their favour. All the commonest requirements of life will soon become luxuries, and a mutton-chop will be as great a dainty as an ortolan. Everybody is determined to live as his neighbour lives—gives the same superfluity of sweetbread, drinks the same wines, assumes the same importance, practices the same vulgarities. If a thing can only be done simply, unostentatiously, let it not be done at all. Unless the semi-detached house spends as much money as the detached house, the street as the square, the mews as the street, let there be no entertainments. The object with which people are collected together is not their own pleasure, but the gratification of the vanity of the host. When we are told one day that the flowers at this or that hall have cost a thousand pounds, that turtle-soup was given at this or that supper, we recognise the efficacy of such an advertisement, and wonder how it is that we have not always required such concessions to our palates and our noses. Why should we not raise the standard still higher, and insist that all persons whose grandfathers "disappeared about the time of the assizes" should give us cucumbers stuffed with pearls at their balls? Perhaps we are on the eve of the discovery of another source, which in all probability will require enormous sums of money for its gratification. If any stray poor are left among us at the present moment, they must certainly disappear in a few years.

We believe that London was never so full as it has been during this month. In the seventeenth century, if not later, it was so rare for a country gentleman to come to London that, when he did come, he used to make his will before he set out. In Pepys's Memoirs a saying is quoted to the effect that in proportion to its distance from the capital was the duration of a family, and that "the old rule was that a family might remain fifty miles from London a hundred years, a hundred miles from London two hundred years, and so further or nearer London more or less years." If this rule holds good, all our county families ought to disappear in a few decades. The representative system is a farce. Constituents themselves represent the constituency; members groan over the perpetual presence of their electors; they are at their elbows in the lobby, in Piccadilly, in their own houses, and ask for orders for the House of Commons as if they had a share in the Government. The fusion of classes which wealth and the railways render possible is delightful, and is nowhere better exemplified than at an evening party. The Black Hole at Calcutta is the only parallel which suggests itself to the intelligent mind. In old times the back staircase might safely be counted upon as a means of exit, but education and the diffusion of knowledge through the press have opened the eyes of the masses to its usefulness. Front and back staircase are alike in being both wholly impassable. No one can get up, no one can get down. There are five breathing, perspiring human beings of both sexes in one square yard of space; there is only just room enough to keep their respective heads apart. One of the heads regrets that she did not allow one more week to elapse after the burial of her sister before she went out, and thinks of her new black gown with tears in her eyes. Another has just given a ball, and finds herself in close proximity to an old friend of her own and her husband's, with whom she has stayed for weeks in the country before her marriage, whose daughters she did not ask, and whom it has been her one object to avoid during the evening. There is no movement, only cackle, which ascends in clouds, and which, let us hope, never returns to earth in any other form again. The country neighbours fresh from the plough have the best of it, while the dyspeptic legislator, enervated by voting for Bills which at heart he detests, collapses. The guests groan and puff and snort; should an opportunity present itself at the expiration of half-an-hour, a woman implores some man near her to tear off the trimming which has wound itself round two people in the next room, a chair, and an attaché. The lover who has come to meet the object of his love makes despairing faces at her separated by an interval of seven yards, a lead which after an hour's diligent chase he is only able to decrease by a few feet; and when at length he gains the staircase he just catches sight of her as she leaves the cloak-room with torn dress and heightened complexion. Thus is their tender gabble postponed, and their happiness relegated to the morrow's ball. Such are the consequences of return tickets and express trains. Rooms must be full and parks crowded, for no one has anything to do. Man never is, but always to be, occupied. This little boy may be in the army or the tea trade, a fashionable stockbroker or wine merchant, a Government clerk or an hereditary legislator; whatever may be his duties, wherever may be his headquarters, the City or Aldershot, the Commons or the Lords, his time seems always to be at the disposal of his friends. On the preceding day he may have furnished an acquaintance with poisonous liquids, to-morrow there may be a field-day or a debate, but for seven days in the week he has nothing to do with himself. Idleness and wealth are natural concomitants of one another.

Unfortunately, delicacy of mind and refinement of feeling are not promoted by the diffusion of riches, and it is sad to think that turtle soup does not necessarily imply high breeding. Nothing now can be too coarse for an English audience, and the shouts of applause which greet a novelty in indecent gestures or meanings which no one can call double, show what we may expect in the future. What the club is to men, the theatre is to many women. Is a thing indecent? asks a section of the upper classes; it is; then we will go and see it, they exclaim with one consent. In the seventeenth century the English enjoyed the reputation of blushing, a reproach which no one would cast in the face of their descendants. Those mysterious laws which govern the actions of a Lord Chamberlain have permitted a French piece to be acted during the past week which in gross indecency has not been equalled for many years. There are two points in it at which the occupants of the stalls scream with delight, at the recital of which no English gentlewoman ought to be present, much less amused. We have no hesitation in saying that a woman who takes pleasure in the representation of a piece such as Madame attend Monsieur cannot desire to get credit for modesty, if indeed she has not lost it. At this rate the reproduction of the Country Wife and the Custom of the Country will be called for by the playgoing public with one accord, and interludes will be given during which selected passages from Brantôme and Casti will be read aloud. All we can hope for is, that the sexes will have separate days appointed to them for the hearing. No comments of censure in the meantime are made, and one might fancy, when one reads in the newspaper that the public "takes a sort of critical and self-abandoning pleasure" in what is going on, that they were doing something for which the country ought to be very grateful. Conjugal fidelity is one of the bases of the present constitution of society, and it has as yet been thought fitting to allow some of the relations between the two sexes to remain a little disguised. Of course this may be a great mistake, but until we have found something to take its place, we might give it a further trial, and not adopt La Rochefoucauld's maxim that "il y a peu d'honnêtes femmes qui ne soient lasses de leur métier." The astonishing thing is that the excuse made for all these people who flock to a morning performance where the most prurient pieces are to be played is that they do not understand it. What a girl of the present day does or does not comprehend is a question which we have no wish to enter into. Everything is conceded to her impenetrable stupidity, and her friends and relations talk of her in much the same language as Montesquieu used in the very short chapter devoted to this subject in the Esprit des Loix. "Les filles," says that writer, "ont un esprit qui n'ose penser, un cœur qui n'ose sentir, des yeux qui n'osent voir, des oreilles qui n'osent entendre, et ne se présentent que pour se montrer stupides." Were this flattering description a true one, they might undoubtedly be permitted to go anywhere with perfect impunity. As it is, we are only struck by the extreme openness of their eyes, and the acute sense of hearing possessed by their ears. It may be said that only an infinitesimal fraction ever go to see these French vulgarities. This may be true, though we decline to vouch for it, but their mothers and their married sisters go, and can only be the worse for what they have seen and heard. One would really think that the object of marriage was to enable women to see indecent comedies, read indecent books, and discuss indecent topics, and that the emancipation of girlhood consisted in this privilege. If a woman does not regret that she has sat through Madame attend Monsieur, we can only pity her; she may be expected to order tickets for the best places in the Park whenever the modern Phryne, accompanied by the acclamations of a plutocratic capital, descends into the Serpentine in honour of her mistress Venus.

THE NATIONAL SCHOOLMASTER.

THE great change which is passing over our system of national education must soon bring about a corresponding change in the position of our schoolmasters. Their numbers will be greatly increased, their stipend raised, their social status improved. If, as has been calculated, the number of children which a compulsory use of the powers of School Boards is likely to bring under teaching will require some eighty thousand teachers, it is plain that the present staff is absurdly inadequate to such a demand. Already managers are complaining of the difficulty of procuring masters, and of the increased stipends which masters require. But increase of pay is only one of the requirements which are now being energetically put forward by the class of teachers themselves. Social recognition, greater freedom of action in their work, a more public position, and deliverance from the servitude in which they at present stand either to the clergyman or the school committee, some scale of graduated promotion according to merit, and of pensions in illness or old age, are claims which have long been cherished by the body of schoolmasters, and which are now being boldly advanced in their congresses. In the main we hold these claims to be just. The position of the schoolmaster has long been a blot upon our educational system, and that it has not long ago attracted public attention is due simply to the forbearance, perhaps to the timidity, of the schoolmasters themselves. Nothing could be more ridiculous than the contrast between the hopes with which the young teacher leaves his Training College and the actual work in which he finds himself engaged. Not only has his college training been of a high order, but he has been taught to regard himself as engaged on labour which ranks next to that of the clergy itself in usefulness and dignity. But no sooner has his training been completed than he finds nine-tenths of it thrown away, his work that of a drudge, his social position hardly higher than that of the church beadle. We are not blind to the advantages of the Denominational system, but its actual result in the case of the schoolmaster has been to deprive him of any public status, and to reduce him to a mere dependant of the parson's. Theoretically, he is the servant of the school committee; practically, the school committee consists of the clergyman alone, and it is to the clergyman only that the schoolmaster in ninety cases out of a hundred feels himself responsible. In what is called a well-organized parish he generally ranks a little below the Scripture-reader, and a little above the district nurse. If he is in a country school, he is expected to play the harmonium whenever the rector's daughter has a headache, and to make himself useful at the penny reading or in putting up the decorations on high festivals. If he has a fair voice, he is assigned his place in the choir, and in any case he is bound to train the children in their hymn singing, and to see them to church. He is not so much the National schoolmaster as the Church schoolmaster, and it is only by overlooking his actual position that we can fairly estimate the "dismaying grievance" of which we heard so much a little time ago. In some ways, no doubt, the position has its advantages; the rector is generally the only person of any education in a country parish, and intercourse with him, or dependence on him, is likely to be less galling to the schoolmaster than the society or control of squires or farmers. But the relation is, after all, a false one, and, like all false relations, it tells badly both on the clergy and the teachers. The parson is tempted to regard his schoolmaster simply in a parochial light, to meddle and muddle with the instruction from a religious point of view, to use the school, in short, as a sheer piece of parish machinery. The master has to collect statistics of the number of unbaptized children among his scholars, to report sick cases among their parents, to pick out fit subjects for confirmation, to press the claims of the Sunday-school, and to report the general tittle-tattle of the village to his spiritual lord. The result is simply that he is regarded as a mere hanger-on of the parson, and that he has no social position at all. One of the most common, as it is the most bitterly felt, among the complaints of the schoolmasters is the complaint of social isolation. Their education has raised them high above the society of the poor, while the middle classes, the farmer, or the tradesman, look down on them as they would look down on a pew-opener. Another result is that the master is regarded as a mere servant, without authority even in his own school. The angry mother who thinks Johnny backward in his "summing" runs off to make her protest, not to the teacher, but to the parson. The youngest curate assumes a tone of lofty superiority to the schoolmaster in the very presence of his class. His position is robbed in a thousand ways of all dignity, and the young enthusiast who has started from the Training College with the Life of Arnold in his pocket finds himself the more powerless and least regarded member of a parochial staff.

Nor is his work likely to meet those dreams of a teacher's vocation which the young master may have cherished. Even in its highest form education has a terrible monotony, but there is something crushing in the monotony of a National School. The children are for the most part removed before much intelligent teaching can have been imparted to them. The actual course of instruction has been stripped of all the more entertaining subjects, such as history or geography, in which a master could give the rein to his ingenuity, and restricted to the simplest elements. The inadequacy of his staff, the frequent mixture of children of widely different ages, the poverty of the school apparatus, are all so many obstacles in the way of original teaching. The slightest deviation, in fact, from the usual routine is regarded with jealousy by the school committee as likely to imperil their proceeds from the coming examination, and is frowned down upon by the parents. His religious instruction, on which the teacher has counted for the "moral influence" of which he heard so much at the Training College, resolves itself into listening to a drowsily chanted catechism, or standing by the side of a boggling curate as he turns in for his weekly "religious lesson to the school." Even the Bible teaching has to drop into a weary detail of the wanderings in the Desert or the number of the parables. Mr. Matthew Arnold has just made a gallant attempt to rescue the Bible from such handling as this by publishing the later chapters of Isaiah as a school handbook, with notes which are admirably adapted to bring out the literary and poetic excellences of the Hebrew prophet. But, whatever may be the fate of such an experiment in the future, it is hopeless as things go now. Most of the clergy would summarily forbid the use of a book which treated the Bible in a literary light at all; and, even irrespectively of this difficulty, there is the difficulty of examination which will always drive managers back on the easier test of such questions and answers as may be found in a "Scripture analysis." The most terrible obstacle, of course, to any higher teaching on the master's part lies in the irregularity of attendance, which renders progress among the bulk of his scholars almost inconceivably slow. Harvest-tide and crow-keeping in the country, running errands, and nursing the little ones in town, make the master's work, as it is conducted nowadays, a mere struggle against fate. He knows that, of the children who leave his school and figure in national statistics as educated, nine-tenths are unable to read with ease, and in the long run will soon cease to read at all. It is this consciousness of "grinding the wind," of the uselessness of their work, which tells most upon the spirit and energy of the National schoolmasters. Any admixture of boys of a higher class, such as is common enough in America, would enable them to face the general inertia of the rest. But the odd system which, by exacting an inadequate school fee, stamps our poor schools with the pauper stamp, while it prevents them from being free and on equal to all, has made the smallest tradesman anxious to raise his children at least above the level of the National School.

The very atmosphere of the school, too, is depressing. Even the best of our modern school-buildings are nothing but long, narrow, white-washed galleries, like the corridors of a workhouse, with bareness and monotony in their aspect. In towns playgrounds are almost impossible, and the long school hours without interruption bring about their inevitable air of dullness and exhaustion in both teacher and taught. The American resources of play-rooms and gymnastics would tax too heavily, as things go nowadays, the resources of English managers. The master, indeed, has hardly time to devote to planning resources of this kind, even if he had the energy. School is no sooner over for the children than he has his work with the pupil-teachers. His evenings are often enough spent in sifting out an inadequate stipend by making up the accounts of some neighbouring tradesman. These are the conditions to be furnished for the ensuing examination, reports to be prepared for the school committee, perhaps a night school to drain the last remnant of attention and strength. And beyond all this there are the daily anxieties of a position dependant on the caprice of a few irresponsible persons. The one dread of the master is his dread of the "month's warning" which will send him out again without a penny in the world. He is anxious about the falling off in the school subscriptions, or the deficiency of the scholars' pence. Discipline becomes feeble lest complaints should make a bad impression at the vicarage. The school remains ill-lighted and ill-ventilated because the school committee would be worried to find money for repairs, and a worried school committee generally exhausts its worry on the schoolmaster. But the most terrible dread of all is the dread of the annual school inspection. That inspection, as it is conducted at present, works badly on the teachers themselves is plain enough from the fact, which every clergyman of experience will verify, that the best masters dread the coming of the inspectors with even more anxiety than the worst. In too many cases these gentlemen seem to regard themselves as bound to be as fussy and disagreeable as possible. Some of them treat the schoolmaster in the face of his boys as a decent man would hardly treat a dog. As a rule their ultimate verdict is fair enough, but it is often got at by an amount of teasing and bullying which reduces the children to blank idiocy and their teacher to despair. The master is forced to look on while his best boys are reduced to stupefaction by rapid questions delivered in the tone of a drill sergeant, and to know that he will be snubbed for a single suggestion or for a whisper of encouragement. All the faults of defective apparatus or insufficient light are laid at his door, though he has prayed in vain for the one and protested in vain against the other. He knows that a word of censure on the back of his certificate will reduce him to ruin, but he is generally left to the very close of the examination to learn that all this scolding and ill-temper on the inspector's part is only official routine, and that he need have been in no trouble at all. The few words of scanty praise at the close hardly atone for the months of dread and the day of agony which make up a school inspection.

That the change in the general system of English education must be accompanied by a change in the condition of the schoolmaster is plain enough. Half of his troubles spring from the inadequacy of his pay, and one of the first results of the establishment of School Boards has been a rise from the 80*l.* with a house, which was considered fair pay for a town master, to a somewhat higher figure. The question of stipend may fairly be left to the operation of the law of supply and demand, but the question of pensions is one which can only be dealt with by the Education Office. It is plain, however, that if teaching is to be regarded as a permanent profession, some system of pensions is absolutely necessary, and that the chief obstacle to any real improvement in the condition of the teaching class arises from a want of this sense of permanence. A really first-rate master is forced by sheer necessity to be continually seeking to quill his post and to avail himself of the distinction he may have gained to establish some middle-class school, or to enter into some business which will enable him to provide for old age. We may fairly look upon a graduated arrangement of schools as likely to supersede the present purely isolated system, a system which is as wasteful as it is educationally absurd. Such an arrangement would provide for the promotion of masters by merit from the lower to the higher posts in their profession. A prospect of promotion would not only infuse hope into the class as a whole, but would open to the intelligent master the chance of a position where his intelligence would at last find some scope for itself in public instruction. His dependence on the clergy, and his false relation to the Church, will gradually cease as the establishment of School Boards places education on a national basis. Even the poorest rural parish will profit when it finds in the parson and the schoolmaster two centres of intelligence and culture instead of one, nor is there the least necessity that the relation of the two should be hostile, because their position is distinct. With the rise of income and the attainment of independence will come a far higher social recognition of the schoolmaster's value, and a cessation of the isolation which is at present the most painful feature in his lot. A wise School Board will probably learn to regard the master less as their servant and more as a coadjutor and adviser in the general development of the school. Already there are signs that the new impulses given to education is likely to break down the narrow bounds within which teaching has been confined. The introduction of music and drawing has already relieved the monotony of the master's work, and if the visions of the London School Board are realized, we may hear of lessons in political economy, in history, and in the common laws of health. The inevitable spread of compulsory attendance will remove the chief obstacles which at present fetter the work of instruction, while the abolition of school fees will probably bring about a greater fusion of classes in the schools, and raise in a remarkable way the moral and intellectual tone of the mass of scholars. The difficulties, in fact, which have so long hung about the path of our teachers seem likely to vanish in a quiet and easy way. We believe, from our knowledge of the class, that the result will be a very encouraging one, and that half the new impulses which we may look for in English education will be owing to the new hope and sense of self-respect which the present changes are certain to infuse into the National schoolmaster.

THE RIGHT OF VETO IN PAPAL CONCLAVES.

A GOOD deal has been said lately of rumoured negotiations among the great Powers of the Continent as to the influence to be exercised over the next Papal election. Some German papers have gone so far as to suggest that the rights anciently enjoyed by the "Holy Roman Empire" have now passed by inheritance to the German Empire; to which the Ultramontane Voeu de la Terre replies, not without some force, that "the Holy Roman Empire has been dead for sixty-six years, and left no heir, and that the new Prussian Empire has about as much to do with it as Victor Emmanuel with Odessa." The same journal adds that the power of exclusion allowed to France, Spain, and Austria was not a right, but a mere friendly concession, which may at any moment be recalled, and ought to be recalled when those States have ceased to be protectors of the Catholic Church, and only tolerate it, as they tolerate Anabaptists, Jews, or Quakers. Still less can any such privilege be claimed for a Protestant Power like Prussia, which is actually engaged in persecuting the Church. Meanwhile an anonymous pamphlet on the subject has appeared at Munich, or rather has been distributed in diplomatic circles, for it seems not to have been regularly published. Only a hundred copies are in print, and the writer's name, as well as the party he represents, is matter of dispute. But it has been criticised in several Italian journals, and the alleged intention of the Curia to refuse the right of veto in the next Conclave given an additional interest to the subject. The motto of the pamphlet, which is taken from De Maistre, rather points to an Ultramontane authorship. "Ily a une grande erreur dans la cour de Rome. Sa Sainteté se croit souverain, puis pape. C'est tout le contraire." But the contents would hardly bear out this supposition. It does not look like the work of a theologian or a journalist, and the splendid get-up, for it is quite an édition de luxe, suggests an official origin.

The question is treated historically, and the author begins by pointing out from how early a date first the Greeks and then the Germans came to interfere in the election of the Pope, though their right to do so was, naturally, recognized or contested, as the case might be, according to circumstances. We may add, however, that never before the eleventh century was the notion entertained of making the election independent of the civil authority, still less of lodging the exclusive right in the hands of a select body of ecclesiastics. It was after the Emperor Henry III. had deposed one Pope and nominated several that Hildebrand, the restorer and second founder of the Papacy, induced Nicholas II., whose election he had himself brought about, to issue the Bull which may be said to constitute the Magna Charta of the Sacred College, who are thereby created an ecclesiastical Senate, and entrusted with the sole exercise of the franchise, which they had formerly shared with the clergy and people of Rome. The Bull declares the right to belong first to the Cardinal Bishops, then to the Cardinal Clerks, and leaves to the clergy and people only the office of acquiescing in their choice. The Romans are consoled by a rather vague provision that the Pope should be chosen by preference from the bosom of the Roman Church, and a clause was inserted, "saving the honour and reverence due to our beloved son Henry (Henry IV., who was a child at the time), at present king, and who with God's favour, it may be hoped, will become Emperor, as also to his successors, who may have personally acquired this right from the Apostolic See." This proviso, intended to soothe the pride of the Emperor, was often afterwards appealed to in contests between the Papacy and the Crown, and Gfrörer has even fallen into the strange mistake of supposing it to be the origin of the veto afterwards exercised by certain Catholic Powers. The next great change was accomplished more than a century later, by Alexander III., but it is not quite accurately described in the pamphlet as a withdrawal of the rights—shadowy as such rights already were—of the people and the Emperor, Alexander was elected by a bare majority in a very stormy Conclave, and his long reign was embittered by the rivalry of three successive anti-Popes. The decree he promulgated at the third Lateran Council, and which has remained in force ever since, was to provide that no election should be valid without a majority of two-thirds of the Cardinals present. At that time, as the author observes, the Papacy was in the ascendant, but a matter of such importance for the States of Europe as the election of a Pope was not likely to be left in the hands of ecclesiastics to settle as they pleased; and both the Emperors and the Kings of France found means of exercising an indirect influence through Cardinals attached to their interests. And thus very gradually grew up that right of exclusion, which was at first exercised in various ways, but came in course of time to assume definite form and obtain formal recognition, though resting on no written law. It was strictly confined to the Crowns of Spain, France, and Germany; Venice, Tuscany, and Portugal have claimed it, but the claim has never been allowed. Philip II. wished for a right, not of exclusion, but of nomination, which was of course refused. It is impossible to define when the veto was first officially recognized, but in 1644 the confessors of the Conclave declared the Cardinals to be bound by it. It was formally exercised by Austria in 1823 against Cardinal Severoli, and, for the last time, in 1831 by Spain against Cardinal Giustiniani, who had been Nuncio at Madrid, and who took the disappointment so keenly to heart that he was attacked with fever in consequence. But Austria, which was most directly interested in the matter from her large Italian possessions, favoured the election of Pius VIII., while that of Leo X. was the work of the Italian party, the French Cardinals who had been directed to exclude him having been outwitted by a surprise; for the veto can only be exercised once, and only before the final election. Closely connected, we may add, with this right of veto are the election manoeuvres with which the annals of Conclaves are filled, through the plots of Cardinals to bring about some preconcerted result. The commonest of these tricks—so common, indeed, as to be almost an established custom—is the naming of sham candidates by rival sections, generally with a view of eliciting the veto which would otherwise have been reserved for the candidate they really desire to elect, but which, once exercised, cannot be repeated. For the names of those Cardinals whom it wishes to exclude are always confided by each Court to some member of the Sacred College on whose fidelity it can rely, and who is to use his discretion in applying the veto at the right moment. But as every Cardinal takes an oath to vote for that candidate whom in his conscience he deems the worthiest, the question has been gravely discussed by canonists whether it is lawful for them, as a matter of strategical manoeuvring, to vote for a candidate whose election they do not intend or approve. Lawful or not, however, there can be no doubt of the ordinary practice.

To return to the Munich pamphlet. After discussing the historical question, the author turns in conclusion to the approaching Conclave which will follow on the death of Pío Nono. He remarks on the long and eventful reign of the present Pope, and on the fact of Italy, by following in the path he himself pointed out in the earlier days of his pontificate, having become a great nation. "What an Italian Pope began, an Italian prince has completed." It is difficult to determine how much there is of earnestness and how much of occult irony in the following paragraph, which speaks of the Pope's present attitude, and his firm resistance to the seductive whispers of a party which hates Italy and all legitimate progress of the human mind, as having gained for him universal respect. Freed from the cares of State, "which hindered his divine mission without increasing his authority," he is said to rule the Church in complete independence. He is further said—on what evidence appears not, and he publicly asserted less than a week ago "that all guarantees are illusory"—to be fully convinced that the guarantees which the civil Powers would readily give afford a far surer protection to the Church than the defunct temporal power, which was weak at best, and so often became the prey of foreign armies. If Pius IX. would but yield to the instincts of his great heart, and reconcile himself with the Kingdom of Italy, how great would be the advantage for the Church and for the world! But if not, he will at least have lightened the task for his successor. The closing words of the pamphlet we will give as they stand:—

It will be for Italy a great and solemn moment when the Cardinals meet to elect a successor to Pius IX. She might perhaps feel tempted to desire to exercise the same influence on the Conclave as has been exercised for centuries past by the other great Catholic Powers. But Italy will refrain from that. Such a procedure would be inconsistent with the principle so often proclaimed of "a free Church in a free State"; and it would meet with most determined resistance, although the same rights belong to her, as a Catholic Power, as to Spain, France, and Austria. On the other hand, Italy will exert a great moral influence over the Cardinals, most of whom are her sons; all the surroundings of place and time will remind them of their duty to their fatherland. They will have to consider whether it would not be better to establish an honourable peace, rich in blessings, than to be perpetually recurring to claims hopelessly forfeited; in a word they will have to remember that it is their mission to complete what Pius IX. has begun. Nor will the other Catholic Governments put any pressure on the Conclave; it is their interest, too, that the Papacy should be reconciled with Italy, and this exhausting struggle cease. Nor have they any longer their old interest in excluding each other's candidates, and turning the election, in which they take the liveliest part, into a wild game of intrigues. And, moreover, inasmuch as they have more or less followed the tendency of the age towards the separation of Church and State, they too have lost their legitimate title to take part in the Conclave. Pius IX. has set his seal on this altered condition of things by reversing the unbroken precedent of all former centuries in not inviting the Governments to the Council. Thus the election will be free, and therefore full of blessing. If once the Pope is again wholly devoted to his lofty mission of leading men's hearts with wisdom and knowledge through example and self-sacrifice, he will have no more enemies, while as the true representative of Christ, he inscribes on his banner the evangelical words, pardon and love.

The significance of these utterances depends of course on whether they emanate, as is rather suspected, from some shrewd member of the Curia who wishes to give a plausible character to its pretensions, or from a bona fide Liberal Catholic and friend of Italy, who earnestly desires peace, and has formed a brilliant ideal in his own mind of the probable results of a separation of Church and State. Whether the three Great Powers who have a prescriptive right to the veto will care to claim it in the next Conclave, or prefer to trust to other means of exerting such influence as they may wish to use in the selection of a new Pope, it would be unsafe to predict. But while France stands aloof, and Austria and Spain, under constitutional Governments, are committed to what the Court of Rome regards as a policy of persecution, there is every reason to expect that the claim, if it is made, will be contested. It will be open of course to the Catholic Governments to decline to acknowledge a pontiff elected without their concurrence, and two or three centuries ago, or perhaps later, such would have been their natural course. But the age of anti-Popes is past, and the Conclave, whether acting with or without the official intervention of secular Powers, can hardly fail to appreciate the unwisdom of perpetuating a non possumus attitude from which the Papacy has nothing to gain and may have much to lose.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS.

IT is difficult to see why the pressure of Parliamentary business should hinder the Government from having an opinion. The expediency in the abstract of appointing public prosecutors is almost universally admitted, and the practical obstacles to such appointments may be discovered and their importance may be estimated by any intelligent person who will carefully investigate the subject. Much of the business of the Home Office and other departments of Government might be transacted by common sense and industry, but it is possible that the entire available stock of these qualities has been expended by the Foreign Office upon the conduct of the Alabama negotiations. The department over which Mr. Bruce presides can do nothing itself, and can say nothing effectual about that which is proposed to be done by others. It would have been incredible, unless a report of the speech had actually appeared, that Mr. Winterbotham could invite the House of Commons to assume the efficiency of central control over prosecutions, because in about ten years the expense of them has been taxed down to one-third of their former amount. Everybody except Mr. Winterbotham must be aware that this control is only efficient in the same sense in which the word might be applied to the check which is maintained upon the expenditure of the army or navy. There is profusion when there should be thrift, and vice versa. If Mr. Cardwell were to take credit for expending less money upon gunpowder than his predecessors, even the Treasury Bench could hardly avoid having a vague impression that a colleague was talking nonsense. It might have been expected that Mr. Winterbotham would make an effort to talk rationally even in the House of Commons on a Wednesday. As for Mr. Bruce, he is, as might be expected at this season of the year, "entirely in the hands of the House," in reference to this as well as every other question. The great heat of the weather has perhaps prevented him from forming or retaining an opinion. If the House desired to proceed with the Bill, Mr. Bruce would be "most happy"; and if the House desired not to proceed with the Bill, Mr. Bruce would be "content." It seems, however, that even the continuance of Mr. Bruce in office cannot long delay the appointment of a public prosecutor for London. As regards the provinces, the application of the same principle might be permitted; and probably the experience of one district might guide others. The existing practice is admitted to be unsatisfactory. Cases are taken up which ought to be let alone, and cases are neglected which ought to be taken up. It is true that the parsimony of the Treasury checks some prosecutions, while other prosecutions are stimulated by the expected allowance of expenses. At the last assizes the spectacle was exhibited of the Lord Chief Justice of England trying a charge of obtaining by false pretences horse-bones, of the value of 3s.; and another charge of stealing a crazy little vehicle, such as was used for conveying children before perambulators were invented, and of which the value was declared, perhaps with some audacity, to be 6s. It is possible that Sir Alexander Cockburn may have been as usefully engaged at that time as he is now, and of course if a case is committed for trial immediately before the assizes, the Judge must try it, however trifling may be its character. But when inquiry was made how it happened that so many trumpery cases were brought to these assizes, the answer was suggested, with considerable plausibility, that they came there for the sake of the expenses. It is a change in the dulness of rural life to be brought to the assizes and entertained for a few days, although puny and at the expense of the county. The police, too, are anxious to maintain their characters for vigilance and activity. But although witnesses may be willing or desirous to attend, a prosecution of any difficulty cannot be carried forward without the assistance of an attorney, and it seems to be almost a matter of accident whether that assistance will be provided.

The Treasury allowance does not pay an attorney either to come himself or to send a clerk any distance to an assize town upon a single case. An attorney may happen to have several cases, or he may possibly obtain them by laying himself out for that line of business—in other words, by cultivating friendly relations with police-officers. This, however, a respectable practitioner would hardly do, and it is very undesirable that the conduct of criminal prosecutions should become a branch of what is elegantly termed "enterprise." In some districts the largest number of prosecutions are conducted by the clerk to the magistrates who commit the prisoner for trial. This practice has been strongly condemned by Sir Alexander Cockburn, for reasons which are unanswerable; and if, nevertheless, it is under present circumstances almost necessary, we have got some way towards demonstrating that the appointment of public prosecutors is inevitable. A clerk to magistrates, says the Lord Chief Justice, is the very person who ought to have nothing to do with a prosecution. "It gives him a sinister interest in the prosecutions which he ought not to have, and an indirect motive to get prisoners committed for trial." But if this rule is to be applied, the result will be that some attorney or attorneys of the district must do the business, and they can only do it profitably in the lump. The person most frequently bound over to prosecute is the head of the police, and if he is to choose the attorney who is to be employed, various influences will be used by unscrupulous men to obtain business, while all others will decline it wholly. It is quite consistent with this state of things that several Chairmen of Quarter Sessions declared in the House of Commons that they saw no necessity for public prosecutors in their own counties. Practice is often better than, according to theory, it ought to be.

and there are doubtless many clerks to justices who are utterly incapable of procuring committals with a view to their own emolument. But nevertheless, when the possible evil of this practice has been so forcibly indicated by an eminent Judge, its continued maintenance becomes impossible. The establishment to some extent, and in some form, of public prosecutors could not be long delayed even if Mr. Bruce continued to hold his present office.

It has been remarked that the tendency of modern civilisation is to provide places for barristers of fair ability and industry, of ten or more years' standing, who happen to possess interest with the givers of good things. Whenever public prosecutors are introduced, the truth of this remark is likely to be confirmed: but it is not wonderful that members of Parliament who are not practically familiar with the evil of the present system should hesitate at creating several places to which good salaries must be attached. One Chairman of Quarter Sessions said that within his experience only two cases had occurred in several years where a public prosecutor was really wanted. It may be, however, that this chairman is content, as some of his brethren certainly are, with the system which Sir Alexander Cockburn has denounced. He admits indeed that a public prosecutor ought to be appointed for a large district, so that his services might be invoked "when private individuals do not come forward." But we should say that it was almost better to trust to the clerks of justices than to the capricious and uncertain action of individuals. If the crime is serious, and if the person injured or that person's friends are in the middle or upper class of life, it is expected that the prosecution will be undertaken by them, and this expectation is usually realized. But in light cases, affecting persons in humble life, it comes pretty much to what was stated in reference to the "horse-bones" case at the last Assizes. Good-nature or malevolence, inclination to stick to work or to take holiday may affect the question; and if a prosecution goes forward, it will probably not be conducted by an attorney, unless there happens to be one in the neighbourhood looking out for this sort of business. The presence of such an attorney may or may not be a blessing to a neighbourhood, but it is certainly one of those dispensations of Providence which cannot be relied on. Supposing the appointment of public prosecutors to be indefinitely postponed, a considerable improvement of the present system might be effected by the Bill providing that clerks to justices should be paid by salary instead of by fees for conducting prosecutions. They are in general highly respectable attorneys, who are incapable of knowingly acting upon an unworthy motive, but the imputation of such a motive is almost as bad as its actual existence. If public prosecutors were appointed for London and some other large towns, and if this arrangement of paying justices' clerks by salaries were generally introduced in rural districts, it is possible that the appointment of public prosecutors for these districts might, at any rate for a time, be left optional. It is possible that a "Permissive" Bill might be in this case useful, notwithstanding the discredit which justly attaches to the term. There are happily several counties of England where crime is both rare and slight, although, perhaps, on this side of the Tweed we have hardly yet reached that condition of peace and innocence which must exist in a Scottish burgh where the police force consists of only the superintendent. It is true that the Inspector of Constabulary, who is doubtless regarded by the authorities of this burgh as a troublesome busy-body, has reported that "it is impossible for one man to be an efficient police for both day and night duty without any one to assist him"; but that is only the Inspector's opinion. We observe that the population of this burgh has declined in the last ten years, and it may be that the inhabitants, being compelled to retrench in luxuries, have determined that that of a police force could best be spared. As we have already said, practice is sometimes better than theory shows it ought to be. Even in that English county where prosecutors come forward for the sake of the pleasure and excitement of a trip to the county town, it may at least be said that the same privileges are enjoyed by the defendant. There is, however, no doubt about this—that one public prosecutor ought to be appointed. When the system is in work, we may judge better whether it ought to be extended.

FUNERAL SERMONS.

IT appears that the remains of the late Mr. James Gordon Bennett have been buried with something like public honours at New York, and we shall probably hear that, as in the case of Fisk, the character of this distinguished citizen has been made the subject of some pathetic pulpit eloquence. Meanwhile, the New York Herald has lost no time in preaching a funeral sermon on its own account; and a very characteristic composition it is. The Herald begins by remarking that it is not its province to eulogize the memory of its founder. Leaving that to others, it will simply observe that Mr. Bennett was one of "the sterling benefactors of the human race"; that in establishing the Herald he worked out his ideal of a perfect newspaper "founded upon the principles of truth and justice"; that this great journal has always exercised a healthful influence on the politics and public men of the United States, and has elevated the character of the press; and that in it Mr. Bennett "leaves behind him a monument to his genius and energy which will carry down his name, familiar in their mouths as household words, to future generations." A monumentum generis circumspice is, in fact, the text of the article, or sermon. If you want to understand what a great man Mr. Bennett was, just cast your eyes over this wonderful sheet, over these pages of thrilling leaders and sensational news, these crowded columns of highly-paid and not at all squeamish advertisements, and temper your grief for the departed with the consoling reflection that the best part of him survives in this cheap compendious form, and will be carried on as usual. Put into so many plain words, that is pretty much what the Herald has to say for itself.

Beneath this stone, in hopes of Zion,
There lies the landlord of the Lion.
Resign'd unto the heavenly will,
His son keeps on the business still.

It is assumed that "no one will gainsay the benefits conferred upon mankind by the genius, energy, and liberality of the deceased," and it is needless to remark that these benefits were summed up in the production of the Herald. It will be admitted that, "in the advocacy of novel and comprehensive projects, Mr. Bennett's broad views took no heed of obstacles that to ordinary minds seemed insurmountable," and that nothing could be more "truly independent" than his ideal journal, which never allowed itself to be trammelled by the narrow obligations of political principle, public morality, or even social decency. It used to be said of Brindley, that he thought the rivers were made to feed canals; and Bennett, we are told, attached great importance to steamship lines, railroads, and telegraphs, as "the life-blood of a perfect daily paper." The superiority of the Herald, however, was not unfrequently manifested in its independence, not only of the ordinary channels of information, but even of the course of events. Bennett had one leading principle from which he never deviated. He held that the public, like a spoiled child, must be supplied with whatever it wanted. It wanted news, and if none came to hand in the usual way, something had to be invented. The Herald winds up its homily on its founder with some remarks on his private life, praising his liberality and generosity; and there is no reason to suppose that he did not deserve the loyalty and goodwill of his staff. We have already expressed our opinion very freely with regard to his notorious public career, but it would be strange if there were nothing to be said on the other side. Bennett was singularly simple and abstemious in his personal habits, and he was one of the hardest working men in the world. There is always one side of a man's character which will bear the light, and on which the funeral sermon can expatiate comfortably. The human monster who is despicable or villainous all round is rarely, if ever, to be met with. Some redeeming points can hardly fail to be discerned even in the blackest character, if the point of view is discreetly chosen. In Victor Hugo's Legend of the Ages, when the Eastern Pasha was arraigned in Heaven for the crimes he had committed on earth, the record of pillage and massacre, of villages given up to fire and sword, and peasants oppressed and plundered, was interrupted by the intercession of a little pig from whose back the Pasha had once in wanton humour flicked away some troublesome flies with the thong of his whip. Byron's Corsair had "one virtue and a thousand crimes," and there is always something to be said about the courage of the footpad or the temperance and self-denial of the miser.

It may be said that it is in itself a wholesome and beneficial exercise to study the best side of human nature, and to endeavour to discover and exhibit the good qualities which are usually to be found even in the most unpromising subjects; and this is no doubt true. The only question is as to the propriety of concentrating attention on the good qualities, and putting the bad qualities out of sight. There can be no doubt that the old maxim, that nothing but good should be spoken of the dead, represents a natural and healthy sentiment. In a generous mind there must be a strong disinclination to attack a man who is no longer able to answer for himself. It is felt to be a cheap bravado to assail the dead, while more solemn thoughts also create a reluctance to speak harshly of one who has passed from man's judgment to the great account. The danger is that pity for the sinner is apt to produce leniency towards the sins. The ordinary standards of morality are tampered with and debased when notorious vices or crimes are treated as trivial matters which need not be mentioned, or when an attempt is made to diminish their enormity by showing that even the best of men have their failings, and by suggesting that one or two small and fitful virtues make a handsome set-off against a persistently evil and noxious career. That there are spots in the sun, that certain people are painted blacker than they are, that there is bad in the best of us and good in the worst, are the familiar commonplaces of the funeral sermon when it reaches that point of candour at which any weaknesses or defects on the part of the subject of it are recognized at all; and it seems to us difficult to imagine anything more debilitating and bewildering to the moral sense than this kind of good-natured casuistry. It may be admitted that the moment when a man has just died is not the most fitting time to go out of one's way to rake up old scandals against him, and to direct attention exclusively to the dark features of his character. But, on the other hand, it should not be forgotten that truth has also its rights, and the gratification of a sentimental impulse cannot be accepted as an excuse for palliating villany or holding up a notorious rogue or ruffian to public respect and admiration. It is impossible not to be struck with a certain disposition to whitewash scoundrelism, and to attribute to mania or inadvertence the more horrible forms of crime, which would seem to be one of the least healthy characteristics of modern civilisation. It is beginning to be assumed that the decencies of life require that the possibility of very bad people existing in the world should be systematically ignored, and when anything very bad is done, an immense amount of ingenuity is invariably displayed in showing that it must be due to anything or everything except the badness of the person who did it.

It is obvious that the old de mortuis rule is liable to some abuse, and that it should be applied only within certain limits. In the first place, if it were to be strictly enforced, it would put a stop to a good deal of history. There might be some difficulty in determining in a satisfactory manner how many years or centuries a person should be dead before his personal character and career on earth become a legitimate subject for impartial and outspoken criticism. Looking merely to moral consequences, we should say that it is of more importance that contemporary scoundrels should be painted in their true colours than that strict judgments should be passed on those who may be said to belong to history. There is no reason to suppose that the enthusiasm of a popular historian for the character of Henry VIII. has exercised a baneful influence on the conjugal behaviour of British husbands; but if Henry VIII. had lived in our own day, and had recently figured under disgraceful circumstances in the Divorce Court, there might be some danger lest the attempt to present him in an amiable and pleasing light should encourage imitation and immorality. It is not very often that anybody resolves to shape his course after the example of a remote historical personage. If a model is chosen, it is usually sought in contemporary life. It has been stated that Gordon Bennett was very much influenced in early life by reading the autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, and it is possible that a laudatory narrative of his own career might afford dangerous encouragement to aspiring youth. Funeral sermons are not unknown in this country, but they are happily a branch of clerical enterprise which has hitherto not been much cultivated among us. It would appear that the press has been gradually usurping this function of the pulpit, without much regret or jealousy on the part of the occupants of the latter. If the Burial Hill passes into law, addresses at the grave may be expected to become a familiar form of public amusement, and there is no saying what may be the effect of secular competition on clerical orators. What the lawyers would call the "common form" of funeral sermons is apparently borrowed from the tombstones on which the most angelic qualities are indiscriminately ascribed to anybody whose relatives are able and willing to pay for chiselling the inscription. The epitaph is a conventional mark of respect by which nobody is deceived; but it is not desirable that it should be amplified from the pulpit. On the whole, it would perhaps be well if a little of that charity which is lavished on the dead were reserved for the living. All personal judgments should of course be cautiously framed and temperately expressed; but if it is certain that a man was a rogue while he lived, there is no reason when he dies to pretend that he was a useful and reputable member of society. It may not be necessary to gibbet his memory; if there was nothing flagrant or flaunting in his misdeeds, he may have a claim to silent pity; but if anything is to be said about him, it should be the truth. Within certain limits, the maxim enjoining tenderness for the reputation of the dead is reasonable enough; but it is clear that it is liable to abuse if pushed too far, and that it is not desirable to outrage truth and to perplex and confound the moral sense of society by calling black white and bad good merely because a man has happened to die.

ROAD AND RAIL.

THE "White Horse Cellar," Piccadilly, must have been a melancholy place of late years for the old stage coachman. We can imagine the scene of his former glories having the same touching interest for him as the fallen Column of the Place Vendôme has for a veteran of the Imperial Guard. The genius of the different nations may have paid its tribute to the vanished past in different and characteristic fashion. We know that the worn warriors of France used to deck the railing of the column with immortelles. We do not readily fancy the British coachman yielding ostentatiously to the sentimental vein, or strewing on the dusty pavement the dahlias or peony roses which he would once have placed in the button-hole of his benjamin. It is easier to imagine him turning for consolation to the frothing stout, and burying his sorrow-stricken features in the quart pot. Yet we doubt not that the melancholy of the Briton was more deep-seated than that of the Gaul, especially as practical considerations must have crowded on him along with sentimental ones. The French veteran en retraite might look back regretfully on the career of his youth, as all of us may who find themselves old and failing. But his day had gone by in any case, and his age had landed him at the goal of his earlier hopes. He had his snug quarters in the Invalides, his rations, his wine, and his caporal. He had his old comrades with whom he might chat over the old times, while a rising generation of soldiers was treading in his footsteps, perpetuating the glories of France in the Crimea and Lombardy, in China and Mexico, with more or less success. But collision with the powers of steam had knocked the coachman prematurely off the box which he had filled so long to the admiration of himself and the road. He only picked himself up to find that there was no place for him in a new world which had been so completely revolutionized by scientific invention. His training—we give the word the meaning it bears in the vocabulary of the prize ring—had unfitted him for anything else. When a man lived well and indulged in the strongest malt liquors more than freely, when he regarded foot exercise as a degradation, and seldom exerted himself further than to waddle out of the coachyard or into it, or sway himself up and down from his seat, no doubt he made himself a model coachman, and might command any remuneration in reason from coach-owners who had an eye to the artistic effect of their turn-outs. But on the unlucky day when his coach was run off the road he might as well have kept his seat on the box for any useful purpose he was likely to turn to if he came down. Younger and more active men, rising five-and-forty, we may say, might make the best of a bad bargain, and seek service with the new Companies; but as for our corpulent old conservative friend, even if he could have lowered his dignity to follow their example, the sacrifice would have been useless. Only conceive him puffing along the platform closing the doors of a train in motion, or parodying the agility of an acrobat in leaping into his flying van. Only two callings were open to him. He might keep a "pike" or a public-house, and for the one or the other he needed money or credit. If he could command neither of the two, there was nothing left for him but starvation or recourse to charity. In any case the downfall was a tremendous one, and was scarcely softened by the idea that all the brethren of the whip were in much the same evil plight. His profession was as much a thing of the past as that of the highwaymen, those earlier gentlemen of the road. As he trod the London pavements with his shabby driving coat a world too wide for his sadly diminishing corpulence, his steps would tend instinctively to the vicinity of the "White Horse Cellar."

For many weary years there was nothing to be seen there to aid an imagination that was never one of the lightest in reviving a picture of the past, unless on his way he chanced to refresh his recollections with a glance at the coaching prints in Mr. Fore's windows. But after a time the tough and venerable survivors of the guild must, to their surprise, have found things different. We can conceive the feelings with which the ancient gentleman must have been struck when he first saw the reappearance of what had once been so familiar to him. How he must have rubbed his failing eyes, fancying they had played him false, and doubted whether his morning draught, acting on an enfeebled constitution, had not played a practical joke with his associations! How he may have advanced, with his withered old heart throbbing like a young girl's, speculating as to whether the beauteous vision before him might not vanish from his view! And how he must have reeled under the shock of his conflicting emotions when constrained to confess the coach to be a reality! There was really a coach in wood and metal, just as coaches used to be, only this one was brand new; the panels scarlet, picked out with gold; the name and destination inscribed in golden letters on the hind boot, beneath the spare splinter bars; the fiery-footed team, coquettishly harnessed and ribboned, fretting in their handsome cloths. There was the guard, correct in all the details of white hat, shaggy grey overcoat, and flushed face, balancing himself on the kerb of the pavement, affecting to busy himself with the way-bill. And last, but certainly not least, there stood the coachman gathering up the ribbons, a "tip-top swell," as he was forced to admit, and looking not unlike a workman, although scandalously young and shamefully slim. As we have said, his feelings at the first sight would naturally be of a mingled nature; pleasant surprise and secret undefined hope rising for the moment in the ascendant. Later, when his sluggish thoughts set themselves fairly in motion, the bitter must infallibly have predominated. Those "young swells" playing at coaching were trifling with his most tender feelings, making a mockery of the earnest business of life. Yet thenceforward the old man's life would have an object, and in spite of his sounder judgment, he would again and again return to the spectacle which cost him far more pain than pleasure. Possibly, as he grew more senile, the hope which, as the poet assures us, will ever spring eternal in the human breast, began to freshen in his. For in succeeding summers it was no longer the solitary coach he saw there, and now in this year 1872, as in 1871, no less than three of them make their start from Piccadilly to the soul-stirring music of the horn. He may still be cherishing in his more sanguine moments the innocent faith that the reaction is fairly afoot, that the good old coaching days are destined to return, and that England will be merry England once again.

We need hardly say that we as little desire the consummation on which he sets his heart as we share his faith, if he has any. We grumble at railways, of course, and denounce with exceedingly good reason the way in which the Companies make free with the lives and comfort of their passengers. But, after all, although there is ample room for railway reform, even as railways are, we love them far too well to part with them. They try our temper sorely at times, it is true, but we know no better recipe for placidly bearing our load of railway troubles than thinking of the old coach days. Coaching had its pleasures no doubt. The coaching chapters in Tom Brown's School Days and in Piccadilly are about the pleasantest reading we know anywhere. Our pulses still throb pleasantly to the joyous movement in some of those old coaching prints, where the blood team in the light Highflyer are doing their fifteen miles an hour on the level, or where His Majesty's mail has pulled up in a cloud of steam by the bright hostelry where dinner is awaiting the jovial passengers. But novels of fiction show only the sunny side of the business. It is well worth Mr. Hughes to write enthusiastically of that gloomy side of it, since so dear to every Englishman, when poor young Tom was all sense of feeling in his feet while he shivers on the roof in his single greatcoat in the bitter morning; or for Dickens to warm to the music of the hoofs on the frost-bound road, when the Pickwickians are on their way to spend the Christmas Day with old Wardle. For ourselves, we should have regarded the purgatory we must have shared with Tom as being but indifferently compensated by the delightful coach breakfast that followed it, although that breakfast is one of the most agreeable bits of eating we know anywhere in literature. And we should be much more readily tempted by a mid-winter invitation to the Manor Farm now that we can go down first-class with foot-warmer to Rochester or Maidstone. We can conceive nothing we have nowadays so miserable as that through journey, in the depth of winter, between the English and the Scotch capitals. No amount of box-coats and wrappers could keep up the circulation through the biting night. Ten to one your legs were wedged fast among the cramped limbs of your companions, or possibly one of them was dangling over the side, and for any present sensation in it you might as well have dropped it. Inside matters were perhaps even worse. Who that has tried it can ever forget those thin, hard velvet cushions, the piles of straw that clung to your muddy boots, the straps over-head bulged down with hats and umbrellas, the side-pockets stuffed with bottles and bulky papers of vianda, and the ill-fitting windows that rattled in their panes, the odour of food and spirits, and straw and leather, and damp horsehair. Then you had the stout lady who snored, and the baby who squalled, and the child that paid half-price and fidgeted between you and its parent. Above all, you knew that this slow suffering must be repeated on your return in all its stages. You felt nervously that there was no retreat for you, however acute the suffering might become, for it was a serious matter stopping half-way, under forfeit of your fare, and on the doubtful chance of getting forward later. English coaching was conducted on the principle of saving time, and sacrificing everything to speed, and if we had it back again perhaps we could scarcely improve on the system. Independently of time being money in England, most men like to shorten their misery even at the cost of sharpening it smart. But we paid the penalty in the shape of having to travel in the most cramped and comfortless vehicles in the world. The lumbering diligence was bad enough, but it made pleasanter travelling than the English stage-coach.

If, however, we may congratulate ourselves that coaching is at an end in the way of business, we see no reason why it should not revive as an affair of pleasure. Nothing is more exhilarating than being swept swiftly and smoothly along by a well-matched team cleverly handled, so long as the drive is not prolonged till the first sense of exhilaration stales upon you. Nothing is pleasanter than the roof of a stage-coach when the weather is fine and the scenery pretty. You mount the hills and get the views, instead of vanishing beneath both in screams and stench. There are endless bits of road in England which are far too little known to the tourist, now that steam offers such facilities for hurrying away to distant show-places. There are districts in the home counties quite undulating enough to give zest to the driving, and whose features change sufficiently to please the lover of quiet nature with an endless variety of expression. The roads to Dorking and Tunbridge certainly lie through some lovely landscape. But to holiday seekers from the town, and genuine lovers of the country, the great objection to them is that for a great part of the way you are entangled in the streets and suburbs. We can understand that gentlemen whip like the excitement of piloting their horses through a crush of cabs and waggons, of cutting corners, and shaving oostermongers' barrows. We dare say they do not dislike the foi of a start from Piccadilly at high noon, and a triumphant progress through London thoroughfares. They drive primarily for their pleasure, and we have neither the right nor the wish to quarrel with their choice of road. But we may say that, if others think of imitating their example, we should be glad to see them show their public spirit by choosing more tempting, although more secluded, districts.

LAW OF HUSBAND AND WIFE.

WE enjoy the advantage of having a correspondent who lifts up his testimony unceasingly against all concessions in the direction of what are commonly called Women's Rights. The demand for these concessions is so vehement and persevering that it is a pleasant variety and perhaps a valuable assistance in discussion to hear something on the other side. If our correspondent speaks as forcibly as he writes, it would, we think, add spirit to a controversy which tends to become dreary if he could be invited to maintain at one of Miss Faithfull's soirées the affirmative of the thesis that the Married Woman's Property Act of 1870, besides complicating the law, is sapping the morality of the country. We had formed a tolerably clear opinion that this Act is likely to benefit barristers and attorney, but we had not perceived the injurious effect upon society at large which our correspondent ascribes to it. It gives to women, he says, the privileges of two conditions of life and the liabilities of neither, and it enhances the "injurious effects" of the "separate use system" for establishing which the Court of Chancery has hitherto been supposed to deserve credit. He believes that this system acts as a direct incentive to adultery on the part of the wife, and at the very least puts into her hands the means of injuring and insulting her husband, and lowering his position and authority in the eyes of his children, his household, and society. She can always withhold any contribution she may have promised towards the expenses of the family, or keep a threat of so doing over the husband's head. "These evils, hitherto partial, will, now that the Bill has become law, be spread over the land." It will cause every husband to look upon his wife as his rival and enemy. Many a father has lamented the strict settlement of money upon a daughter on her marriage, "the most common cause of adultery on the part of the wife, as it is of domestic unhappiness." Our correspondent quotes the Times as authority for this statement, which we certainly should not accept upon his mere assertion. Spoken from our own experience, we should say that many fathers have lamented the omission of the precaution which he denounces. Admitting for the moment that a wife is the natural enemy of her husband, it is still probable that she may be friendly towards the children who are hers, and are commonly reputed to be her husband's, and a settlement secures to her some means of benefiting them. In so far as the Act of 1860 provides for all women something in the nature of a settlement, we should have thought that it was in intention laudable. We say nothing at this moment of the language which purports to give effect to that intention. In a recent case, still under consideration of a Court of law, the operation of this Act has been discussed, and we venture, under correction of our correspondent, to say that the largest construction which the Judges can put upon the Act would be the most beneficial to society. It is provided by the Act, that the wages and earnings of any married woman acquired by her in any employment in which she is engaged separately from her husband and also any money or property so acquired by her through the exercise of any literary, artistic, or scientific skill, and all investments thereof, shall be deemed to be property settled to her separate use. A wife who had been deserted by her husband maintained herself by acting at a theatre. She had saved money out of her salary, and had invested this money in furniture, which was seized under an execution against the husband. In this case the husband and wife lived apart, and therefore there should be no question that the wife was engaged in an employment "separately from her husband." But the protection of the Act, whatever be its extent, is probably given to every wife who has business or employment distinct from her husband. Thus, suppose that a wife is an actress at one theatre and a husband stage-manager at another theatre, the wife would appear to be entitled to protection. But suppose that wife and husband acted together at the same theatre, the wife's right might possibly be questioned. If the Act be ambiguous in reference to particular cases, it may be amended; but we apprehend that it means at least thus much—that a married woman should be by law throughout England in as good a position as by custom in the City of London she has always been; namely, that she might carry on business as if she were unmarried, and if her husband became bankrupt, his assignee would not be entitled to her stock in trade. Suppose that a husband happened to be from infirmity incapable of work, and that his wife undertook to maintain them both by keeping a boarding-house. The money necessary to purchase furniture being advanced by friends, they would be entitled to say that this furniture belonged to them as trustees for the wife, and never belonged to the husband at all. This they would be entitled to say under the general law. But suppose that the wife made profits by the boarding-house, and invested them in the purchase of additional furniture, she would be entitled to that furniture under the Act. This appears a reasonable construction, and we are unable to discover the mischief which our correspondent finds in the Act.

There is more to be said in support of another complaint which he brings forward, although no remedy is visibly attainable. "The Divorce Court," he says, "is another engine for the oppression of husbands." They have to bear the expenses of any complaint or defence that the wife or her advisers may set up. The foundation of the practice of the Court is that, as the husband is supposed to possess all the property, the wife ought to be enabled to bring her case to a hearing or to defend herself. There is a reported case in which a marriage was dissolved for adultery of the wife, and the husband had in the course of the suit either paid or secured 700*l.* for the wife's costs of defending herself against his suit. There were, the Court held, no mitigating circumstances in the case. The co-respondent was ordered to pay all the costs, and, as the report states, every attempt was made to get them from him, but without success. The husband had been compelled to pay money into Court out of which the wife's costs were paid, and the husband was recommended to obtain the amount from the adulterer if he could. Further, as the husband ventured to contest the right of the wife's proctor to be paid out of the money in Court, he had the satisfaction of paying the wife's additional costs caused by his disputing this point. It may interest our correspondent to hear that this practice, which he considers so oppressive, was derived from the Courts in which husbands and wives litigated before the Divorce Court was established. In his next pamphlet he will doubtless discourse eloquently upon the text which we are about to furnish. A wife instituted a suit for nullity of marriage which failed, and the husband had to pay her costs. When we consider the nature of this suit, there is a grim humour in the law which compels the husband to supply the wife with the means of bringing it.

The Act of 1860, as we have said, does something, but not, we think, nearly enough, towards providing by general law that which is done in particular cases by marriage settlement. The pamphlet before us describes, in moving terms, the wrongs of husbands, but we should like to see a pamphlet exhibiting the miseries of trustees. It would be worthy of the ingenuity of Mr. Lowe to construct a scheme by which a Government office might perform for a consideration the duty of a trustee. Persons who assume this office must expect infinite botheration, scanty thanks, or perhaps liberal abuse, and in many cases liability which endures for years, and of which the extent is difficult to estimate. There are wives capable of regarding a trustee's refusal to lend the trust fund to the husband on his personal security as a proof of obstinate blindness to the virtues of the best of men. There are also a more numerous class of wives who expect the highest interest to be obtained upon the trust fund, while of course they look to the trustees to ensure the safety of the principal. Of late years the range of investments usually permitted by marriage settlements has been enlarged, but the power of trustees falls still far short of doing that which they are almost certain to be asked to do. A new annoyance has arisen from the creation of large amounts of colonial securities which are reasonably safe and pay good interest, but are particularly inconvenient for trustees to hold, because the entire evidence of title is a slimy bit of paper being a bond payable to bearer. A trustee does not like to leave in the custody of a colleague documents which may be turned at any moment into money; and if a deposit is made in the joint names of the trustees at a bank, there is still liability to loss for which it would be difficult to make the banker responsible. This is the special consequence of holding a particular class of security which many settlements do not sanction for investment. But the troubles to which all trustees are subject deserve more commiseration than they have received. If they do the business of their trust themselves, they incur great labour and perhaps make serious mistakes; and if they employ solicitors to act for them, they are nearly certain to be abused for wasting the trust fund in law. As a general rule, whatever they do is in the opinion of those for whom they act wrong. If there is among their number a lawyer, they usually proceed upon his advice; which if he is honest is well, but if he is dishonest may turn out very ill indeed.

We think that some sort of official machinery for doing the work of trustees is in the abstract conceivable; but we are well aware that any innovation upon legal practice is almost impossible. Our pamphleteer represents the conveyancers of Lincoln's Inn as still contemplating with hopeless bewilderment the Married Woman's Property Act of 1870, which we regard notwithstanding the openings which it offers to litigation as a useful measure. Many of the criticisms printed in this pamphlet were directed, not against the Bill which was actually passed, but against a Bill wholly different, which was brought into the House of Commons. If the Bill had passed as originally introduced, the saying of Lord Westbury, "that a new terror had been added to matrimony," would have been appropriate.

RACING AT ASCOT.

THE racing on the Thursday and Friday of Ascot week was fully up to the standard of the greatest meeting of the year. For the St. James's Palace Stakes Queen's Messenger ran, giving 7 lbs. to Lord Gough, Struan, and King Lud, and achieved a very easy victory, though he finished awkwardly, and in all probability the distance was not far enough for his liking. This was King Lud's second defeat during the week, but he is still very far from being in racing condition, and it is quite possible that by September he may be the better of Lord Zetland's pair. Aprópos of this race, it may be mentioned that Lord Gough and Struan were about the two highest-priced yearlings of the Middle Park sale of 1870, the former fetching 1,800 and the latter 1,500 guineas; but neither has hitherto won any of the numerous engagements for which they were entered. The All-aged Stakes brought out no less distinguished a trio than Prince Charlie, Sterling, and Wenlock, and the race was run at a tremendous pace. Prince Charlie again showed that his infirmity has had no effect in diminishing his speed over short courses, for he disposed of Wenlock, to whom he was conceding 9 lbs., without an effort, while Sterling showed decided signs of temper when called upon to finish. In addition, the course of training he has undergone of late for long races may have rendered him unfit for those shorter distances over which he was so invincible; so that in grasping at the shadow the substance has perhaps been lost, and in the vain endeavour to make Sterling a stayer his speed has been sacrificed. The New Stakes fell easily to Marie Stuart, a fine daughter of Scottish Chief and Morgan la Faye, whose principal opponents were Faraday (5 lbs. extra), Kaiser, and one of the high-priced colts of 1871, Cobham, bought at the Middle Park sale for 1,600 guineas. The usual fate of such expensive luxuries attended Cobham, who was beaten at the end of half a mile. Marie Stuart won so easily that Acropolis, who gave her weight at Epsom and beat her twice, must be about the best two-year-old that has been out this year.

The Cup, which we briefly noticed last week, was next on the list. There were only five runners, and the most notable absentee was Albert Victor. The field was made up by Favonius, Hannah, Henry, Shannon, and Almoner—the last being the solitary representative of the three-year-olds. Hannah's duty was of course to make play for Favonius, and she discharged that duty for about two miles, Henry taking matters very leisurely, and not troubling himself to go within several lengths of the leader. At the turn into the straight Hannah was adroitly taken to one side to permit Favonius, who was waiting on her, to obtain the inside place. Henry, who was coming up at the same time, lost thereby a certain amount of ground, which, however, he soon made up in the straight. Directly he challenged Favonius Baron Rothschild's horse gave in, as completely settled as Sterling was on the first day, when Albert Victor ran up to his head. Henry then had only to go on to win, the actual distance between him and Favonius at the finish being a length and a half. Hannah was a bad third, and Shannon and Almoner were beaten off. Of course there were plenty of people immediately ready to pull to pieces the fallen idol, but it must be remembered that the only long races Favonius has ever won have been against such moderate antagonists as Manille, Ravenshoe, and Eole II., and that therefore his great staying abilities have been a good deal taken on trust. Shannon beat him fairly and squarely for the Goodwood Cup, and Henry, his victor on this occasion, has given abundant proof, both in England and France, of exceptional staying powers. His defeat in the Cambridgeshire last year goes for nothing, as he is quite unsuited, both in shape and make, to the course, and the race was pretty certain to be over before he could well get into his stride. He is one of the most powerful horses in training; awkward, heavy, and angular-looking, no doubt, as was also Gladiateur, and he has added fresh fame to his illustrious sire Monarque. He beat Don Carlos in a canter this spring over a three-mile course, and that in itself was far better evidence of staying powers than Favonius has ever shown. The Ninth New Biennial was left to Khedive and the Makeshift colt, the latter having a 7-lb. allowance, but he could never make sufficient use of his advantage in the weights to get out of the way of Lord Zetland's horse, who pulled over him the whole way up and won cleverly by a neck. The Makeshift colt ran very ungenerously, and bored against Khedive so much that the race would have been claimed by and adjudged to the latter in any case. At first sight this performance would seem to show that Queen's Messenger ought to have won the Derby, but, despite his disappointment at Tattenham Corner, we cannot think he would ever have beaten Cremorne over the Derby course. How the Makeshift colt ever got as close to Cremorne as he did is a much greater puzzle. Judged by his Ascot running he ought never to have been near the first three. Marie Stuart secured another victory in the Tenth New Biennial, Dean of Westminster being this time her solitary opponent, and the day's sport ended with the success of Gourn in a Selling Plate, Sir Joseph Hawley's once formidable colours having been scarcely seen before during the meeting, owing to the epidemic which has once again struck down the majority of his horses.

For the Alexandra Plate there were seven runners. Mr. Payne started Hobart to make a pace for Musket; Baron Rothschild gave Favonius another chance—though it was hardly likely that a horse who could not stay two miles and a half, should, with additional weight on his back, stay three. Albert Victor, Don Carlos, Agility, and Barford made up the field. Hobart made the running, attended by Don Carlos, who appeared to overpower his jockey, for it was surely not true policy to attempt to win a three-mile race by racing away with the lead for a mile and three-quarters. Even after he had been once pulled back—about a mile from home—he broke away again and came round the last turn with a decided lead, followed by Musket, Albert Victor, and Favonius. Baron Rothschild's horse was beaten at about the same place as in the Cup race, and Musket was in difficulties almost about the same moment, but he answered every call made on him with unflinching gameness, and wearing down his other opponents at the finish won a well-deserved race by a length. Don Carlos, whose exertions in the earlier part of the race told on him at last, was beaten by Albert Victor for second place, and Favonius was a bad third. We are of course glad that this valuable race was not wrested from us, like the Cup, but fell to an English horse, and one also whose public performances render him well worthy of the prize. But at the same time, if Don Carlos could have been more carefully nursed, and so much use had not been made of him, we think he would certainly have been close up with the winner, even if he would not have actually won. The race was run just to suit Musket, but still it was by no means a cheap victory. He was severely punished, and could have done no more than he did. Henry was withdrawn from the race, or, judging from the position of Don Carlos, he would have had a good chance of carrying off the Plate as well as the Cup. People began to say after this race was over, that Albert Victor must have nearly won the Cup had he run for it, because he beat Favonius much further than Henry beat him. But we quite dissent from this, because Henry, we are satisfied, won the Cup with a great deal in hand, and might have got six lengths in front of Favonius had it been necessary. Also, of course, there were sundry regretful recollections of last year's Derby, and there were freely pronounced opinions that Albert Victor was the best horse of his year, and ought to have won the great Epsom race. From this again we dissent, for we have never been able to understand that because a horse wins over a three-mile course he ought therefore to beat, or to have beaten, the same antagonists over a course of a mile and a half. Granted that Albert Victor, who, by the way, never looked as well as he did in his life as now, has grown into a better stayer than Favonius, it by no means follows that he ever could, or ever will, beat Favonius over a mile or a mile and a half.

To win the Queen's Plate after losing the great prize of the meeting was but poor consolation for Baron Rothschild, but at any rate Corisande disposed of Dutch Skater very easily, as might have been expected from the running of the pair in the Gold Vase; and then Khedive still further increased his reputation by beating a large field in the Ascot Plate, including Dalnacardoch, Highland Fling, Glaucus, and Turban, the running of Lord Zetland's horse throughout the week going far to strengthen the position of Queen's Messenger for the great autumn three-year-old race at Doncaster. Indeed, besides Lord Zetland's pair, Khedive and King Lud, it is difficult to find a dangerous opponent to Lord Falmouth's champion, unless it be Gladiolus, by Gladiateur out of Sunbeam, who last year, when only half trained, ran Queen's Messenger to a length for the Buckenham Stakes. His only subsequent appearance was in the Houghton Meeting, when he beat Alava easily; and this year he was prevented from taking part in the Derby by an accident which happened to him shortly before the day of the race.

The probable fate of Mr. Hughes's Betting Bill will hardly excite surprise or regret. That part of it which proposes to extend the operation of the Betting Houses Act to all parts of the United Kingdom is most deserving of acceptance; but to make all betting—in the sense of ready-money betting, we mean—at all times, and in all places, and under all circumstances, a criminal offence, is a purely Quixotic idea. Such offhand treatment of a difficult subject shows neither statesmanship nor knowledge of the world. Betting on horse-races can no more be prohibited than drinking intoxicating liquors; but it is quite possible to regulate the one as well as the other, and to check the evils which in either case may flow from indiscriminate license. A controlling and regulating, not a prohibitive, policy should be the mainspring of any measure attempting to deal with the acknowledged abuses of betting.

REVIEWS.

MARGARET DUCHESS OF NEWCASTLE.*

THE first period at which woman makes her appearance in our national literature is that of the Great Rebellion. Learned and accomplished as the group of ladies educated in the Court of Henry VIII. seem to have been, we possess no works from the pen of Anne Askew or Lady Jane Grey; no woman comes to the front as poetess or dramatist in the great Elizabethan outburst, or figures among the ranks of the theological controversialists of the reign of James. Female authorship in fact, however great the development which it seems destined to receive in our own day, dates only from the Memoirs of Mrs. Hutchinson, of Lady Fanshawe, and of the Duchess of Newcastle. We are the more indebted to Mr. Russell Smith for a reprint of two of the most characteristic works of the rather eccentric peeress who figures last on the list, from a belief that it needs only a wider acquaintance with her biographies to bring about some modification in the judgment which has been handed down to us from her contemporaries. The stately and pedantic maid-of-honour, who had passed from the Court in Merton Gardens to a life of exile with her lord, returned from Antwerp to find herself as much out of date as Clarendon himself. The wits scoffed at her pedantry, her interminable sentences, and the elaboration of a style which, like that of the great Chancellor, preserved the tone of an age which had past away. Even amongst the languor and tediousness of the Lives or the Olio we find something of the "linked sweetness, long drawn out," of Hooker or Milton. The writers of her own sex, the Mrs. Behns and Orindas of the Restoration, could find nothing but contempt for a woman who openly professed to "abhorre an unclean thought," and devoted folios to the adoration of her husband. Even now, when husband-worship has come into fashion again, we stare a little at such idolatry as that of the Duchess of Newcastle, at a wisely devotion which proclaims her lord irresistible, which paints the charms of his person, jots carefully down the very commonplace sentences which dropped from his lips as if they were the quintessence of wisdom, and takes us page after page into the stables to admire his dexterity in the ménage. In spite, however, of faults such as these, it is impossible to read the Duchess without a genuine admiration for her. Cumbersome as her style often is, it is just as often simple and unpretending, and by a rare chance it is as free from the false rhetoric of the days of Elizabeth as from the false wit of those of Charles II. In her actual story there is all the simple-heartedness, if there is some of the tediousness, of a child. She tells us about herself, her shyness, her chastity, her bursts of temper, her love of honour and truth, as if her reader were cloistered with her for the most private of chats. She has none of the little jealousies of women; she looks on her lord's "conquests" as the most natural and becoming thing in the world; she worships her mother as she worships her husband; she looks with the same eye of undiminished admiration on brothers and brothers-in-law; even to hated Puritans, who had turned her out of house and home, her allusions are of the most reserved and dignified order. There is something, too, exquisitely piquant in the very notion of the biography itself. It is surely the only extant instance of a husband's life written by a loving wife in her husband's lifetime. The Duke, indeed, if we are to credit his spouse, deserved some sort of literary return:—

Your Grace remembers well [says the Duchess, in her preface] that those Books I put out first, to the judgment of this censorious Age, were accounted not to be written by a Woman, but that some body else had writ and publish'd them in my Name; by which your Lordship was moved to prefix an Epistle before one of them in my vindication, wherein you assure the world upon your honour, That what was written and printed in my name, was my own; and I have also made known, that your Lordship was my only Tutor, in declaring to me what you had found and observed by your own experience; for I being young when your Lordship married me, could not have much knowledge of the world; But it pleased God to command his Servant Nature to induce me with a Poetical and Philosophical Genius, even from my Birth; for I did write some Books in that kind, before I was twelve years of Age, which for want of good method and order, I would never divulge. But though the world would not believe that those Conceptions and Fancies which I writ, were my own, but transcribed my capacity, yet they found fault, that they were defective for want of Learning; and on the other side, they said I had pluckt Feathers out of the Universities; which was a very preposterous judgment.

His advice on the subject of his own biography was at any rate of a dignified order which tells well for himself, though it has told greatly against the interest of the book. He commanded its author "not to mention any thing or passage to the prejudice or disgrace of any family or particular person, although they might be of great truth, or would illustrate much the actions of your life." The command has been dutifully obeyed, but the life of the Duke still retains much that renders it of essential service to the historian of the Great Rebellion.

For the war in the North, indeed, the first book of this biography, which gives an account of the Earl's services as commander of the Royalist forces in the North up to the defeat of Marston Moor, is of the highest value. The Duchess was as yet only a girl in the Queen's suite at Oxford, without a dream of her high destinies, and the information she gives is derived from John Rolleston, the Earl's secretary, and from the papers in her husband's possession. But from this she has drawn up a minute narrative of the campaign, which must be regarded as of primary authority on the Royalist side. William Cavendish, the hero of her biography, owed all his honours to the house of Stuart, and he repaid its bounty by an unquestioning devotion. He was grandson of Sir William Cavendish, a courtier and Privy Councillor of the Tudor sovereigns, who is memorable as the builder of Chatsworth, and whose house became enriched by a succession of wealthy marriages, the alliance with the heiress of the Ogles especially giving it large estates and influence in the North. Cavendish himself had been ennobled by James I. and raised to the earldom of Newcastle by his son. On the eve of the great struggle with the Parliament we find him retired into the country "with an intent to have continued there and rested under his own vine and managed his own estate," which gave him an income of some 22,000*l.* a year, or a sum which would now be equivalent to four or five times that value. There seems in fact to have been little expectation of an immediate struggle when the King's command appointed him governor of the four Northern counties of Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland. The Earl found no military preparation made, "nor generally any great encouragement for the people in those parts more than what his own interest created in them." It was with a regiment and a troop of horse raised from among his own Northumbrian tenantry that he secured Newcastle-on-Tyne and the port of Tynemouth, "playing his weak part with much prudence," and gagging the preachers of the North by a commission with Dean Cosens at its head. The King, while withdrawing his troop of horse, sent him nothing save "a little barrel of duck-tons;" but a supply of arms from Denmark, including "regiment pieces and Danish clubs," enabled him to equip the larger force which the increasing violence of the struggle seemed to call for. A wider commission made him general of the forces for the country North of Trent and for the Eastern Counties, and in November 1642 he was ready to occupy York with an army of eight thousand foot, horse, and dragoons. The Duchess gives an interesting account of the campaign which followed, and which was principally directed against the West Riding, the only part of the county which seems to have been strong for the Parliamentary cause. The contest fairly began with the opening of 1643, when an engagement of horse on Seacroft Moor left Leeds and Wakefield at the Earl's mercy, and after detaching 7,000 men to reinforce the King's army in the South, he found himself strong enough to wrest from Fairfax a decisive victory at Atherton Moor, which left him undisputed master of Yorkshire, where only the fortress of Hull was held for the Parliament. His reduction of Lincolnshire had been planned as the prelude to a march southwards, which might have decided the fortunes of the war, but the activity of the Hull garrison recalled him at the critical moment to the North, and though Derbyshire was easily won for the King, the Earl had only just gone into winter quarters round his own house of Welbeck when he was called to meet the army of the Scots. From this moment success was at an end, and the fruits of a year of victory were lost in a few days. The Earl found himself hemmed in at York by the combined action of the Scots, the Hull garrison, and the forces of the Eastern counties, and when Rupert's advance at the end of a two months' siege had relieved the town, the Royalist cause was suddenly wrecked in the great overthrow of Marston Moor. The battle was in fact a surprise, and the Earl was quietly resting in his own coach when it began:—

* The Lives of William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, and of his Wife, Margaret Duchess of Newcastle. Written by the Thrice Noble and Illustrations Princess, Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle. Edited, with a Preface and Occasional Notes, by Mark Antony Lower, M.A., &c. London: John Russell Smith. 1872.

Not long had My Lord been there, but he heard a great noise and thunder of shooting, which gave him notice of the Armies being engaged: Whereupon he immediately put on his Arms, and was no sooner got on Horseback but he beheld a dismal sight of the Horse of His Majesties right Wing, which out of a panick fear had left the Field, and run away with all the speed they could; and though my Lord made them stand once, yet they immediately betook themselves to their heels again, and killed even those of their own party that endeavoured to stop them; the Left Wing in the mean time, Commanded by those two Valiant Persons, the Lord Goring and Sir Charles Lucas, having the better of the Enemies right Wing, which they beat back most valiantly three times, and made their General retreat, in so much that they sounded Victory.

In this Confusion my Lord (accompanied only with his Brother Sir Charles Cavendish, Major Scot, Capt. Mazine, and his Page) hastening to see in what posture his own Regiment was, met with a Troop of Gentlemen-Volunteers, who formerly had chosen him their Captain, notwithstanding he was General of an Army; to whom my Lord spake after this manner: Gentlemen, said he, You have done me the Honour to chuse me your Captain, and now is the fittest time that I may do you service; wherefore if you'll follow me, I shall lead you on the best I can, and shew you the way to your own Honour. They being as glad of my Lords Profer, as my Lord was of their Readiness, went on with the greatest Courage; and passing through Two Bodies of Foot, engaged with each other not at forty yards distance, received not the least hurt, although they fired quick upon each other; but marched towards a Scots Regiment of Foot, which they charged and routed; in which Encounter my Lord himself kill'd Three with his Pages half-leaden Sword, for he had no other left him; and though all the Gentlemen in particular, offer'd him their Swords, yet my Lord refused to take a Sword of any of them.

His courage, however, was in vain; the Royalist army was dispersed, and Newcastle, half in humour at his own dismissal from the command, half desperate of any possibility of the renewal of the struggle, fled over sea.

We need not follow the Earl in the wanderings which form the rest of this biography; the one fact of any importance is that on joining the exiled Court at Paris he met and married his wife. There "it was my fortune to see him for the first time, I being then one of the maids of honour to Her Majesty; and after he stayed there some time he was pleased to take some particular notice of me, and express more than an ordinary affection for me; insomuch that he resolved to chuse me for his second wife." Margaret Lucas was the sister of the well-known Sir Charles Lucas, whose death after the surrender of Colchester has left the only stain on Fairfax's memory, and the fortunes of her house had gone down in the same storm which had wrecked those of the Earl. Much of the earlier married life of the two spouses consisted in shifts to keep the wolf from the door, and at one time we find his steward telling my Lord,

That he was not able to provide a Dinner for him, for his Creditors were resolved to trust him no longer. My Lord being always a great master of his Passions, was, at least shew'd himself not in any manner troubled at it, but in a pleasant humour told me, that I must of necessity pawn my Cloaths to make so much Money as would procure a Dinner. I answer'd, That my Cloaths would be but of small value, and therefore desired my Waiting-Maid to pawn some small toys, which I had formerly given her, which she willingly did.

Expedients of this sort, however, were soon at an end, and we find the new Countess dancing attendance to very little purpose on the Committees of Sequestration in the hope of receiving some small part of her lord's wealth. It was during these two years' stay in England that she wrote her Poems and Philosophical Fancies; her "World's Olio" having been composed before this time. The little help she managed to procure enabled the Earl to "light on a house that belonged to the widow of a famous picture-drawer, Van Rubens, which he took," and to hold his creditors at bay till the news of the Restoration enabled him to return. Here is a true pathetic touch in the "mirth" of his voyage home and in his first sight of London smoke:—

My Lord (who was so transported with the joy of returning into his Native Country, that he regarded not the Vessel) having set Sail from Rotterdam, was so becalmed, that he was six dayes and six nights upon the Water, during which time he pleased himself with mirth, and passed his time away as well as he could; Provisions he wanted not, having them in great store and plenty. At last being come so far that he was able to discern the smoke of London, which he had not seen in a long time, he merrily was pleased to desire one that was near him to jogg and awake him out of his dream, for surely, said he, I have been sixteen years asleep, and am not thoroughly awake yet. My Lord lay that night at Greenwich, where his Supper seem'd more savoury to him than any meat he had hitherto tasted; and the noise of some scraping Fiddlers, he thought the pleasantest harmony that ever he had heard.

The joy, however, was soon destined to be dashed with disappointment. Newcastle's services were acknowledged with a Duchy, but he found himself among the "old Loyalists" who got nothing but ingratitude and civil speeches from the restored monarch. The new Duke retired in dudgeon to Welbeck, and devoted the rest of his life to the restoration of his estates. His losses during and after the war are reckoned by his wife at almost a million—an enormous sum if it be multiplied as it must be to bring it up to the present value of money. He had left England, in fact, the wealthiest of English peers; he returned to find himself a poor and beggared man. It is in such a scene of desolation as one passage in this biography brings home to us—a scene which must have been common whenever an exiled noble returned to his home—that we must look for an explanation of the bitterly persecuting spirit displayed by the Royalist party after the left that was not quite destroyed, viz. Welbeck-Park of about four miles compass; for my Lord's Brother, Sir Charles Cavendish, who bought out the life of my Lord in that Lordship, saved most part of it from being cut down; and in Elveth-Park there were some few Deer left: The rest of the Parks were totally defaced and destroyed, both Wood, Pales, and Deer; amongst which was also Chipston-Park of seven miles compass, wherein my Lord had taken much delight formerly, it being rich of Wood, and containing the greatest and tallest Timber-trees of all the Woods he had; in so much, that only the Pale-row was valued at 2000l. It was water'd by a pleasant River that runs through it, full of fish and Otters; was well stock'd with Deer, full of Hares, and had great store of Partridges, Poots, Pheasants, &c., besides all sorts of Water-fowl; so that this Park afforded all manner of sports, for Hunting, Hawking, Coursing, Fishing, &c., for which my Lord esteem'd it very much: And although his Patience and Wisdom is such, that I never perceived him sad or discontented for his own Losses and Misfortunes, yet when he beheld the ruins of that Park, I observed him troubled, though he did little express it, only saying, he had been in hopes it would not have been so much defaced as he found it, there being not one Timber-tree in it left for shelter.

His one comfort in his seclusion and poverty must have been the ecstatic worship of his wife. "My Lord," she tells us, "may justly be compared to Titus by reason of his sweet, gentle, and obliging nature"; nor is his sweetness of nature his only merit. "I may justly call him the best Lyric and Dramatick poet of this age." That he was its greatest general and its wisest statesman, she was never weary of assuring both him and the world. Page after page at the close of his life are spent in the elaborate exhibition of the roll-call of admirable qualities which she gives us as his character—his fidelity, his fairness, his self-command, his civility, his clomency, his courage, his modesty, his generosity. "In short," the Duchess closes at last, fairly out of breath, "I know him not addicted to any manner of vice, except that he has been a great lover and admirer of the female sex, which, whether it be so great a crime as to condemn him for it, I'll leave to the judgment of young gallants and beautiful ladies." We might perhaps in the same way safely leave the Duchess's ecstasies to the compassionate verdict of young husbands and adoring wives.

MAURICE'S MORAL AND METAPHYSICAL PHILOSOPHY.*

IN the preface to the new edition of this work—the last production of the lamented author's prolific pen—Mr. Maurice makes his readers aware that he had not written on philosophy for "professional philosophers." "I did not expect," he says, "one professional philosopher would glance, or more than glance, at my manual." It takes but a slight acquaintance with its contents to convince us that this was not any profession of meek humility. The student, anxious to trace the numerous forms and phases of the philosophical problem historically, will derive no great help from the work before us. The more careful he is to note the precise character of the various systems of the great thinkers of ancient and modern times, the less likely will he be to gather profit from the manner in which these are presented here. If he desires to discover the genetic connexion of these systems, and how one inquirer has developed further, though under widely different forms, the identical problems dealt with by his predecessors, he will feel inclined to close the book in despair. If he wishes, at an earlier stage of philosophical study, to gain clear ideas of the leading principles of the metaphysical systems of other ages, he need scarcely resort to Mr. Maurice. And least of all can we promise that the author will be found a serviceable guide to those who expect from a manual practical assistance in enabling them to prepare for examinations in moral and metaphysical science. The work is suitable neither for the scientific speculator, the tiro in philosophical research, nor the professional student eager to study philosophy for a special purpose. As a history of philosophy, it is chargeable with very serious defects. Mr. Maurice's style is, for one thing, of so shadowy and indefinite a character that even the clearest conceptions loom vast and dark while he handles them. This characteristic is not more palpable in the History than it is in his other works; perhaps on the whole it is less so. Still the necessity imposed on a reader of always trying to translate Maurice into his own, or a more intelligible, dialect is manifestly present. When it is further explained that the author professes to have, and evidently really has, a strong aversion to systems and systematic thought, and is consequently fond of lecturing men about the obligation incumbent upon them to rise above systems, and to regard all particular opinions about thought and its objects as so many prison-houses from which "gracious influences" are required to deliver them, his inability to treat the history of philosophy in the ordinary way must be sufficiently plain. This, however, is not all—it is hardly even the worst. The reader begins to perceive very soon that he is in the hands of a guide who, while continually reminding him of the evils and dangers of systems of thought, and of the still greater perils of seeking a reconciliation of inconsistent systems through any kind of philosophical eclecticism, is at the same time toning down and refining away the dividing lines that separate one opinion from another or one theory from its seeming opposite. There is a resolute determination to find points of contact between contraries, if not contradictions. There is a prominent and unmistakable tendency to proclaim that there has been a soul of good in all things evil. And it must be admitted that the author is entirely impartial. He * Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy. By Frederick Maurice, M.A., Professor of Christianity and Modern Philosophy in the University of Cambridge. New Edition, with Preface. London: Macmillan & Co. 1872.

of which Park, which my Lord had before the War, there was but one discovers virtues and seeds of beneficent blessing in the theories and systems that are most hostile to what he leads us to believe are his own opinions. He seeks to show that what men have been wont to regard as most pernicious in Spinoza, Hume, or Hobbes, is precisely what was destined to be most fruitful in good results. We are consequently breathing an atmosphere of enthusiastic eclecticism. We watch the figures that are made to pass in rapid review before our astonished vision, and are surprised to see them running into each other like a series of dissolving views. We wonder greatly at the strange phantasmagoria, and a strong head and healthy nerves are needed in order to allow us to carry away clear and distinct impressions of anything we have beheld.

It is unnecessary to show how a faculty capable of producing such intellectual results cannot be confided in as capable of giving a thoroughly trustworthy and useful history of Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy. The plan of the work is still more fitted to confuse. The small early manual of which these two large volumes are the expansion was, to our view, much more acceptable as a history, or a manual of a history, than these. The author has allowed himself to be often tempted into over-diffuseness. The extent of the ground over which he takes us, from the beginnings of thinking in Hebrew philosophy down through the philosophies of Egypt, Persia, Chaldaea, China, Greece, and Rome, onward through the early Christian centuries to the mediæval ages, and thence to the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, with a glimpse into the nineteenth, is so enormous that only the most rigid compression could have succeeded in presenting a tolerably full and clear outline. But without apparent reason Mr. Maurice devotes lengthy analyses, not to the systems or leading thoughts, but to the individual books of certain authors, some of them sufficiently small, while he includes many writers to whom he devotes large portions of his space, whom it is difficult to regard as philosophers in any strict sense of the term. When we come near our own time our guide forsakes us utterly. A history of Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy without ample elucidations of the thinkers and systems of the great modern epoch from Kant to Hegel must be declared to be like the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet omitted. Yet this is what we have. After the devotion of not a little space to Clarendon, Milton, South, and Boswell in the seventeenth century, and to Shaftesbury, Bolingbroke and Pope, and Montesquieu in the eighteenth, we have the whole of German philosophy from Lessing to our own day dismissed in some fifty pages. And when we test the author closely in regard to individual thinkers, we too often find his somewhat misty and mystic utterances misleading. The whole treatment of Spinoza is an example of this. It really gives us no insight into the actual individuality and characteristic thought of the great Pantheist, but presents a picture that is wholly unlike the original. Take, as another example, the treatment of Schelling. It must be plain to all who know the later writings of that philosopher that Mr. Maurice was ignorant of the final results reached by him, and we cannot help doubting whether he knew even Schelling's earlier writings. But the whole handling of the later Germans (with only the partial exception of Kant) is of the same misleading character. It seems as if Mr. Maurice had been content to derive his knowledge of them from the outlines of other historians, and had read into these his own impressions of what they were likely to have been. There is abundant material in the course of the development of speculative thought for even a larger history than the one before us; but when a writer mixes up with his subject proper all sorts of other matter, social, political, literary, &c., we cannot wonder if the result should be confusing. In default of a minute acquaintance at first hand with the works of philosophers ancient and modern, Mr. Maurice has depended largely upon other historians, very much we should say upon Ritter. Those who know the more recent histories of philosophy, such as Zeller's, or Kuno Fischer's, or even the very meagre sketched sketches of Schweigger or Chalybæus—or, to mention English writers, Mr. Lowe's history, or the more rhetorical work of Morell—will hardly feel that Mr. Maurice has made any great contribution to the philosophical literature of the day.

Yet while we believe all this may be fairly said in reference to the work before us, it would be altogether unfair to conclude that therefore it is of little worth. On the contrary, it seems to us a book of significance and mark. In judging of it we ought in justice to take into account what were the avowed purposes of the author in writing it. These he has explicitly stated many times, and even had he been silent it would have been impossible not to discern them. First of all, it is necessary to bear in mind that the book is the work of a theologian much more than of a philosopher. In the preface to the edition of 1862 the author remarked:—"It will be evident to the reader of any part of these volumes that I have felt as a theologian, thought as a theologian, written as a theologian; that all other subjects in my mind are connected with theology and subordinated to it." By theology, using the term "in its old sense," he meant "that which concerns the Being and Nature of God," and "the revelation of God to men." This circumstance must materially modify our view of the book. And we soon find further indications of the author's designs which must affect our opinion of his work still more. In dealing, in the first volume, with Greek philosophy and the place of Zeno in connection therewith, Mr. Maurice observes:—"In so very rapid a sketch as ours it is clearly impossible to do more than notice what seems to be the living and central peculiarity of each thinker as he rises up before us." He does not wish, he says, to furnish his readers with a history, but rather to put them "in a right method of procuring one for themselves." But it is not enough to state or suggest merely the leading characteristics of the thinkers dealt with. He is ever seeking to connect these with the circumstances and movements of the times in which they lived. Philosophy is regarded as of practical interest, and as only valuable in that aspect. Metaphysical questions lie all around us, and are closely associated with the most ordinary thoughts and actions of men. Hence Mr. Maurice tells us in the second volume, dealing with Locke, that his object throughout "has been to show how the great social movements of the world have affected, have been affected by, the studies of the closet." What remains merely as thought, without translating itself into action, has little or no attraction for Mr. Maurice. His great aim is to let men see how near to them, how unavoidable by them, and how powerful in their influences upon the movements and goings of common life, are those thoughts that are stirred in us when we contemplate our nature and destiny. The systems of philosophers, as giving distinct form to the dimmer impulses and efforts of the multitude, are thus in a sense the property of all. But if we come to isolate them, and look upon them only as systems of thought without reference to the realities towards which all thought ought to guide us, these systems become mere idola which are pernicious instead of beneficial. Consequently Mr. Maurice does not wish to look at doctrines and systems "in the lump," but prefers to "trace the gradual accretions in the mind of each particular thinker." It is characteristic of Mr. Maurice to be always repenting, under more or less diversity of form, what he considers the same ground truths. Open any one of his numerous works where we will, we shall be sure to hear something about the real order that exists independently of the creations of thought. He is ever proclaiming that thought is only useful as it enables us to be receptive of what is external to and independent of us. Viewing all things in the light of theology, he sees God's Nature as the eternal fact which is continuously revealing itself to man through his thoughts, instincts, and feelings, and reproducing images or reflections of itself in the institutions of human life which show forth the order that is in the Divine. All life and history, therefore, all the movements of men and nations, their social and political institutions, the phenomena of progress and culture, and the systems and thoughts of philosophers, as well as the deeds of men of action, are regarded as the revelation, or as revelations, of the Divine Being who is at the root of all, and through all, and in all. Mr. Maurice, with reverent but fearless footsteps, enters the temple of history, that he may interpret its revelations to us; and only as the history of moral and metaphysical philosophy can be seen to be such a revelation, and, as such, also an education of the human race, or as contributing towards such an education, does he greatly value it. Hence it is that we find him so often in this history occupied with facts and movements which do not at first sight appear to have any connexion whatever either with moral or metaphysical philosophy. One great peril always before him is the danger of divorcing thought from life, of coming to regard all things as mere thoughts. This was the temptation to which many of the schoolmen yielded. John Duns Scotus is represented as "dancing on his tight-rope, and looking upon all thoughts as things," from whence to converting all things into mere thoughts was but a step. We can only avoid such risks, we are told, by holding fast to our faith in that which is independent of ourselves, as an order outside of us testifying to the Person who is constantly revealing Himself to us both from within and from without.

While we cannot hope within our limits to make altogether plain the position and point of view of Mr. Maurice, what we have said is perhaps enough to indicate his general point of view. And it will be easily gathered that, while this History is not to be highly valued as a work on philosophy in its strictest sense, it is likely to be found very serviceable in enabling the student to understand Maurice himself, so far as any views of other men's theories will enable one to do that. In a sense the book is a history of the times with which it deals, and of the influences of systems of thought and philosophy upon them. We might almost call it a philosophy of the times; or, in a loose sense, a philosophy of history, rather than a history of philosophy. This arises from Mr. Maurice's peculiar view as to the close connexion between thought and action. He speaks of "the thin and almost imaginary line which separates the popular thought and action from the scholastic." And assuredly he exemplifies this in his own case, because the line becomes sometimes so thin that it is invisible, and no distinction whatever is to be observed. What tends to render Mr. Maurice's sketches of opinion still more shadowy is the interrogative and suggestive form in which he puts what he has to say. He almost shrinks from distinct propositions—a peculiarity which renders him incapable of faithfully interpreting thinkers like Aristotle, Spinoza, Descartes, or even Leibnitz. At least a reader feels that he is always liable to get a good deal of Maurice along with a comparatively small proportion of the thinker whose views he is expounding. Nevertheless, with, and partly because of, the defects we have noted, this History is a thoroughly individual and original work. The thoughtful and cultivated student who already knows the history of philosophy will find it full of instruction as well as of suggestiveness. But we cannot recommend it to those who are only beginning to think and to read on philosophical topics.

HUTCHINSON'S CRACOW AND THE CARPATHIANS.*

CAPTAIN HUTCHINSON belongs to a very deserving class of men. We do not speak of the Royal Artillery, in which he holds a commission, nor of the Geological Society, of which he is Fellow, nor even of the genuine believers in Protestantism, amongst whom, judging by his industry in scattering copies of the Bible in remote districts, he must be reckoned. We regard him at present exclusively from a humbler point of view as a pioneer of the great army of tourists. As such he lately called the attention of his fellow-travellers to a new district in a little book called Try Lapland, and he now invites us with equal confidence to try Cracow and the Carpathians. There is, as we need not pause to demonstrate, a great want of new fields for the tourist of moderate ambition, who regards the sources of the Nile as beyond his legitimate tether, whilst he is a little tired of the beaten tracks followed by Mr. Cook's disciples. Tourists, in particular, who have a turn for mountain scenery, and withal too great an appetite for novelty to content themselves with the Alps and the Pyrenees, have frequently cast glances towards a black parallelogram which ornaments the Eastern region of the map of Europe. There, to all appearance, stretches a vast mountain range still almost untrodden, and forming a kind of remote outwork to the Austrian Empire. In different parts of the range it forms the boundary of the Danubian Principalities and of Poland; and the pleasure of mixing with a strange population may be added to the pleasure of seeing a new landscape. English travellers are still few and far between in those parts. The Eastern Carpathians are well described in the late Mr. Boner's book upon Transylvania, and some members of the Alpine Club have more recently reported upon their merits from a purely mountaineering point of view. But of the Northern Carpathians which form the boundary between Poland and Hungary we do not remember to have seen any more recent account in English than that of Mr. Paget. At any rate the ground was sufficiently new to justify Captain Hutchinson in forming himself into a commission of inquiry for the benefit of his fellow-tourists; and that it has some decided merits is obvious from a brief inspection of its geography. Railways from Vienna or Berlin will in a few months take the traveller to a place not more than five or six miles from Bach Schmeks, which is the Chamouni or Grindelwald of the district. At Schmeks there appears to be a cheap and comfortable inn, much frequented by the Hungarians, who are at present always disposed to be friendly to Englishmen—not, we will hope, because their opportunities of making our acquaintance are so limited. It is close to the principal mountains of the district, the highest of which, we regret to say, only reaches the height of 8,722 feet; and apparently it would be easy, taking Schmeks for a centre, to visit everything that is at all remarkable in the country. Here, then, are very considerable inducements: a district still unhackneyed; tolerable accommodation; an approach as easy as the approach to Zermatt; and a fine wild country, with an interesting population. Persons about to arrange a summer tour may do worse than give a thought to the Carpathians. Besides enjoying themselves, they may, if they are so inclined, indulge in any number of political discussions with the Magyars, and set up on their return for authorities on the Eastern question and the designs of Russia. Captain Hutchinson is content with out plunging into such profound topics. He gives merely such a sketch of his trip as may gently whet the appetite of others; and, to say the truth, he has found it necessary to eke out his rather slender information about the country by treating us to some descriptions of Berlin and Prague, and short biographies of Sobieski and Kosciuszko, which savour a little too much of the guidebook. Indeed, he seems to have allowed himself rather a brief time for doing the country, especially when we make the proper deductions for a good many hours spent in fishing. That sport has many merits, but it is apt to keep a man's eyes riveted a little too closely to particular aspects of nature.

Such, however, being the book, let us endeavour to draw from it as clear a catalogue as may be of the inducements to visit the country, and the reasons for abstaining. To the facility of access already noticed we must of course add that the country is beautiful. That is an epithet which people now feel themselves bound to apply to every district which reaches a certain average elevation above the sea. Captain Hutchinson indeed goes further, and ventures some sort of comparison between the forests and meadows of the Carpathians and the bleak rocks and snows of Switzerland. There, having the fear of the Alpine Club before our eyes, we must decline to follow him; and, to say the truth, we suspect the country of a certain tawiness. It is true, indeed, that in his ascent of the Lomner Spitzel, Captain Hutchinson speaks of serious difficulties, and that his guide related for his comfort a story of a rash youth who, having refused to take a guide, had fallen over a precipice 150 feet high, and been smashed to pieces. That is creditable to the mountain as far as it goes; but after all a man may be killed on Scawfell or Snowdon; and we incline to the opinion that the scenery is pitched altogether in a lower key than that of the Pyrenees or any district worthy to be called mountainous rather than hilly. However, all persons are not equally exacting in their views, and some are even lax enough to hold that the ridges of a monstrous down may be as beautiful as the spires of the Dolomites or the Alpilles of Chamouni. Next in order to the charms of scenery, we may observe that there are in the Carpathians a variety of animals to be killed. There are fish in the streams and lakes; and there are bears, wolves, and deer in the mountains. The fish, it is true, are not very heavy, but they are abundant, and anybody may kill them who pleases. Moreover, they are at present of an unsophisticated disposition. A foreign sportsman was discovered performing an operation which he was pleased to describe as fly-fishing. He had tied two large artificial flies together, fastened them to a large piece of lead, and, having sunk them in the stream, was waiting until some misguided trout should swallow the tempting bait. Where fish have acquired no more sagacity than is necessary to defeat such simple-minded attempts upon their happiness, it is no wonder that they should be confiding and easily beguiled. Captain Hutchinson took advantage of their innocence, and his early followers may perhaps count upon a similar success. The bears and wolves are probably more sagacious, as they have been the objects of a more serious warfare; and the chances are that anybody who proposes to bring home a skin may find that a good many days of labour will be rewarded by the distant sight of the said skin disappearing in the distance under the command of its legitimate proprietor. However, it is not given to everybody in these degenerate days even to see a real bear outside of the Zoological Gardens, and though a few specimens are still wandering about the Eastern Alps, the Carpathians are probably the most accessible spot to which the sportsman can proceed with a fair prospect of his labour being not entirely wasted. Finally, we may reckon among the claims of the Carpathians the pleasure which a few persons may find in investigating the geology of a comparatively little known district, which is rich in some kinds of minerals.

Here we stop, because it must be doubtful on which side of the account the next item should be placed. The population, as we have said, is in many respects interesting to the intelligent inquirer. There may be found Jews flourishing abundantly like their ancestors in old days, in spite of the general hatred of the surrounding population. They are despised, and forced to wear a characteristic dress, but their talents for industry enable them to monopolize the commerce of the country, whilst their general ability is strikingly illustrated by the fact that they do most of the journalizing of the country. Here, too, is the headquarters of the Gipsy race, who find a congenial abode in the vast stretches of uncultivated territory; and here are the curious German colonies which were introduced during the middle ages to fill up gaps in the population, and who preserve many of the early characteristics of their forefathers, besides showing a true German aptitude for education. Then there are the Slavs, whom Captain Hutchinson regards as stupid, semi-barbarous, but hardiested, besides the Poles and Magyars. There are Greek, Catholic, and Protestant churches; and, in short, the ethnologist and the politician may find interesting material for observation. On the other hand, the population, though scientifically interesting, is apt to be socially disagreeable. It is not indeed otherwise than friendly, but it has the practical disadvantage—to which tourists are apt to be specially sensitive—of being unmistakably dirty. The philosophy of washing is not yet understood in those remote districts. Long, lean, and hungry fleas swarm in every out of the way inn, and rejoice greatly at the scent of fresh British blood. The means of communication are naturally defective. Rough springless carts threaten at every jolt to upset the whole internal organization of the tourist. Roads are mere incoherent tracks. As a general rule, the bridges have been swept away by floods; and it is not at all uncommon for people to be drowned in the attempt to cross the streams by the fords which are the only substitutes. Captain Hutchinson indeed was accompanied by his wife, and we must therefore admit that, in spite of dirt and discomfort, it is possible for an English lady to encounter the hardships of Carpathian travelling. That she has accomplished this feat is highly creditable to Mrs. Hutchinson, and we desire to express our respect for her courage and good temper. Yet we fear that she is likely for some time to come to find more admirers than imitators.

When, in short, Captain Hutchinson advises us to try the Carpathians, we have no objection to any of our friends making the experiment, but it should certainly be made with the full consciousness that it is by no means so pleasant or easy a task as taking a trip to Switzerland or Norway, or any of the more recognized centres of travel. Ultimately, as roads and railways advance it may become popular. Till then it must be confined to the adventurers, who find in the charm of comparative novelty a sufficient recompense for dirt, fleas, bad beds, jolting carriages, questionable food, uncomfortable inns, an ignorant and inarticulate population, and a general absence of the conveniences of civilized life. There are many such people, however, and some of them are ladies; so we will hope that Captain Hutchinson's experiment may bear fruit, and at any rate we may admit that he has written a pleasant little book, proving that two English people at least can deviate with pleasure from the beaten round of the domestic tourist.

WINE.*

WHAT to drink would appear to be becoming one of the great questions of the day. Beer is still the national beverage of England, and is gradually supplanting cider in the Southern counties and whisky in Ireland and Scotland. But pure beer can hardly be obtained except at a high price and in oak, and the ordinary beer of the public-house is at once nasty and deleterious. The teetotallers, who are anxious to suppress the sale and consumption of all intoxicating liquors, have just been thrown on the defensive by medical attacks on their favourite beverages. The inhabitants of the metropolis are warned that the water supplied for their use is only a saturated solution of sewage matter, teeming with lively organisms; and more recently tea has been denounced as a drink which depresses rather than cheers, and produces results a great deal worse than inebriation. It is asserted that a deterioration of health among the working classes and a lowered vitality in the rising generation may be distinctly traced to the use of tea. In a debate in the House of Commons an advocate of the abolition of the Malt-tax has attributed the frequent baldness of our young men to the same cause. To recommend milk to the working classes is pretty much like proposing pie-crust as a substitute for bread at famine prices. The reduction of the wine duties has made wine popular with the middle classes, but it is beginning to be understood that the cheap light wines which were to regenerate the nation are often by no means light in the sense of purity and wholesomeness, and that their cheapness is too frequently of the kind which is proverbially associated with and accounted for by nastiness. It is impossible to doubt that the increased demand for wine has in the first instance produced an injurious effect on the character of the wines which are sent into the market. The supply of pure wine is not equal to the demand; and the keen competition of the trade and the general ignorance of consumers offer a strong temptation to provide quantity at the expense of quality. The ordinary dealers as well as the public have been overwhelmed by the number and variety of wines now brought into the market. As long as port and sherry were the staple articles of commerce the dealers had certain well-known conventional tastes to guide them; the public knew what it wanted, and, on the whole, probably got what it wanted. But since claret has come into general use, and especially since it has come to be understood that claret is a name of unknown derivation for an immense variety of wines of the most different characters, the public and the dealers are equally at sea. The popular taste for wine is in a transition state, and it is natural perhaps that a good deal of confusion and disappointment should be the result. Most people would be very much indebted to any one who would enlighten them on this subject, who would explain the qualities which render wine wholesome or unwholesome, the causes of these qualities, and the considerations which should be kept in view in the choice of wines for ordinary use. It cannot be said that the literature of oenology is scanty. It is calculated that it embraces some six hundred works, and of these Dr. Thudichum and Dr. Dupré, who have just added another to the series, profess to have read two hundred; but we cannot say that their handsome and imposing volume gives us what we want. We doubt whether it will be found sufficiently precise and comprehensive in all respects for the practical wine-grower or manufacturer, and it is certainly too scientific, or rather too technical—an important distinction—for the ordinary reader, who, after a few pages of dibromosuccinic acids, monobromomalates, basic radicals, and the rest of it, will probably find his head begin to spin. Strictly speaking, it seems to us to be a work on the chemical analysis of French wines. The greater part of the volume is devoted to this subject, and the chapters on other wines are scanty and superficial. The authors have collected a great deal of valuable information by personal visits to the vineyards, and by elaborate experiments with regard to the wines of France; and it would have been well if they had confined themselves to a branch of the subject on which they are entitled to speak with some authority. Their observations on Greek, Hungarian, and other wines appear to have been got up at second hand, and to be in some respects prejudiced and inaccurate. The general reader will find all he wants set forth in a more intelligible form in Dr. Druitt's interesting book on cheap wines.

* A Treatise on the Origin, Nature, and Varieties of Wine: being a complete Manual of Viticulture and Oenology. By J. L. W. Thompson, M.D., and August Dupré, Ph.D., Lecturer on Chemistry at Westminster Hospital. London: Macmillan & Co.

* Try Cracow and the Carpathians. By Captain Hutchinson. London: Chapman & Hall, 1873.

What strikes one most strongly in reading Dr. Thudichum and Dr. Dupré's Treatise, or indeed any other work on the production of wine, is the relentless and almost universal conspiracy against the pure natural juice of the grape into which wine-growers and manufacturers appear to have entered. It is well known that port and sherry are more or less artificial concoctions, the better sorts of which really have genuine port or sherry as an element in their composition; but large quantities of liquor are sold under these names in which there is not a drop of the genuine wine. The chief business of the Roussillon vineyards is to supply a wine which is exported into Portugal, to be there doctored into so-called port, and it need hardly be said that the ceremony of a visit to Portugal is not unfrequently omitted. There are also white French wines which are similarly used to a large extent in the manufacture of sherry. There is, of course, such a thing as pure champagne, but it is seldom to be met with, and the ordinary champagne of commerce is notoriously an artificial production. The manufacture of champagne in the region which goes by that name is stated to have increased from five millions of bottles in 1834 to between twenty-five and thirty millions at the present day. But real champagne is grown only in the prefectures of Rheims and Eprenay, within a comparatively narrow area; and although it is known that the war must in various ways have seriously interfered with the cultivation of the vineyards, it does not seem to have caused any falling off in the yield of wine. Both Bordeaux and Burgundy wines are also assuming more of an artificial character. Hermitage is now produced chiefly for the purpose of mixing with the colder growths of the Gironde; and Châteauneuf-du-Pape and the Beaujolais wines are almost exclusively used as materials for being mixed and doctored into Burgundy. The wines which are chiefly drunk in France are the vins de Midi—cheap natural wines which, though sometimes rather sharp and rough, are a sound, wholesome, genial drink, and mix well with water. But Frenchmen now complain that they can no longer obtain these wines in their natural form, and that they are adulterated in the making in order that they may be mixed up with other wines and passed off at a higher price under some famous name. The doctoring of the common wines with brandy is openly practised on the quays of Bordeaux; and sugar and brandy would seem to be the chief constituents of Burgundy. Dr. Thudichum and Dr. Dupré say that they have seen as much as twenty pounds of sugar to the "piece" added to Bordeaux, and they attribute to this addition much of the fierceness and alcoholicity of this kind of wine, and its injurious effects on those who drink it. A curious instance of the tendency of natural wines to get supplanted by imitations is afforded by the decline of the Muscat wines. It has been discovered that there is a close resemblance between the flavour of Muscat and the flavour of tincture of elder-flower; and a drink is made out of the latter, with the aid of alcohol, sugar, and a little tartaric acid, which is asserted to be in many cases superior in flavour, and "certainly in purity," add our authors, to the true Muscat of Lunel. Hence Muscat has lost its standing. It is with this elder-flower extract that the sparkling Moselle wines are flavoured. It goes by the name of "Essence of Muscatel," but not a grape of muscatel is grown on the Moselle or anywhere in that region, fit for wine-making; nor has Moselle wine naturally the slightest muscatel flavour. It is satisfactory to know that elder-flower juice is not prejudicial to health. It has, we are assured, "from time immemorial been used to make a high-flavoured tea for the treatment of slight indispositions."

It appears to be becoming continually more difficult to get anything like the pure juice of the grape in its best natural condition. From first to last the grape is sacrificed to the conditions of artificial manufacture. For wine-making grapes are at their best when fully ripe; but then colour has to be considered; and the colour required by the trade for red wines, as well as the pale hue deemed essential to champagne, can only be obtained from immature grapes. Hence the highest quality of wine is sacrificed for the sake of a conventional dye. In order to protect wine from the effects of careless and hasty manufacture, it has to be "fortified." Sugar has then to be added in order to conceal the brandy. But sugared wine turns acid on the stomach, and people who have suffered in this way, being ignorant of the real cause of their uneasiness, are shy of wine in which they detect an acid flavour. "Plastering," which is the addition of lime either to the crushed grapes or to the fermenting liquor, is therefore resorted to in order to check acidity. Its effect is to remove the natural acids, which are not only harmless but wholesome, and to reinforce the real offender, sugar, with sulphates of a highly purgative character. It is said that one lie breeds another; and it would appear that the first step in adulteration inevitably entails a progressive series of deleterious processes. One of the most startling passages in Dr. Thudichum's and Dr. Dupré's Treatise is the account they give of what are called "Sugar Infusion Wines." The manufacture of wine is now conducted on such highly scientific principles that grapes are gradually being dispensed with. According to Petiot's process, 60 hectolitres of juice can be converted into 285 hectolitres of so-called wine, by adding a sufficient quantity of sugar and water to make up the difference and squeezing the husks of the grapes five times over. In their chemical enthusiasm Drs. Thudichum and Dupré are so enchanted with the ingenuity of this remarkable decoction that they declare it to be not only equal, but superior, to real wine. There is no accounting for tastes, and if people prefer "sugar infusions" to wine they are at liberty to please themselves; but it is surely going rather too far to call them wine.

It is perhaps just as well that the science of factitious wine-making should have reached this advanced stage. When the manufacturers of sham wines shall have finally abandoned the use of the grape, as a weak superstition of primitive times, the owners of vineyards will perhaps begin to reflect that they had better take their stand on the wholesome purity of the natural juice. The authors of this Treatise justly observe, though from their praise of sugar infusions it may be doubted whether they appreciate the full force of the observation, that the more the produce of a distinct variety of wine becomes obscured by mixing, or sweetening, or brandying, the easier it is to imitate it. Hitherto the wine-growers have been playing into the hands of their most dangerous rivals. It is impossible to imitate successfully the best juice of the grape; but the more the juice is mixed and doctored, the less important it becomes as an ingredient, and the easier it is to do without it. It is also consoling to reflect that, though there is at present a great run on particular districts which cannot possibly meet the demands made upon them, and which are in fact ceasing to supply the genuine wines which made them famous, the vine is cultivated over a vast area, and that there is no lack of pure grape-juice in the world to be had for the asking. From this point of view a map which is printed in the volume before us, showing the limits of the cultivation of the vine in the Northern hemisphere, is highly encouraging. The Northern limit, beginning north of the Azores—leaps to the south of England without touching our shores, enters France at Vannes in Brittany, touches Marseilles, and goes on past Alençon and Beauvais. Then trending northward it runs through Rhenish Prussia to the north of Saxony, crosses the Carpathians, traverses Southern Russia almost in a straight line to the upper end of the Caspian Sea, and so on to the Amoor and the Pacific. The Southern line starts near the Equator in the Atlantic Ocean, enters Africa at about the 30th degree of Northern latitude, and quits it about the middle of the Isthmus of Suez, crosses Arabia and the Persian Sea, and entering India, forms a loop which embraces the whole interior of the country, excluding all the seaboard, and again passing to the North, traverses China to the 27th degree of Northern latitude. These are the limits of what may be called the culture of the grape; but vines grow both north and south of the limits we have described, only those in the north do not ripen save under exceptional circumstances, while in the south the vine, becoming an evergreen in which all stages of growth are represented at the same time, is unable to mature its fruit in perfection, and loses some of its best qualities. What the vine requires is not a high average temperature, but a maximum of summer heat; and this is the reason why, except under artificial treatment, the vine does not ripen in our own country. In North America it is grown within similar limits to those in Europe. Wine is produced in Peru, South Africa, and Australia, but the geographical distribution of the vine in the Southern hemisphere does not seem as yet to be well understood. Without troubling ourselves, however, about such remote regions, there seems to be no doubt that nearer home, in Europe itself, there are countries from which we may hope in time to get abundance of good wine, and which at present are only beginning to be tapped. The important thing is, that the public should appreciate the merits of genuine wine, and should insist on having it pure and unadulterated.

FIGUIER'S DAY AFTER DEATH.*

SUCH of our readers as have been of late years familiar with Brussels have most likely been lured into the Wiertz Gallery of pictures. A bequest dictated by inordinate vanity, that wondrous collection—in which the gigantesque vies with the libidinous and the horrible for the palm of what is most to be abhorred in art, a damocles hereditaria to the morals and aesthetic tastes of the Belgian capital—displays as the masterpiece of the painter's genius a kind of triptic, or composition in three tableaux, representing the sensations or impressions of a soul at three successive intervals of a day after decapitation by the guillotine. In the first moment after death the artist's fancy seeks to delineate the effect of the spasmodic parting of the head from the trunk. With the horrible recoil the body is seen turning a wild somersault amidst vague and fleeting shapes retaining some shadowy resemblance of the spectators and the scenery of the scaffold. Of the deepening horrors of the later scenes—the whirling jets of blood, the bursts of flame of every hue that the palette can supply to a teeming and ghastly fancy, the loathsome shapes of snakes or nameless creeping things, the gibbering demons, and the rest—we can trust ourselves to say no more than that the whole forms an inferno in the worst possible taste on the part of the designer, and most corrupting in the ideas and associations which it is likely to conjure up in the mind of the beholder. Never has the imagination of a painter been let loose upon a theme more alien to the true aims and interests of art, and never has a domain of thought which the instinct and tradition of mankind have at all times united to keep sacred from rash and presumptuous intrusion been invaded with more coarse or unholy tread.

M. Figuiet's Day after Death, though involuntarily bringing to our recollection some features of the audacious creation of M. Wiertz's fancy, is, we are bound to say, wholly free from the like objection on the ground of ethics or even of taste. There is nothing in his treatment of the subject to jar upon our sense of decency, or to outrage the feeling of reverence with which we would always handle the subject of death. There is nevertheless a rashness in thus entering upon the mysteries of the after-state, giving the rein to the loosest impulses of fancy, which constitutes hardly less glaring an offence against the canons of sobriety and propriety. It is at all events a travesty of scientific accuracy or truth to talk of the utterly gratuitous and speculative picture of the future life set forth in this book as being "according to science." Between the facts which M. Figuiet has been at the pains and ingenuity to string together from the discoveries of astronomy or physiology, and the results which the process of death may entail upon the conscious being, there is not the faintest logical connexion. They are simply incommensurable quantities. It was not, indeed, at the oracle of science that the author himself in the first instance acquired the wisdom which he so confidently imparts to the world. During the greater part of his life he confesses his belief to have been, in common with that of every body else, that the problem was wholly out of our reach, and that true wisdom lay in not troubling our minds about it. The loss of an only son set him thinking intensely upon the subject. After seeking, with but little effect, it would appear from the exact sciences what positive information they could furnish him, he proceeded to interrogate ignorant and simple people, "peasants in their villages, and unlettered men in towns, an ever-ready source of aid in reascending towards the true principles of nature," as not being perverted by the "progress of education, or by the routine of a commonplace philosophy." Out of the mounds of babes and sucklings, then, we must peruse, in the first instance at least, and by the aid of the docti spirituales of field-labourers and working-men—who, it seems, are to be looked to for a philosophy as much above the commonplace or old-world sort, as their political wisdom is to transcend that of the lawgivers and rulers of old time—the author has constructed for himself an entire system of ideas concerning the new life of man which is to follow his terrestrial existence:—

But his system is all contained in nature. Each organised being is attached to another which precedes, and another which follows it, in the chain of the living creation. The plant and the animal, the animal and the man, are linked, soldered to one another; the moral and physical order meet and mingle. It results from this, that any one who believes himself to have discovered the explanation of any one fact concerning this organisation is speedily led to extend this explanation to all living beings, to reconstruct, link by link, the great chain of nature. Thus it was with the author of this book. After having sought out the destination of man when dismissed from his terrestrial life, he was led to apply his views to all other living beings, to animals, and then to plants. The power of logic forced him to study those beings, impossible to be seen by our organs of vision, by which he holds the planets, the sun, and all the innumerable stars dispersed over the vast extent of the heavens, to be inhabited. So that you will find in this book, not only an attempt at the solution of the problem of the future life by science, but also the statement of a complete theory of nature, of a true philosophy of the universe.

M. Figuiet has long ago so thoroughly exhausted all mundane or material departments of knowledge as to have roused our curiosity as to what realm or sphere of thought he would next select for the flight of his peculiar genius. Not only the earth and the sea, with all that inhabits them, but the marvels of electricity and of animal magnetism, having been explored or worked out as mines of novelty or sensation, he must have found himself sighing, like Alexander of old, for new worlds to conquer. In the path of enterprise now struck out by him he enjoys the advantage of having it all to himself, as well as that of not being summarily brought up by a hedge of stiff and impassable facts. Starting from the formula of the "human aggregate" or threefold nature of man, as laid down by the medical school of Montpellier, M. Figuiet establishest himself with the assumption that the body, together with the life or "vital force" of Barthez, and the soul or "intimate sense" of Lordat, make up the constitution of man as a "perfected soul dwelling in a living body." Body and life both perish by death, the soul alone surviving. What is then the habitat of the soul, or, as M. Figuiet proceeds to call it, "the superhuman being;" the body, its former tenement, and its joint tenant, the soul, being no more? It must be somewhere beyond the range of atmospheric air, the habitat of animal and vegetable life. Universal and immemorial tradition assigning heaven as the place of sojourn, the only question is what is the nature of this heavenly space? Ether, being in the view of science the fluid which is spread everywhere throughout interplanetary or stellar space, must forthwith be that in which superhuman beings float and dwell. That oxygen, the breath of bodily life, is not contained in ether M. Figuiet is pretty safe in assuming. He concludes then that ether is no other than "hydrogen rarified by the absence of pressure," feeling fortified herein by the observations made during recent eclipses, which point to a solar atmosphere of burning hydrogen gas. But are all souls, good and bad alike, at home in this gaseous ether, and do all find themselves at the same level of flotation? This would obviously be unjust. M. Figuiet is not prepared to dogmatize upon this point, or to insist upon the particular process which is to separate the good grain from the tares. As a matter of individual sentiment, however, he wishes his idea of the subject to be recorded:—

It seems to us that the human soul, in order to rise to the ethereal spaces, needs to have acquired that last degree of perfection which sets it free from every besetting weight; that it must be subtle, light, purified, beautiful, and that only under such conditions can it quit the earth, and soar towards the heavens. To our fancy, the human soul is like a celestial astronaut, who flies towards the sublimest heights with swift strength, because it is free from all impurity. But the soul of a perverse, wicked, vile, gross, base, cowardly man has not been purified, perfected, or lightened. It is weighed down by evil passions and gross appetites, which he has not sought to repress, but has, on the contrary, cultivated. It cannot rise to the celestial heights, it is constrained to dwell upon our melancholy and miserable earth.

The sun being the first and essential cause of life, what is more likely, asks M. Figuiet, than that the rays which that luminary pours upon the earth and other planets are nothing else than emanations from the pure spirits who have qualified themselves to dwell in that central starry abode? Freed from all earthly alloy, from all material substances, the new being is a flame or breath; all is intelligence, thought in him. "He is an absolute soul, a soul without a body." The gaseous and burning mass of which the sun is composed is therefore appropriate to receive these quintessential beings. "A throne of fire is a fitting throne for souls." It has been usual to reserve the fiery abode for the opposite class of souls to those whom M. Figuiet sums upon flaming thrones. We consequently look with some curiosity, not to say concern, for what he has in view for the wicked. The bad and impotent man gets off, we are bound to say, much lighter than we could have expected. But then M. Figuiet's amiable optimism unites him for, inducing or even contemplating pain. The evil, gross, and heavy soul, too material to float upwards like a celestial astronaut, remains below to reascend at a certain time. The transmigration of souls occurs, we find, at the programme of the Day after Death. The evil soul enters a shell into a new human body; not, we perceive, that the body of any lower animal. There is, however, no recollection of the previous state of existence. But what then, objects the sceptic, becomes of identity and of the process of retribution and recovery? Is not the individual reduced to nothingness? M. Figuier feels the difficulty, but is equal to it. "This oblivion is but for a while, it is part of the soul's punishment." As the perfecting process goes forward, the recollections of the past will return. The soul will recall the evil actions of its previous existence, or manifold existences, if it has gone through many, and this thought will form its chastisement even in the blissful abode to which it shall at length have attained. What we fear is the indisposition, on these terms, to the recuperative process on the part of the lost soul, on the ground that ignorance is bliss, or that it is best to let sleeping dogs lie; no severer penalty being in store for the lowest criminal than this rolling again uphill as before the stone of life, and that without being vexed by the ghosts of former failures. "The explanation of the banishment of the wicked which we offer," says M. Figuier, "is at least preferable to the hell of the Christian creed." So at all events will the wicked say. There remains the problem of infants, or immature souls. What and where are they the day after death? M. Figuier is, we need hardly say, ready here also. When an infant dies before it has lived one year, the period of dentition, its soul, "disengaging itself from the little corpse," passes into another newly-born baby, and after this fresh incarnation begins a second life. As regards the form wherewith this superhuman being is invested in its new condition, our author excuses himself from delineating it to the full. All he can say is, that, being not absolutely immaterial, but having a body in some sort, whilst having to float in a fluid so excessively subtle and rarefied as ether, there must be a "slight material tissue, animated by life, a vaporous, diaphanous drapery of living matter." The necessity for food, he feels confident, is spared to these ethereal creatures, the mere inspiration of the fluid in which they float sufficing for their nutrition and refreshment. That their sole physiological function lies in that of the inhalation of ether may be readily conceived from our seeing a whole class of animals—the batrachian—for whose respiration the bare and simple skin suffices. "Sleep is unknown, and would be of no use when physical reparation is not required. Reproduction, the function of inferior worlds, being superseded by perpetual recruitment from the preparatory state, the distinctions of sex will be no more. Into what will be the intellectual, the moral, or the æsthetic perfections of this final and fully sublimated state we should only follow M. Figuier at the risk of losing ourselves. We can but wait in patient trust for the good time when the blissful prospect may be realized in our own case. Then every problem will be as clear as the noonday. Even now, whatever distracts and puzzles us here below is mere child's play to the bright intelligences overhead, or, if M. Figuier is right, in the very orb of light itself. "He who is regarded by mankind as a genius of the first order, an Aristotle, a Kepler, a Newton, a Baffinelle, a Shakespeare, a Molière, a Laplace, a Lavoisier, a Cuvier, a Victor Hugo, would be among them a babbling child. No science, no moral idea is above their conception." We should for our part require no further proof of their stupendous intellectual development than to be satisfied that they had eyes to see the grounds on which M. Figuier builds up so queer an edifice of fancy as that of his Day after Death.

* The Day after Death; or, Our Future Life according to Science. Translated from the French of Louis Figuiet. Illustrated by 10 Astronomical Plates. London: Bentley & Son. 1872.

MINOR POETS.*

THE author of Olrig Grange possesses so much power that we cannot but regret that he should have selected a form of composition for which he is but slightly qualified. His poem is dramatic in form, and yet the poet is never able to keep himself out of sight. His five or six characters each in turn think aloud through a great many stanzas, but, however different the subject of their thoughts may be, the mode of regarding each matter and the form of expression are all of a piece. Then, too, however much the hero might be capable of a long train of reflections and self-analysis, it is absurd to suppose that the heroine's mother, for instance, a fashionably-religious or religiously-fashionable woman, would be capable of such a sustained effort. Each character for the most part expresses himself with a certain amount of vigour, and at times with a good deal of poetical power, but we often feel the same kind of astonishment at what they say that would come over us if we were to hear Mr. Ayrton talk pleasantly or Mr. Whalley wisely. It is curious to notice too that the speeches of all the characters are of almost exactly the same length. Whether Mater Domina loquatur, or Pater, or Thorold, or Hester, or Rose, they require each a soliloquy of about twenty-four pages, or some 450 lines, to express their thoughts. Thorold, indeed, in the second speech which is granted him as hero, fills thirty pages—no bad allowance of talk for a man in the last stage of consumption. The doctors when they came must have done more than tapped, and stethoscoped, and spoke of sales,

And lesions, and adhesions and deaf parts,
Cells, attacks, mucus, coughs and blisterings.

To have strung up a consumptive hero to 500 or 600 lines of talk straight on end on the very morning of his death must be a feat unparalleled, if not in dramatic poetry, at all events in the annals of medicine. Each of the speeches is introduced by a short commentary by the editor, one Hermann Kunst, Philol. Professor. Though these parts of the poem have not the liveliness and vigour of the others, yet, not pretending to be in any way dramatic, they are much more natural, and on the whole more interesting. The reader perhaps as he goes through them is haunted rather too much by a remembrance of Wordsworth. It is difficult to believe that the following passage, good though it is in its way, would have stood exactly as it does if the author had not been familiar with the poem of the Brothers:—

Trained for a priest, for that is still the pride
And high ambition of the Scottish mother,
There was a kind of priestly purity
In him, and a deep, solemn undertone
Ran through his gayest fancies, and his heart
Reached out with manifold sympathies, and laid
Fast hold on many outcast and alone
I the world.

We have so many poets who form themselves on Mr. Tennyson just in those very points where he has formed himself on Wordsworth, that it is some comfort to find that the author of Olrig in his blank verse, so far as he is an imitator, is not at all events the copy of a copy. Perhaps the dramatic portions of his poem are more suggestive of the Poet-Laureate, but yet they have a merit of their own. The following stanza, taken from the brother's recollections of the happy childhood he and his sister had spent together, is pretty enough, and is a fair specimen of what our readers may expect if they will read the poem through:—

How sweet the old brook tinkles still Through daisy mead and golden broom,
Where once we placed our water-mill,
And heard it clicking in the gloom,
Hushed, sleepless, in our little room!
Yonder, we caught the tiny trout—
Our first—you carried it about
All day, complaining of its doom,
And trying each pool if its life were gone out.

The book is by no means all sentimental. There is a good deal of vigorous writing on many of the faults of the age, which keeps the story from growing wearisome. Altogether, considerable as are the faults of Olrig Grange, unmelodious as is at times the versification, yet we will venture to assert that any one who takes it up will not willingly put it down till he has reached the last line of the last stanza.

Mr. Peter Bayne tells us that he has not spared himself "careful study" of the times about which he writes, but that he finds that "in none of the books upon the subject which I have seen has adequate importance been assigned or, to speak with more precision, sufficient space been allotted to the part played by Queen Jezebel." We trust that the claims of that somewhat grasping lady will be satisfied at last, and that she will allow that in Mr. Peter Bayne's 212 pages she has been allotted at all events sufficient space. At the time of the old Exhibition of 1851 no complaint, we remember, was more common than that some country had been unfairly treated, in that sufficient space had not been allotted to it. It is somewhat curious to see the merits and claims of "historical personages" similarly estimated by square measure, and to find that, if only justice has been done by the historian, the foot-rule will quite as correctly show a man's greatness as his height. Mr. Peter Bayne accounts for the insufficient space assigned to Jezebel "in the records we possess of her reign," by the hatred which was felt for her by their Hebrew authors. It is satisfactory to find that after his careful study he can say that "this hatred did not, I believe, induce them to deviate from strict veracity." Jezebel they naturally regarded as "a supremely disagreeable subject, and they said as little of her as they could." If Mr. Peter Bayne had followed them in their reticence, and, regarding Jezebel as he does as a supremely agreeable subject, had yet managed to say as little of her as he could, he would have earned the gratitude of at all events one reader. Besides the 212 pages of poetry, we have a preface of twenty-six pages, in which we learn, among other things, that "Jezebel might regard herself as the missionary of a nobler, kinder, more expansive civilization than that which so sternly defied her," and that "the seamen of Sidon first directed their vessels by the Pole Star." As Mr. Peter Bayne makes Jezebel quote Homer, or at least refer to him, as he guards himself in his preface by stating "that the likelihood is that the poet lived about half a century earlier." Mr. Peter Bayne, like every one else, has a choice of some five or six centuries, in either of which he can place Homer at his pleasure, in the full certainty that he has some great authority on whom to rest his decision. When once, however, he has placed Homer fifty years before Jezebel, it is too bad to place one of Homer's heroes some years after Jezebel. It is pleasing, no doubt, to see Jezebel introduced in a domestic light, and to find that a lady who as queen was so given to killing prophets could nevertheless be "dear sent" to a * Olrig Grange. Edited by Hermann Kunst, Philol. Professor. Glasgow: James Macdonald. 1872.

The Days of Jezebel: an Historical Drama. By Peter Bayne. London: Strahan & Co. 1872.

Fly Leaves. By C. S. C., Author of "Verses and Translations." Cambridge: Deighton, Bell, & Co. 1872.

Scenes from Turkey. London: Chapman & Hall. 1872.

King Charles the Second: an Historical Drama in Five Acts. By Joseph Langford, Author of "Howard Alston and the War Witch," "Gibbs's Impressions," &c. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

young girl. It is pleasing, too, to find that if the great Queen had rather lax notions about a neighbour's vineyard, yet when she had got any grapes she did not keep them all to herself. In fact, so generous is she in giving them away, that her niece cries out:—

Oh, thank you, aunt, so many!
I like the grapes of Kabool.

It is in many ways pleasant to find that the grateful niece is no other than Dido, and to learn that at the age of ten she showed so much character that Aunt Jezebel exclaims, "Another kiss, my mimic heroine." Nevertheless we find ourselves involved in a chronological difficulty from which all Mr. Peter Bayne's study will scarcely set us free. If Homer lived fifty years before Jezebel, Æneas must have visited Carthage more than fifty years before Jezebel. How he managed there to inspire Dido with love, who, according to Mr. Peter Bayne, was not born till more than forty years later, we cannot even pretend to guess. Of Mr. Peter Bayne's chronology we may say as Ahab did of Jezebel's tear, that it "is maddening." He, as doubtless the best thing to be done under circumstances so trying to his reason, asks to be allowed to "kiss it ere it overflows the quivering eyelid." When Jezebel, "repelling him softly with her hand," declines to allow this, he thereupon makes some long speeches, and at the end of nineteen pages offers to kiss her again. We shall not, however, waste any time on Mr. Peter Bayne, but shall leave him to explain his chronology as best he may. As for his dramatic poetry, the following extract will suffice, by way of specimen:—

The acrid foam upon the wrinkling lip
Of turbulence, that feels the sovereign eye
Restrain it, is as weak as frothy film
Left on the sand, which you and I have oft
At Eldon marked, when the down-going storm
Led back the baffled surges, and it lay
Sun-dried and impotent. Then wherefore weep?

Though a parody, however clever it may be, rightly holds only a very low place in literature, nevertheless it deserves to rank far higher than those mere imitations of poetry which in all good faith are put forth by their authors as original. Of the poets who are at present inviting our notice we could pick out a score or so who have all the faults of the parodist but none of his merit. As we read their verses we are constantly reminded of some one of the leading poets of the day, and while we are reminded, we are at the same time wearied and annoyed. For a moment or two we may be amused at seeing in what perfect simplicity these writers believe in their own originality, and, in the words of one of them, apologize for having "consciously or unconsciously adopted one or two phrases and images" from some of the leading authors of the day. If, as in the early days of Rome, an ox could still speak, we should just as soon expect to find one of those animals, when engaged in chewing the cud, tell us that all the food it brought up had grown in its own stomach, and apologize for having consciously or unconsciously borrowed a blade or two of grass from the field. We gladly therefore turn from those poets who, without intending to do so, are ever reminding us of Mr. Tennyson or Mr. Browning, to a writer like C. S. C., who from the beginning owns that he is not an original poet, and is contented with parodying the poets of the day. The little volume before us contains not a few pieces which we could select for quotation, had we only space. We must content ourselves with merely noticing the ballad with the burden of "Butter and Eggs and a Pound of Cheese"—a burden by the way which is quite as sensible and nearly as musical as the "Two Red Roses across the Moon" of one of the greatest among our younger poets. One of the best parodies in the whole book is that on Mr. Tennyson's poem of "The Brook." A travelling tinker meets the poet, and thus begins to tell his adventures:—

I loiter down by thorp and town;
For any job I'm willing;
Take here and there a dusty brown,
And here and there a shilling.
I deal in every ware in turn,
I've rings for buddin' Sally
That sparkle like those eyes of her'n;
I've liquor for the valet.
I steal from th' parson's strawberry plots,
I hide by th' squire's covers;
I teach the sweet young housemaids what's
The art of trapping lovers.
The things I've done 'neath moon and stars
Have got me into messes;
I've seen the sky through prison bars,
I've torn up prison dresses.

After one or two or more verses equally good, the poet in his own person thus concludes the story:—

Thus on he prattled like a babbling brook.
Then I, "The sun has slipped behind the hill,
And my aunt Vivian dines at half-past six."
So in all love we parted; I to the Hall,
They to the village. It was noised next noon
That chickens had been missed at Syllabub Farm.

Many people, as every one knows, are inclined to estimate poetry rather by the difficulties which the author has had to overcome than by any consideration of the intrinsic value of his productions. So a copy of verses which, if composed by a literary man, would be passed over with indifference, would excite great admiration if it were known that they had been composed by a cobbler as he patched up old shoes, or by a tailor as he stitched away at a pair of breeches. And yet if a cobbler in his leisure time were to turn out a pair of breeches, or a tailor a pair of shoes, no one, so far as we know, would be lost in admiration at the skill of a man who, while knowing how to do one thing well, yet was able to do another thing ill. The author of Poems from Turkey may, however, come before the public with a certain claim to attention from the novelty of the trade which he combines with the poet's art. While there are few trades which cannot boast their bard, we doubt if, till the present case, poetry and firework-making have ever been combined. Not, indeed, that there is any inconsistency between the two arts. A cracker scarcely surpasses in sound, and fully equals in sense, many odes, and not a few sonnets flare away for a short space bravely like a squib, to end like it in unmeaning noise. Our author, in a modest preface, though he does not give us his name, yet lets us into part of his history. He spent fourteen months at Constantinople, where he "superintended (under His Excellency Halil Pasha) the Sultan's firework displays." He adds:—

It may perhaps be worth noticing here that the Franco-German war was raging between me and "home" during the greater part of the time. Also that I am intimately connected with the Crystal Palace firework displays.

How the Crystal Palace firework displays bear on the volume before us we hardly know. We once knew an old organist who answered all attacks on his style of playing by the assertion that as his singing, when a boy in the choir at Windsor, had pleased his Sacred Majesty George IV., it was not too much to assume that he knew how to play an organ in a parish church. In like manner we shall expect to find our author as poet maintain that a man who is "intimately connected with the Crystal Palace firework displays" must know how to write poems, and as firework-maker maintain that a man who knows how to write poems must know how to make fireworks. We trust, however, for the sake of the shareholders in the Crystal Palace that his squibs and crackers are better composed than such lines as the following:—

The coup d'œil the scene affords
Who can adequately tell?
Who can represent in words (and well)
A city's indescribable
Agglomeration? Magnificence,
And multitude, and meanness dense,
In vast confusion lying outspread,
Where'er the captive eye is led,
From casque to minaret to range,
'Midst everything so strangely strange.

We cannot pretend to have read through the historical drama in five acts of King Charles the Second. We have dipped into it in places, and while we are ready to allow that it is in five acts, we cannot say that we have discovered anything that is either dramatic or historical. There is a great deal of fighting, and a great deal of speech-making. Cromwell makes speeches and King Charles makes speeches, and both get through a good deal of those hand-to-hand combats which are, if not dramatic, at all events peculiar to the drama. King Charles, in the battle of Worcester, finding that an officer "makes a point at his breast," parries it, and having first justified his proceeding in a speech of six lines, then slays the officer "just outside, and returns," to point out to the audience that there is "one less against me in the field." Cromwell is not behind his rival in exploits. When sent by the Council of State to Scotland, he thus takes leave:—

Farewell, my Lords. When we next meet
The population of Great Britain
Will be diminished.

He scarcely does his best to fulfil his promise, for he is contented with merely seizing his enemy by the neck, and spares his life. But the whole scene is so wonderful in itself, that we shall venture to quote a part of it. The opposing armies of England and Scotland are drawn up on the Lothian Hills, with "a repetition of Edinburgh and Leith as in Scene 2, but all at a greater distance," when

Enter a line of English soldiers, headed by their Officers, with halberds at the charge. CROMWELL draws his sword, looks at his soldiers, and points towards the Scotch army.

Soldiers, in the name of Saint George Charge home upon your enemy.
When English blood's aroused
Let all the world fall down before it!
Forward to the charge.

(Headed by CROMWELL they all charge across the stage and assault. Bugles and drums heard. One Officer returns wounded, re-crosses the stage limping and pale, and falls just outside. Several soldiers return backwards fencing with Scotch soldiers, and again drive the Scotch back and assault. Drums, &c. fainter.)

Enter a Scotch Officer backwards, fencing with CROMWELL, who drives him to the centre of the stage. The Scotch Officer's sword falls out of his hand, when CROMWELL seizes him by the neck.

CROMWELL. Rebel of the empire!
You are my prisoner; your life
Deserves no custody, but an Englishman
Never takes advantage of his enemy.

Imposing as are the great military displays in this drama, perhaps even more effective is the civic show with which it closes. The scene is laid in "Whitehall Palace and adjoining grounds." The King faces the audience, while all the great personages of State "have arranged themselves down the stage R. and L., leaving room for maids of honour to enter R. and L. next the footlights."

General Monk makes a speech, and Charles makes a speech. and then the dramatic portion of the play thus closes:—

LORD MAYOR. God save the King. Hip! hip!

CORTEGE. Hurrah!

LORD MAYOR. Hip! hip!

CORTEGE. Hurrah!

LORD MAYOR. Hip! hip!

CORTEGE. Hurrah!

The curtain, however, does not finally fall till King Charles "has commanded the Company to sing the National Anthem, in honour of our reigning Sovereign Queen Victoria."

BAZAINE'S ARMY OF THE RHINE.*

MARSHAL BAZAINE has lately appeared among the numerous apologists for French defeat. But the Marshal is also cited to answer before a court-martial charges of misconduct which, if proved, must condemn him to the gravest penalty that military law can inflict. And although it is his own choice to fling his elaborate defence broadcast through a publisher at the moment when his trial is decided on, we cannot accept the task of entering into those questions with which the tribunal at Versailles will have to deal. On everything, therefore, in this work that concerns the Marshal's conduct when finally cut off and invested we shall be silent; for it is impossible to separate this part of the story from the crowning event of the capitulation. But the first seventy-five pages of the book need no such reticence in a reviewer, carrying events as they do only up to the close of the battle of Gravelotte. Whatever may be thought of the Marshal's conduct up to that point, no reasonable person would connect it with the charges arising out of the investment, which, had he been victorious at Gravelotte, would never have been begun. Yet the events of the first fortnight of the war, closing with that battle, form perhaps its most important section, and each contribution to their history from any of the chief actors must have its value, varying though that value must be according to the honesty and the power of the writer. This portion of the book, therefore, we shall deal with as though it were a complete work in itself, and separate from all that follows.

Such a narrative as that of Bazaine's, appearing at so singular a season, supposes one of two things. Either the Marshal feels his own contribution to history, honestly written, to be so necessary to truth that it cannot longer be withheld; or he has observed how seriously the charges made against his conduct in the press have affected the public mind, and has resolved in constructing his version to attempt to meet them in detail. We do not pretend to decide how far this subjective method of treating his narrative has influenced the writer. It is plain enough, however, that he is well aware of the chief points on which he is accused of falling short of his functions before the investment, as well as later; and the portions of his narrative which touch on those may be supposed to say as much as can be stated in his favour. Now the chief of these points within the limits we have fixed for our task are in four number:—The failure to support Froissard at Spicheren on the 6th of August; the delay in retreating over the Moselle; the want of determination shown after the indecisive action of Mars-la-Tour; and the general incompetency displayed at Gravelotte, especially in the matter of neutralizing the French reserves by leaving them too far off to be of service. All these are well known, indeed notorious, and we shall glance at each briefly in turn.

Marshal Bazaine's narrative of the 6th of August is well confirmed by the independent version of General Froissard, recently reviewed (March 9, 1872) in these pages. It may be well, for the sake of truth—which has been greatly distorted on this head by the careless criticism of Special Correspondents—to repeat shortly that there seems to be no foundation whatever for the alleged jealousy between Froissard and Bazaine, nor for the notion that the former wilfully refrained from calling for, or the latter from sending, aid. The simple facts are, that on the afternoon of the 5th, whilst the three corps of Bazaine, Froissard, and Ladmirault were scattered about the frontier in separate divisions, moved hitherto without any certain plan, sudden orders by the telegraph constituted the three into a wing of the whole army under Bazaine's chief direction. Hardly had he taken his charge when next morning the Prussian shock fell on Froissard, whose corps had been close to the enemy's point of concentration. The worst that can be said of Bazaine's conduct at this crisis, after careful comparison of all that has yet been printed on the subject, is that he showed no special genius for war, nor any comprehensive grasp of the situation. He kept one division with his headquarters idle at St. Avoird, conceiving that point, though so far to the rear, to be endangered by some concealed Prussian movement. One more of his own four divisions had been detached by Leboeuf's orders on Sarreguemines. The two remaining were ordered to support Froissard, one with direct, the other with somewhat vague instructions. It is sufficient to add here that their well-known non-appearance at Spicheren seems to be due to the moral timidity and irresolution of the two commanders, and to the general incompetency of the Staff which should have directed them onward, rather than to any personal fault on the part of Froissard or Bazaine. All that is distinct here in Bazaine's narrative is what that of Froissard had already made abundantly plain. In short, the general inferiority of the higher French officers, combined with the irresolution of the Emperor and Leboeuf, and the weaker numbers of the Army of the Rhine, made it a certain sacrifice on the coming collision with the North German forces, which had on their side the threefold advantages of strength, organization, and leadership.

A far more important matter as concerns Bazaine's reputation is his share in the fatal delay which allowed the French to be outflanked by their enemy, and so led finally to the investment of the Army of the Rhine by Steinmetz and Prince Frederick Charles. On this head we look in vain for a better defence of the Marshal than the stereotyped plea that he took command too late to save the force by prompt retreat. This indeed is not formally stated, for the work does not pretend to be a formal defence, but a history. But it is clearly to be inferred from the pains which Bazaine is at to show how dangerous the position was when he received his charge under the Imperial decree of the 12th. Up to that moment, it is implied, he had no responsibility, and on that day it is true the formal transfer into his hands took place. But we have long since pointed out that the Marshal, who had allowed all France, and indeed the whole civilized world, to be informed by the Emperor's telegram three days before that he was invested with the command, cannot escape the responsibility which really devolved upon him from the moment of that announcement; and this date is singularly confirmed as the true one by his own narrative, which represents him first (p. 40) as giving advice on the whole situation of the army on the 9th, the day in question.

With this section of our inquiry the battle of Borny on the 14th is much concerned; for the most striking part of the delay was the unnecessary bringing back of a part of the Fourth Corps, which had already crossed the Moselle before the action began. For this return, as well as for the circumstances that the Third Corps (Ducasse's) was unnecessarily caught out of the cover of the forts by the German onset, and was therefore dragged into a useless and prolonged action at a distinct gain of time to the enemy, Bazaine offers no direct excuse. He admits that the facts were so, and implies that his subordinates mismanaged the affair sadly. The obvious reply to this is best given by the date of Bazaine's own telegram to the Emperor, which show him at Borny superintending the retreat, shortly before the Germans attacked. French writers have first set the example of making a commander-in-chief irresponsible for the defeats brought on by his lieutenants' blunders under his own eye and within the reach of an aide-de-camp. But we are not aware that this sort of excuse has ever been admitted for lesser men than the Great Napoleon, or that his exemption in such matters is to be made a precedent. We must therefore insist, until a better rule is created, in holding Bazaine, as commander-in-chief, fully chargeable with the useless blundering of this battle of Borny, as well as with the other delay caused by the want of bridges, which the Marshal evidently considers sufficiently explained when he quotes the opinion of his chief engineer as to the difficulty caused by the flooding of the Moselle whilst the trestles were being prepared—as though there were no boats at Metz, nor any means of putting them together in default of the pontoons left in German hands near Forbach.

Our third inquiry is as to the battle of Mars-la-Tour, and the necessity of retreating from the ground held at its close. Bazaine here is evidently aware of the close discussion which has been carried on in his own country and elsewhere as to his abandonment of the attempt to move westward whilst he had yet two roads, one very far from the enemy's position, still left in his power. The imperfect victualling of his troops for the two days previous, and the want of ammunition after the battle was over, are the reasons he alleges for the necessity of his retiring on Gravelotte. But to any one who, with our present knowledge, views the matter broadly, it is plain that the argument is lost from the moment the Marshal admits that the march westward was still possible. "To turn my back upon the enemy was the necessary condition of doing this," he says; and truly under the circumstances there was nothing he should have desired so much to do with the bulk of his force. Rearguards are made for the very occasion in question. As to the defects in his supplies of cartridges, he admits that two of his four infantry corps were fully furnished; and if he had been moving away from the reserves at Metz, he would at least have drawn his pursuers equally from their reserves, whilst whatever stores were in the Meuse district would have been at his service. A note a few pages on tells us that there was an grand approvisionnement at Verdun, could the army have reached that fortress. If Bazaine did not know of this on the 16th, it must have been chiefly his own fault, as he had free telegraphic communication two days later.

As to the battle of Gravelotte itself, the charges have long since been openly made by French officers that Bazaine kept far too much to the rear to know what was really happening, and that his reserve, the Guard, was rendered useless from the same cause. This is not, as hasty readers may have supposed, or as the Manchester Guardian Correspondent would have had it, a question of personal courage. It is simply a remarkable instance of mistaken judgment. Taking Bazaine's own account as literally correct—and we see no special reason to doubt it—it is clear that whilst the whole German force assembled to the west and north-west along his front, he expected the attack to the south or behind his extreme left. "I was in the best place for looking up the valley" (of the Moselle), he says, p. 40. And the result of being in this best place was that at 7.50 P.M. (the date is from his own telegram) he knew so little of what was doing in his front that he informed the Emperor "The fire is ceasing; all the positions are throughout (conservation) maintained by our troops." "The reports I had received were not disquieting," he subsequently explains as his apology for this ignorance, apparently unconscious how, in telling the reader this, he condemns himself. In like manner he admits how late and with what caution the Guard was sent on to Canrobert's support, as if unaware how every critic will connect the delay with the enforced retirement of that Marshal from St. Privat, "which the Sixth Corps was compelled to evacuate, despite the courage and self-devotion of its chief."

* Armée du Rhin, depuis le 12 août jusqu'au 26 octobre 1870. Par le Maréchal Bazaine. Paris: Kluun. 1872.

On the whole, we lay down the book with the feeling that Marshal Bazaine would have done well not to invite fresh criticism, but to await his trial by a professional court in silence. Of the earlier charges against him Frossard had already cleared away one. The others are the more fixed on him since he has written his own version, and the whole effect of the part of his book which we have reviewed is simply to afford us one more proof of the hollowness of the Imperial system, or the weakness of the Imperial judgment, which could give the modern Augustus no better choice as general-in-chief of the Army of the Rhine than the Marshal who takes so much pains to show his own incompetency from the first for the part confided to him.

THE STORY OF A SHOWER.*

THE interest of this unpretending story turns on an entanglement for which lady novelists show a remarkable fondness. Its victims consist of a group of three—an exemplary young lady, an objectionable young lady, and a mistaken young man. The mistaken young man has plunged rashly into a matrimonial engagement with the objectionable young lady, only to discover that it was all along the exemplary young lady who was suited for him, and to whom he should have proposed. This is a favourite complication with writers of fiction. There is the struggle between loyalty and love in the bosom of the lover to be depleted; there are the gentle sorrows of the exemplary young lady, who is in a perpetual state of self-immolation, and the stormy jealousies and caprices of her objectionable, but triumphant, rival. And out of the seemingly hopeless tangle a satisfactory issue has to be found in the third volume. In the novel before us the treatment of this situation is decidedly feeble. Two at least of the characters in the foremost group lack any sustained individuality. Margaret Erne is a pale reproduction of one of those domestic paragons who have been already described with so much finish in the works of Miss Sewell and Miss Yonge. The good genius of a ramshackle family of cousins, the prop and support of an incapable aunt, she fully merits the eulogium bestowed on her of being a "first-rate article"; though we should hardly have ventured to describe by so flippant a phrase an admirable young woman charged with the care of the weekly bills, and unselfishly devoted to the management of a set of peculiarly unpleasant children. But, apart from these household worries, and a tendency to ill-health, the sympathy which she inspires is not very lively; and this is mainly the fault of the author, who, instead of giving prominence to that feature in her story, is satisfied with a few meagre hints of the heroine's secret attachment to Godfrey Woodman. If Margaret is sketchy and insipid, Godfrey is even less acceptable as a hero. Such merit as he possesses is all of a negative kind. He is not a prig, nor is he one of those marvellous compounds of virtue and muscle whom lady novelists evolve out of their consciousness, and dress up as curates and doctors. It is something to be spared both the preachy and the masterful type of hero. On the other hand, Godfrey Woodman is dreadfully wooden, with no distinctively masculine speciality but a tendency to indulge in slang. Nothing lifelike is gained by emphasizing his sex by vulgarisms, and making him talk of "charming female parties who choose people out of umbrellas," or of "tumbling among a damaged lot," whatever that may mean. Nor does he improve as the story proceeds. Miss Drury does not seem to have any clear notion how a man would feel and act on discovering that he had engaged himself to a woman unworthy of love or respect. She is content with putting a few conventional phrases of grief or anger in her hero's mouth; otherwise he takes things with provoking coolness, and accepts the chapter of accidents with as "light a heart" as M. Olivier himself. Much better drawn is the third, and morally the least estimable, figure of the principal group. By the side of the brilliant criminals of sensational fiction she will no doubt appear a very humdrum sinner. Sly, scheming, and unscrupulous, she proves a very mischievous inmate of the Woodman family; yet we cannot but think that in her laudable desire to point a moral Miss Drury is disposed to make the most of her peccadilloes. Cheating at croquet is an offence of no very grave moral turpitude; and in daring a look of fury at a child who had driven a nail through her muslin dress, and slapping another for making an inopportune revelation, she will probably have the sympathy of most lady readers. But prying into other people's pocket-books, and abstracting diamond lockets from other people's dressing-cases, are very different matters, for which we have not a word of exculpation to offer. It is a pity that the author has not hit upon a less operative contrivance for bringing Fanny's misconduct to light. For society, doubtless, it would be a convenient arrangement if all thieves were also scoundrelists, who restored by night what they misappropriated by day. But unhappily the combination is rare; and in a family of lynx-eyed children and waiting-maids, surely some more probable means for the detection of the fair culprit might have easily been found. Upon the whole, however, the character of Fanny is wrought out with some skill. She is not a meagre sketch, like Margaret, but a creation with pretensions to flesh and blood. Her airs of superior gentility to the Woodmans, and her irritating condescensions to her new friends, are cleverly described in the following passage, which we quote for the purpose of showing Miss Drury at her best:—

She was charmed with everything; house, garden, aspect, situation, nothing could be more perfect. The simplicity, the absence of display and pretension, were exactly to her taste. She hated outside show and parade of wealth; the simplest things always pleased her most. Such a dear, tidy room—quite a snug little den, just what suited her best. And she said so much of its snugness and smallness, that Charlotte, who had been accustomed to think it a handsome-sized apartment, began to measure it with a disparaging eye, and felt ashamed it was no bigger. The same tone of praise accompanied the guest's minute inspection of the furniture and ornaments; everything was perfect, because it was so nice and simple—neat, without attempting too much, which was far from being the case in some houses. Stopping to examine the inkstand and portfolio, she gave a little laugh of satisfaction at coming across anything so plain and sensible. "One never sees such things anywhere now, you know; they overload you with gilding and stone and crystals, and I don't know what, till your tables are more like counters for bijouterie than conveniences for dressing or study. I am so glad to find nothing of the sort here."

The dinner passed off amicably; Fanny's appetite proving the sincerity of the praise she bestowed on the viands. Mrs. Woodman apologized, as they sat down, for their "plain fare," a formula she employed on such occasions as a matter of good breeding, but which Miss Fenlake took as a special tribute to herself, and assured her earnestly she enjoyed it the more for being plain. It was quite difficult now to sit down to a simple dinner. What with everything being à la Russe, the table covered with ornaments and confectionery, and then the French dishes, and the vegetables and fruits out of season, at fabulous prices; really, when one came to think about it, the extravagance of the age was dreadful.

"Very nice dinners those must be, though," said Mrs. Woodman thoughtfully.

"Oh, of course; perfect in their way, you know—nothing allowed that is not first rate, till you are liable to be spoiled for ordinary living, as I am afraid many are."

Upon the state of her feelings towards Godfrey Woodman Fanny is much less explicit, and to the end we are left in doubt whether she really cares for him or not. Upon either supposition her conduct would seem to be inconsistent. A mere coquette would hardly have displayed so much dread of forfeiting his good opinion. If, on the other hand, she had any real affection for him, no adequate motive is shown for her sudden elopement with the Major.

If the triangular complication on which the interest of this novel, as a love story, turns is not very new, at least the author may claim to have set it in a framework of incident entirely original. That the lives of men and women are largely determined by apparent trifles is a fact of everyday experience, and one which has been treated with exquisitely pathetic effect in the masterpieces of fiction. It was to a puddle that Sir Walter Raleigh owed his brilliant career; and, to take only one instance out of many in the Waverley Novels, it is the accident of a message being entrusted to George Gibbie that precipitates the final catastrophe in Old Mortality. The shower which gives the name to this story belongs to the same category of small but pregnant incidents. On one of her beneficent errands Margaret falls in with a poitrinaire heiress, who out of gratitude for the loan of a cloak and umbrella bequeaths her a large fortune. The adventure was not merely lucky for Margaret, but it presents a singular accumulation of good luck. First, there was the luck of falling in with a rich heiress, then the luck of the day being rainy, and the young stranger being consumptive, and therefore peculiarly susceptible to weather influences. But Margaret's luck did not end here. Her heiress was an heiress with no relative but a Scotch uncle on whom to bestow her wealth, and that Scotch uncle was so refreshingly devoid of the caniness which is supposed to distinguish his nationality as to be ready to acquiesce with alacrity in this romantic bequest to a stranger. Such a concurrence of propitious circumstances is rare; remarkable even in the annals of the favoured few to whom it has been given to entertain angels unawares. The two young ladies are at once on the most gushing terms. At her very first visit Miss Noel brings a heavy dressing-case to deposit in Margaret's care, apparently as a sort of earnest of the good things to follow. On this occasion, too, she finds Godfrey on a footing of cousinly intimacy with Margaret, and jumps to the conclusion that they are engaged lovers, though a word of explanation would have prevented all misunderstanding on this point. This leads to a further mystification. From some vague expressions which subsequently fall from Miss Noel, Godfrey in his turn jumps to the conclusion that it is Fanny Fenlake, whose father had been in litigation with the Noel family, to whom the moribund heiress intends to bequeath her property. Of course it is all a mistake. Nothing could efface the recollection of Margaret's cloak and umbrella; and now that a chronic rheumatism had proved the result of her vicarious drenching, Miss Noel was more than ever determined to "repair the injury" by her will. Accordingly in that instrument her whole fortune is bequeathed to Margaret, who, now a rich heiress, goes abroad to recover her health at some German waters. The only person actually dissatisfied by this disbursement is Fanny, who had flattered to her imagination of her coming guests, and appropriated by anticipation some of the Noel diamonds. By the elopement of that unscrupulous young lady with Major Horseman the main obstacle to the union of Margaret and Godfrey, who had learnt to appreciate each other's worth more than ever during their Kaiserstube flirtation, was removed. There remained only the sentimental barrier which Margaret's newly acquired wealth interposed. This is speedily removed by Margaret's bestowing the bulk of her property on model-lodgings and almshouses, called after the name of her departed friend, and by her reserving only a modest 300*l.* a year for herself. To the family solicitor of real life the impulsive way in which property is dealt with in these pages would probably be irritating; but this is a point on which the young people for whom Miss Drury writes will be more indulgent. They will be pleased to find it devolving on so worthy a recipient as Margaret; and equally pleased that, when it proves an obstacle to her happiness, it should take wings afresh, and crystallize into almshouses.

On the whole, though it must in candour be admitted that this book belongs rather to the milk than to the strong meat of fiction, it is at least entitled to the negative praise of being thoroughly inoffensive. We may go further, and say that it inculcates some very sound lessons of nursery morality, as that fibbing and pilfering are not merely sinful, but sins which entail their own punishment. On the other hand, for good girls of the Cinderella type a fairy godmother is always on the cards. But without undervaluing a wholesome moral, there are other requirements which are even more indispensable in a novel. Of all that relates to the mechanism of her art Miss Drury has much to learn. The chief defect of her book is the distrust which it exhibits of the writer's power to sustain the reader's interest by the simple accuracy and naturalness of her delineation of character. A dread of becoming dull leads her to flash on her readers incidents without meaning, and persons who have no raison d'être in the story. Thus we have a suggestion of mischief-making servants of whose intrigues nothing whatever comes; and a mock valetudinarian, Oswald Feulake, who comes out to Germany to try to win the rheumatic heiress, and then vanishes into space. Another fault, of hardly less gravity, is the disregard of literary perspective apparent in this work. We recommend Miss Drury, before she sets to work upon another novel, to go through the preliminary labour of classifying her characters into groups of the first and groups of the second rank, and then to bestow finish upon them in proportion to their prominence. As it is, she is sketchy where she should be elaborate, and meagre where she should be full. Of the minor characters in the story the best drawn is Mrs. Woodman, whose chronic indolence and old-fashioned horror of the brilliant projects of the Haldon Improvement Company are amusingly portrayed. The scene in which she deprecates the misery of sitting in the open air on a hard chair, listening to a band of music, and mildly entreats her young people not to insist on letting the house until she is dead and gone, is not devoid of a gleam of quiet humour. This, and the freedom from mannerisms of style which second-rate novelists affect, particularly from that objectionable habit which imitators of Thackeray have imported of acting the part of Chorus to their own creations, are the most promising features which we can descry in these volumes.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

MR. WILSON'S Rise and Fall of the Slave Power*, of which the first volume is now before us, is, as might be inferred from its title, a work of a vehemently partisan character. The time has not yet come when any Northern author is likely to write impartially or even candidly on such a theme; and the Southerners are for the present effectually silenced; and even if they felt themselves free to speak out, they would hardly occupy themselves with the defence of a policy which has been utterly defeated and loyally abandoned, or of an institution whose abolition they have frankly accepted and hardly profess to regret. Mr. Wilson writes from the Abolitionist point of view; that is, from the point of view of those who insisted on regarding the whole question of American slavery entirely in the light of abstract morality, and refused to take into account either the practical operation of a sudden emancipation or the political aspects of the subject as affected by the constitutional relations of the several States. He appears, indeed, to sympathize rather with the political than with the abstinent section of his party; with those who strove to wrest the Constitution to the invasion of Southern State-rights, and used the civil privileges conferred by the Union to violate its conditions, rather than with those who candidly admitted that under the Constitution slavery was expressly protected by law, and implicitly reserved to the jurisdiction of the several States, and who therefore resolved to repudiate the rights and obligations of citizenship, and to endeavour to withdraw their States from a bond which united them in political action with slaveholders, and bound them to defend the laws and uphold the Government of the Slave States. The present volume brings down the story of Abolitionism only to the admission of Texas into the Union, and contains therefore the records of that part of the struggle during which the South appeared to her enemies completely victorious. The Southerners, on the other hand, conceiving that under the Constitution, and by the very nature of a Federal Union, they were entitled to equal privileges in the common Territories—except as to that vast region in the North-West which had been ceded by Virginia on the express condition that slavery should not be allowed therein—and recognizing that they could only be safe by maintaining an equality in the Senate, and by rendering impossible the creation of a majority of Free States sufficient to amend the Constitution to their detriment, fought obstinately for the admission of slavery into the Territories and of Slave States into the Union. They regarded the compromises by which slavery was excluded from the territory north of the Missouri line while it was not established south of that line, as concessions detracting from their rights, and the violent opposition offered to the admission of new Slave States as acts of hostility and aggression on the part of the North. Mr. Wilson may be trusted as good evidence for the bitterness of feuds which this irreconcilable difference of opinion excited, and which found vent in acts and menaces of the most outrageous kind. The Abolitionists insulted, reviled, and threatened the Southerners in language which no high-spirited people could be expected to stand; and which provoked as much fury as would be excited in England by attempts to confiscate property to the value of some 300,000,000*l.*; especially if it were proposed to accomplish that and by illegal means—say, by a single vote of the House of Commons. The Abolitionists were imprisoned, beaten, and lynched in the South, and mobbed in the North; their presses were destroyed, they themselves were proscribed and prosecuted, and personal conflicts took place on the very floor of Congress; so that the wonder is, not that war broke out at last, but that so much bitterness and so much violence could go on for thirty years before it issued in civil war.

The history of the Indian aborigines is one of the most interesting, and at the same time one of the saddest, portions of American history. The character of some at least among the native tribes, however it may differ from that romantic picture which has been rendered familiar to English schoolboys by Cooper's charming novels, deserved a better fate than the extermination which has befallen the great majority, and is the evident destiny of the remainder; and the cruelty and treachery by which their destruction was hastened awaken a deep and painful indignation among English readers. At the same time it is not difficult, in perusing the records of Indian wars, to understand the very different feelings with which they were regarded by a rough, stern, unsentimental race of settlers, brought into frequent collision with them, and living in constant danger from their sudden outbreaks—danger, not only of the worst horrors of war as waged by Sherman, Pope, and Sheridan, but of such atrocities as have not been witnessed in the conflicts of civilized nations since the days of Tilly and Wallenstein. It must also be remembered that British policy is in no small degree answerable for the fate of many Indian tribes. Mr. Ruttenger's History of the Indian Tribes of Hudson River* traces clearly enough the consequences to the unhappy natives of their employment on the Royal side in the War of Independence. Their relations with King's officers, and their feuds with the settlers, rendered them ready enough to respond to a call to arms, which was issued with equal recklessness of the nature of savage warfare and the probabilities of American vengeance; the tribes were supported, and often led, by "Tories," or Colonial Loyalists, who, having been banished, plundered, outraged, and maltreated by the insurgents, were justly provoked to a bitter revenge which seems strange or exaggerated only to vehement American patriots; and for the devastation and slaughter wrought by both the Indians atoned but too terribly. Mr. Ruttenger, like most Americans, has one measure for friends and another for foes, and judges the burning of Indian wigwams and of colonial villages, the massacre of whites by Indians and of Indians by whites, by quite different standards. That part of his work which describes the internal organization, government, and politics of the tribes, their traditional history, the powers and attributes of their chiefs, their civil and military institutions, their alliances and federal relations, is at once more pleasant and more valuable reading than the melancholy story of their wars. The federal system of the Six Nations, in particular, and the peculiar institutions and traditions of the Delawares, or Lenni Lenape, are especially interesting. It is a noteworthy fact, in connexion with the relics of the mound-builders and the comparative civilization of the Mandans, that the Lenape represent themselves as having, in the course of their Eastward migrations, come into collision with and finally dispossessed a people living in fortified towns, and apparently maintaining an agriculture superior to the rude cultivation of maize, by which the Lenape and their neighbours assisted and supplemented the hunting on which they chiefly relied for subsistence. Much interest also attaches to the accounts of individual chiefs, warriors, and prophets, often greatly superior to the generality of their race in civilization and intelligence, with which the story is interspersed. We should be inclined to judge from the general tenor of the description either that the Sioux and other tribes at present maintaining a precarious existence in the Far West have greatly degenerated through hardship, ruin, and the pressure of an intruding civilization on their resources, or else that the tribes of the East, and especially the Lenape, were like the Mandans of a higher calibre and more developed intelligence than the races of the Western prairie—a supposition in itself by no means improbable. And Mr. Ruttenger is so far sustained by evidence, and confirmed by other writers, that we are inclined to believe his picture substantially a just one. The work is readable enough, and its intrinsic interest would serve to enliven even a duller style.

* History of the Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America. By Henry Wilson. Vol. I. Boston: Osgood & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

* History of the Indian Tribes of Hudson River; their Origin, Manners, and Customs, Tribal and Subtribal Organizations, Wars, Treaties, &c. By E. M. Ruttenger, Author of the "History of Newburgh." Albany: J. Munsell. London: Trübner & Co. 1871.

Neill's "Fairfaxes of England and America"* is a genealogical record of one of the best known of those American families which can clearly and directly trace their descent to the historic aristocracy of the mother-country; perhaps the only one among them the head of which, able to prove his claim to an English peerage, yet chose to throw in his lot with the insurgent colonists, and of which the eldest branch remained finally established as simple citizens of the Transatlantic Republic.

Dr. Walker's Science of Wealth† would hardly, we venture to think, be accepted as altogether a correct exposition of the principles of the science recognized by orthodox English economists. It has, however, very considerable merits; it is generally clear, brief, and simple so far as it goes; and on the subject of Protection it is thoroughly sound and remarkably distinct. As a manual for students, it is open to the objection that it is too brief; that the writer does not allow himself room to deal fully with even the elements of his subject; and that he bestows too much space on the more abstruse and less settled parts of the science.

The last Report of the New York Chamber of Commerce‡ is less generally interesting than some of its predecessors, dealing more with questions of detail and with incidents of American commercial politics than with matters of principle or of historic import. The brief Report of a Committee on the decay of the American shipping trade is, however, an exception to this rule. It is exceedingly concise, and its recommendations are few and simple, but it throws much light on the subject. It points out that the fortunes of the commercial marine of the United States have been very fluctuating. The war of 1812 caused, as might have been expected, a serious diminution. From 1814 to 1824 the tonnage of the United States was stationary, as it has been since 1865. There was a considerable increase between 1824 and 1828, there were periods of depression in 1828-32 and 1843-46, and periods of rapid increase in 1833-43 and 1846-54. From 1854 to the maximum in 1861 the progress was comparatively slow; the loss during the war was about two-fifths, and in 1870 the figures had scarcely altered at all. The extremely small percentage of steam-tonnage—about one-sixteenth of the whole—is noteworthy. The Committee evidently ascribe the stagnation of the trade chiefly to the tariff, as they recommend that shipowners should be allowed to purchase supplies of foreign origin in bond for vessels engaged in the foreign trade, and to receive a drawback on the purchase of protected American wares, and that shipbuilders should be allowed to buy and use foreign materials in bond. They also complain of the "irredeemable paper currency, enhancing all cost of production." A further suggestion was added that the purchase and registration of foreign ships should be allowed, and that a preference should be given to American lines in making contracts for carrying the mails. A Protectionist amendment was shelved by the Chamber.

The Legal Tender Cases of 1871§ is a record of the judgment by which the Supreme Court in that year reversed its decision of the previous year pronouncing the Legal Tender Act unconstitutional. The story of that judgment is one of the worst scandals of General Grant's administration, and is very briefly stated in the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Chase, reported in the volume before us. In 1870 the Court, which then consisted of eight judges, pronounced by five to three a decision denying the validity of the Act in question, on the ground that laws impairing the sanctity of contracts were unconstitutional, and that the power of regulating the currency conferred by the Constitution on Congress no more included the power of issuing paper money and declaring it legal tender than of debasing the coin, and pronouncing a brass dollar capable of paying off a debt incurred in silver. It is certain that the States are expressly debarred from such acts, and that the Federal Government is not empowered by any clause in the Constitution to do them; so that the decision appears to be in accordance with the established principles of American Jurisprudence. It is also a significant fact that Chief Justice Chase, who was Secretary of the Treasury when the Act was passed, and who was the inventor of "greenbacks," concurred in the judgment. It was, however, fiercely resented by the party dominant in Congress and in possession of the Executive power. One of the majority of the Court resigned, leaving the parties therein four to three; another judge was added by Congress; and President Grant appointed to the two vacancies thus created judges who were known to favour the legality of the Act. After the Court had been thus reconstructed, the late minority, with the aid of the two new judges, insisted on the most unusual and irregular step of reviewing the former judgment, and reversed it by five to four. This step was severely censured at the time, and has done much to discredit the authority of the Court, whose political importance as the one supreme arbitrator on constitutional questions, and the one check on Federal encroachment, has no analogy among English tribunals. The arguments of both parties will be found in this volume, and that of Chief Justice Chase contains a very brief and temperate, but not the less effective, history of the whole proceeding.

Mr. Nason's Memoir of Mrs. Rowson* contains the story of one of the many Loyalist victims of the Revolution. Her father, Lieutenant Haswell, who had settled in Massachusetts, was apparently well inclined towards the colonial cause; but having served the King, and still, it seems, holding his commission, he could not reconcile it with his conscience to join in rebellion. He rendered many acts of kindness to his neighbours, whom his position as a British officer enabled him to protect, and did his best to remain neutral, but this was not allowed. His property was confiscated, and he himself put under surveillance, where he would have starved but for the gratitude of some whom he had served; and he was finally banished. His daughter married in England, and afterwards returned with her husband to the United States. She was a tolerably successful authoress, and some anecdotes, more amusing than probable, are told of her relations with the publishers, and the resistance she offered to attempts to employ her pen in the lowest kinds of literary theft or immorality. One of her works, Charlotte Temple, is said by Mr. Nason to be better known in the States than Waverley. We fancy it is not sufficiently known in England to enable many of our readers to estimate by that fact the literary taste of the American public.

The fifth volume of the Survey of the Fortieth Parallel† is devoted to Botany, and contains a very elaborate description of the flora of Utah and Nevada. The entire work is an admirable specimen of the scientific blue-books which form so remarkable a feature of the State literature of America. The expedition, consisting of several eminent men of science—geologists, botanists, mineralogists, zoologists, and so forth—has been engaged for some years in the task assigned to it, and has contrived to produce as full an account of the region over which its researches have extended as we possess of almost any country in the world. The geological character of the district, its mineral resources and its mining industry, its climate, its meteorology, its soil and agriculture, present and prospective, its natural history, and its geographical features are all described at length in these immense quarto volumes; and the Federal Government, which has organized and directed the exploration, has not scrupled at the cost of publication, or crippled the work and reduced its public value by economies of detail. The literary execution, the typography, paper, and engraving are all on a par with the fulness of the scientific and practical matter; and the result is a masterpiece of its kind—a work of which any country may well be proud, and which, in its own field, leaves nothing to be desired. The present volume—the last, we believe, of the series—gives an account of the general botanical features of the country, and the effect of climate and soil upon its vegetation; and this introductory treatise is followed by a detailed catalogue or descriptive list of all the plants of Utah and Nevada, illustrated by clear outline drawings of such as are peculiar to the region west of the Mississippi. Few men would have leisure or inclination to read such a book through; but as a work of reference it is complete and invaluable.

A more eager and professional, but less general and permanent, interest attaches to the very careful and elaborate Report‡ of the engineers sent by the War Department to examine the iron defences of Europe in general, and of England in particular. It describes every kind of iron-plating used in fortification, iron casemates and iron shields, iron ships, turrets, guns, and torpedoes; and it also gives a detailed account of the different forts at Portsmouth, on the Medway, &c. The writers visited and examined the torpedo manufactory of Austria, and obtained a minute explanation of their intended use as harbour defences; and they were equally careful in examining the defences, actual or intended, of other countries, though by far the largest space is given to those of England. The text is illustrated by a profusion of sketches and diagrams, which are so clear as to enable even unprofessional readers to obtain a glimmering of the sense.

The Twenty-Seventh Report of the Prison Association§ of the State of New York—a body of whose constitution and functions we have previously spoken at length, records its extreme dissatisfaction

* The Fairfaxes of England and America in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries; including Letters from and to the Hon. William Fairfax, President of Council of Virginia, and his Sons, Col. G. W. Fairfax and Rev. Bryan, Eighth Lord Fairfax, the Neighbours and Friends of George Washington. By Edward D. Neill, Author of "Terra Marini," &c. Albany, N. Y.: J. Munsell. London: Trübner & Co. 1868.

† The Science of Wealth; a Manual of Political Economy, embracing the Laws of Currency and Finance. Condensed and Arranged for Popular Reading and Use as a Text-book, by Amasa Walker, LL.D., late Lecturer on Public Economy, Amherst College. Philadelphia: Lippincott & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

‡ Fourteenth Annual Report of the Corporation of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York for the Year 1871-72. In Two Parts. Compiled by George Wilson, Secretary. New York: Press of the Chamber of Commerce. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

§ The Legal Tender Cases of 1871. New York: Office of the "Banker's Magazine and Statistical Register." London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

* Memoir of Mrs. Susannah Rowson. With Elegant and Illustrative Extracts from her Writings in Prose and Poetry. By Elias Nason, M.A. Albany: J. Munsell. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

† United States' Geological Exploration of the Fortieth Parallel. Clarence King, Geologist-in-Charge. Vol. V.—Botany. By Sereus Watson, aided by Professor Daniel O. Eaton, and others. Illustrated by a Map and Forty Plates. Submitted to the Engineer-in-Chief, and Published by Order of the Secretary of War, under Authority of Congress. Washington: Government Printing Office. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

‡ Professional Papers of the Corps of Engineers, U.S. Army. No. 22. Report on the Fabrication of Iron for Defensive Purposes, and its Use in Modern Fortifications, especially in Works of Coast Defence. Washington: Government Printing Office. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

§ Twenty-Seventh Annual Report of the Executive Committee of the Prison Association of New York, and Accompanying Documents for the Year 1872. Transmitted to the Legislature March 20, 1873. New York: Prison Association, Bible House, Astor Place. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

with the present system of discipline, or rather of disorder, in the penitentiaries and county prisons, in which no separation is enforced or attempted, in which untried and convicted prisoners, boys new to crime and hardened offenders, misdeameanants and felons, are mingled together, and the younger prisoners are almost openly trained by their elders in the language, the ideas, and the arts of the criminal profession. The Association earnestly insists that these places should be used only as places of detention for untried prisoners, and that convicted offenders should be sent to undergo their punishment elsewhere. It also notes the insecurity of the existing prisons, which has led in some cases to the ironing of untried persons to prevent their repeated attempts at escape. It recommends that the entire charge of the State prisons should be given to a permanent Commission, to be appointed by the Governor. The formal record of the operations of the Association during the preceding twelve months contains many points of interest, especially in reference to the inquiries undertaken by its officers, into the cases of poor and helpless accused persons, very many of whom have been discharged on the evidence collected for them, who would have been wholly unable to conduct their own cause with any chance of success.

Dr. George Wood publishes a collection of memoirs* written at different periods during the last half-century, for the most part historical, and relating generally to local topics. A history of the University of Pennsylvania, another of the Philadelphia Hospital, a third of the Girard Orphan Asylum, are among the principal pieces of this sort; a History of Christianity in India, and a Memoir of Dr. Franklin Bache, are of somewhat greater length and pretensions. The shortest, and by no means the least readable, paper in the collection is "On the Dangers of Hasty Generalization in Science." The publication of such collections is calculated rather to gratify the pardonable vanity of authorship than to interest the public.

Black Robes† is the title which Mr. Nevin has thought fit to give to a little volume in which he sketches the character and adventures of four different sets of missionary preachers in America; the Jesuits of Canada, the Moravians of Pennsylvania, the early Methodist preachers of the Border, when the Border lay in the midst of what are now among the most settled and civilized States of the Union, and was intested by powerful and hostile tribes of Indians, and, finally, their Presbyterian rivals. Notwithstanding its title, the book is not offensive in style, and is tolerably free both from flippancy and cant.

Upon our monthly list are several scientific papers published in pamphlet form, of which we need give no more detailed description than is furnished by their titles. Mr. Parker, before the American Institute, maintains his theses of the Non-existence of Projectile Forces in Nature.‡ Mr. Gissler describes at some length and with curious illustrations the microscopic fauna of Croton Water§—the animalcules which the citizens of New York must be content to swallow alike in tea and cobbles. "A Catalogue of American Phænogamous Plants"||, and A Systematic Revision of Some of the American Butterflies¶, will doubtless have attractions for professed naturalists.

The Congressional Directory** is intended to do for American politicians, in respect of the antecedents of members, of constituencies, and the records of elections, &c., what Dodd and other Parliamentary Guides have long done for English readers.

The Old Back Room†† is the story of a fatherless family of boys, and, in spite of its too persistent attempts to force a practical and religious moral on the reader, seems not unlikely to arrest the attention of children.

* Historical and Biographical Memoirs, Essays, Addresses, &c.; written at various times during the last Fifty Years, and now first published in the collected form. By George B. Wood, M.D., LL.D., President of the American Philosophical Society, President of the College of Physicians of Philadelphia, &c. &c. Philadelphia: Lippincott & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

† Black Robes; or, Sketches of Missions and Ministers in the Wilderness and on the Border. By Robert P. Nevin. Philadelphia: Lippincott & Co. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

‡ Non-Existence of Projectile Forces in Nature. A Paper read before the American Institute, March 1872. By John A. Parker of New York. New York: Wiley & Son. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

§ Contributions to the Fauna of the New York Croton Water. Microscopical Observations during the Years 1870-71. By Charles F. Gissler. With several woodcuts and 5 plates, containing 45 engravings on stone. New York: Charles Vogt, Steam Printer. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

|| Catalogue of the Phænogamous Plants of the United States east of the Mississippi, and of the Vascular Cryptogamous Plants of North America north of Mexico. Cambridge, Mass.: B. P. Mann. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

¶ A Systematic Revision of Some of the American Butterflies; with Brief Notes on those known to occur in Essex Co., Mass. By Samuel H. Scudder. Salem, Mass.: Printed at the Salem Press. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

** Congressional Directory. Compiled for the Use of Congress by Ben. Perley Poore, Clerk of Printing Records. First Edition, corrected to January 15, 1872. Washington: Government Printing Office. London: Trübner & Co. 1872.

†† The Old Back Room. By Jennie Harrison. New York: Dodd & Mead. London: Sampson Low & Co. 1872.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 869, JUNE 22, 1872:

State and Church in Germany and Italy. The Geneva Arbitration. The New Ballot Bill. France. Parliament and Private Bill Commissions. The French Commercial Treaty. The Scotch Educational Bill. The Case of Dibble. The Builders' Strike.

The Tyranny of Custom. The Alfred Millenary Dinner. The London Season. The National Schoolmaster. The Right of Veto in Papal Conclaves. Public Prosecutors. Funeral Sermons. Road and Rail. Law of Husband and Wife. Racing at Ascot.

Margaret Duchess of Newcastle. Maurion's Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy. Hutchinson's Cracoe and the Carpathians. Wine. Figuer's Day After Death. Minor Poets. Basalio's Army of the Rhine. The Story of a Shower. American Literature.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—PARTICULAR ATTRACTIONS.

THIS DAY AND NEXT WEEK.
SATURDAY (June 22)—ANNUAL DISPLAY OF THE GERMAN GYMNASIUM SOCIETY; OPERA, "Robin Hood."
MONDAY—ORCHESTRAL BAND AND GREAT ORGAN; MILITARY BAND on Lower Lake.
TUESDAY—OPERA, "Sonnambula"; FIFTH GREAT FIREWORKS.
WEDNESDAY—ANNUAL CONCERT OF THE METROPOLITAN SCHOOLS' CHORAL SOCIETY, 5,000 Voices.
THURSDAY—FIRST DAY OF THE NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.
FRIDAY—ORCHESTRAL BAND AND GREAT ORGAN.
SATURDAY—SECOND DAY OF NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS; THE SECOND GARDEN FETE.

The Fine Arts Courts and Collections, the Technological and Natural History Collections, all the various illustrations of Art, Science, and Nature, and the Gardens and Park always open. Music and Fountains daily.
Admission on June 22, 2s. 6d.; Monday to Friday, 1s.; Saturdays, 2s. Guinea Season Tickets Free.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.

The First Series of these Annual Meetings, instituted to encourage Competition in Practical Music, will take place between Thursday, June 27 and Saturday, July 6, when Prizes of the aggregate value of £1,000 will be awarded by elected Juries of the most distinguished Musicians. A portion of the money proceeds will be allotted to the Royal Academy of Music and to the Royal Society of Musicians. The Competitions and Performances will take place as follows:

On THURSDAY, June 27.—Soprano and Tenor Vocalists will compete in public, commencing at One p.m. A Grand Vocal and Instrumental Concert, including Competitors, at Half-past Four.

On SATURDAY, June 29.—Contraltos, Baritone, and Bass Vocalists will compete in public, commencing at One p.m. A Grand Vocal and Instrumental Concert, including Competitors, at Half-past Four.

On TUESDAY, July 2.—Choral Societies not exceeding 800 voices, Military Bands, and Bands of Volunteer Regiments, will generally compete, commencing at One p.m. A Grand Concert, including Competitors, at Half-past Four.

On THURSDAY, July 4.—Competition for the Challenge Prize, value £100 (Class I. Choral Societies of 500 Voices). Choral Societies for Men's Voices, and Bands of Regiments of the Line will generally compete, commencing at One p.m. A Grand Concert, including Competitors, at Half-past Four.

On SATURDAY, July 6.—The ceremony of Distributing Prizes will take place at Three o'clock, to be followed by a Grand Vocal and Instrumental Concert, including the Competitors who have won Prizes; after which there will be a Grand Display of the Fountains, and an exhibition of Great Fireworks in the Evening.

By Order.

GEORGE GROVE, Secretary.

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.—

THE SIXTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION is now OPEN, at 1 Pall Mall East, from Nine till Seven. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

ALFRED D. FRIPP, Secretary.

WILL CLOSE ON TUESDAY, JULY 2.

UNDERGROUND JERUSALEM.—AN EXHIBITION OF

WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS BY WILLIAM SIMPSON, Illustrating the Recent Explorations in Pall Mall Gallery, at Pall Mall (Mr. W. M. THOMPSON'S). Ten to Six. Admission, including Descriptive Catalogue, 1s.

OLD BOND STREET GALLERY, 25 Old Bond Street.—

THE EIGHTH EXHIBITION OF PICTURES IN OIL AND WATER-COLOURS is NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

G. F. CHESTER, Hon. Sec.

DORÉ'S GREAT PICTURE OF "CHRIST LEAVING THE PRETORIUM," with "Triumph of Christianity," "Christian Martyrs," "Francisco de Rimini," "Noah's Ark," "Tahiti," &c., at the DORE GALLERY, 25 New Bond Street. Ten to Six. Admission, 1s.

ELIJAH WALTON'S COLLECTION OF OIL AND WATER-

COLOUR PAINTINGS, now ON VIEW, at his GALLERY, 4 Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, Westminster. Admission, 1s., including Catalogue. Open Daily from Ten till Six.

MUSICAL UNION.—AUER from St. Petersburg, and M.

LOUE, Pianist, from Brussels, Tuesday next.—Quartet in A minor, No. 1, Schubert; Trio, E flat, Piano, &c., Schubert; Solo, Violin, Auer; Quintet in C, Beethoven; Polka in A flat, Chopin. Tickets at the usual places, and at St. James's Hall, 10s. 6d. each; and Family Tickets to admit Three, One Guinea.

J. ELLA, Director, 9 Victoria Square.

MADAME RONNIGER will give a SHAKSPEARIAN and

MISCELLANEOUS READING at St. George's Hall, on Tuesday, 26th inst., at 8.30. Songs from "Macbeth," "Henry V.," "King John," "The Execution of Charles," by Swinburne; Selections from Tennyson, Browning, Alington, and Sheridan. Tickets, 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., and 1s., at J. S. Corner & Co., 201 Regent Street; L. Cook & Co., 65 New Bond Street; Lonsdale's, 15 Old Bond Street; and at St. George's Hall.

MARLBOROUGH COLLEGE.—The TRIENNIAL

DINNER will take place at Willie's Rooms, St. James's, on Thursday, the 28th inst., at 1.30 precisely. Tickets (including Wine), 1s. each. OLD MARLBOROUGHians intending to DINE are particularly requested to apply for Tickets before Monday, the 26th inst., at Willie's Rooms, or to C. F. LAMBERT, Hon. Sec., 9 New Square, Lincoln's Inn.

MR. A. DAWSON CLARKE (B.A. Cambridge) and Mr.

A. M. LIFSCOMBE (B.A. Oxon) receive RESIDENT and NON-RESIDENT PUPILS for the various Competitive Examinations, and for the Universities. During the last three years Pupils have been prepared for the following Examinations:—Oxford (Prize Schools and Scholarships); Cambridge (Prize Schools and Scholarships); Indian Telegraph Service; Engineering College, and Woods and Forestry; Worcester, Devon Comptrols, Polytechnic Service, Indian Museum, Institute of Actuaries, Preliminary Law and Medicine. For Terms, &c., apply to Mr. A. D. CLARKE, 25 Torrington Square, W.C., or to Mr. A. M. LIFSCOMBE, 25 Bedford Street, Russell Square, W.C.

THE
SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 870, Vol. 33.

June 29, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE LAST OF THE INDIRECT CLAIMS.

THE Arbitrators at Geneva have effected with admirable judgment a result which had been for some days past confidently anticipated. The only issue which had been raised on the part of England was whether the Indirect Claims were included in the submission which was itself to be found in the Treaty. The American Government has now, before the beginning of the inquiry, for reasons of which it is the exclusive judge, formally withdrawn the disputed claims. The functions of the Arbitrators practically commence from the date at which Lord TENTERDEN handed in the English argument. The previous proceedings were wholly preliminary and formal, although they may have involved substantial and important consequences. The Arbitrators judiciously abstained from assuming jurisdiction over the scope of the reference. They only expressed their individual and collective opinion, not that the claims were or were not covered by the Treaty, but they were in their nature improper to be submitted to arbitration. It is possible that the mode of evading a difficulty wilfully created by the American Government may have been concocted between Mr. FISH and Mr. ADAMS. In some of the discussions in the House of Commons it was incidentally observed that no nation could have voluntarily submitted to arbitration the question whether it was liable to damages which might have been measured by hundreds of millions. The Arbitrators condemn more severely the conduct of the authors of the American Case when they formally declare that the claims could not constitute good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations. If the supporters of General GRANT or of Mr. GREELEY can extract from the proceedings at Geneva any consolation for national vanity, it will not be worth while to disturb their complacency. They will probably assert that the question in dispute has after all been settled by the Arbitrators, who in truth merely provided the American Government with facilities for withdrawal. The rules of international law are wholly unaffected by the authoritative expression of opinion. Less cautious jurists might have fallen into the error of condemning in principle the claims of which they only affirm that they could not serve as a foundation for pecuniary damages. Lord CAIRNS was precipitate in his complaint that the decision might have been dangerous if it had been favourable to the claims. If it were possible to imagine that the Arbitrators could, before entering on the inquiry, have approved the principle of the claims, the English agent would have still had the opportunity of withdrawing from any share in proceedings which had not yet commenced. Mr. PERCY WINDHAM, who undertook at a moment's notice the lead of the Opposition, has probably satisfied himself on reflection that he might have more judiciously left the subject to Mr. DISRAELI.

The Arbitrators and the agents of the litigant Powers may claim the credit of having kept their counsel during the preliminary proceedings. The enterprise of the New York papers has not been equal to the task of purchasing confidential communications; and the less ambitious efforts of English Correspondents have naturally been ineffectual. It generally happens that when all the parties to a transaction desire the same object, they contrive to surmount difficulties of detail. In this case, the Arbitrators, the English, and the Americans were all on various grounds sincerely anxious to save the Treaty; and they were also agreed on the iniquity and inadmissible character of the notorious claims in dispute. Nevertheless the conditions of the problem were singularly embarrassing and complex. The English agents were restrained by the pledged pledges of their Government from submitting to the Arbitrators an issue which had, according to their contention, not been included in the terms of reference. The American agents, on the other hand, had, as it was thought, been instructed to insist on an award, although Mr. FISH had taken the strange course of informing Lord GRANVILLE that the American Arbitrator was opposed to a recognition of the claims. It was certain that the members of the Tribunal would do their utmost to facilitate a compromise, but it was difficult for them to take the initiative. There were serious objections to a prolonged adjournment, although, in the absence of a special limitation, every Court is competent to determine the time at which it may think fit to proceed with an inquiry. The chances of a prosperous result were probably increased by the peculiar constitution of the Tribunal, which includes among its members two eminent and able representatives of the parties to the dispute. Mr. ADAMS and the Lord CHIEF JUSTICE were of course in constant communication with the counsel and agents of their respective Governments, and they had the opportunity of enabling their colleagues to become informally acquainted with any overtures or suggestions which might be useful for their guidance. Direct negotiations between the Governments was happily rendered impossible by the inconvenient attributes of the American Senate. The Government of the United States is incapable of appointing a plenipotentiary, because the acts of any diplomatic agent may be disavowed by an authority from which he has not received instructions. For one half of the year, during the recess of the Senate, the most trifling international arrangements must be suspended. American Presidents and Ministers have often, with the characteristic adroitness of their nation, contrived to patch up the disabilities to which they are subject. The President might at his pleasure have modified the Case which had been presented in his name, but he preferred to simple retraction a project of treaty which enabled him to transfer his responsibility to the Senate.

By their mode of conducting the controversy the Americans have secured some of the advantages which frequently reward the audacity of adventurous advocates. Under cover of a supposed abandonment of the Indirect Claims they induced the English Commissioners to admit that the remote and consequential expenses of the American navy resulted directly from the proceedings of the Confederate cruisers. In a later stage of the discussion they have diverted attention from the offensive tone and matter of their Case, except so far as it included the Indirect Claims; yet there can be little doubt that intelligent Americans are seriously annoyed at the untenable position which their Government has assumed. Mr. FISH's recent assertion that no pecuniary award on account of the Indirect Claims had been expected is a confession that the demand which was preferred in the plainest language was unjust and extortionate. When Mr. FISH's agent, six months ago, laid his damages for the Indirect Claims at three or four hundred millions, his unscrupulous pretensions were almost more plausible than the late contention of the SECRETARY of STATE. The Treaty contemplated pecuniary demands alone, and it conferred no power on the Arbitrators to decide theoretical issues. The American Government seems to have persuaded itself that Mr. SUMNER's monstrous figments, which were afterwards adopted by Mr. FISH, could only be finally abolished by a judgment of the Geneva Tribunal; but, except so far as the Indirect Claims were connected with pecuniary claims, the Arbitrators were incapable of entertaining the question. If the English Government had been weak enough to enlarge the terms of the original submission, there can be little doubt that the American agents would have concentrated their energies on the object of obtaining enormous pecuniary damages for the enhancement of the rate of insurance, and for the pretended prolongation of the war. Mr. Fish has in his later despatches failed to remember that the gross sum originally demanded by the American Commissioners must have included damages for the Indirect Claims, inasmuch as it largely exceeded all the alleged losses caused by the acts of the Confederate cruisers.

In anticipation of the preliminary rejection of the Indirect Claims by the Tribunal, the apologists of the American Government have already described the proceeding of the Tribunal as a justification of the presentation of the claims. A plaintiff who professes to be satisfied with an adverse verdict or with a non-suit acknowledges that his action has been litigious and unjust. The Americans have in the present instance been conscious that they are exposed to both imputations; but they hoped to conceal their defeat on the main contention by dwelling on the collateral issue whether the extortionate claims were covered by the Treaty. The tone and arguments of their apologists have been subjected to a curious change since the earlier days of the controversy. The English Correspondent of a New York newspaper, who boldly affirmed that all parties in the United States supported the claims, and that the English Commissioners had acquiesced in referring them to arbitration, must feel painfully that he has been left in the lurch by his own Government; while the sharp practice of Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS has been almost unanimously condemned by respectable politicians in the United States. For some time past Mr. FISH has been occupied in devising measures for getting rid of the claims without openly admitting that they were originally wrongful. His hopes were temporarily disappointed by the capricious amendments introduced by the Senate into the Supplementary Article; and he has since been manoeuvring through his agents to throw on the Geneva Tribunal the burden of rejecting the claims. It would not be just to blame the Americans for efforts to save from failure a Treaty which is almost exclusively advantageous to themselves. The ostentatious anxiety of the English Government to effect the same result, though it is not in itself discreditable, has perhaps been a diplomatic mistake. The American Government has been more than once misled by Lord GRANVILLE's pertinacious ingenuity in suggesting new methods of settlement. It is at least possible that the promoters of the Indirect Claims might have been earlier brought to their senses by a plain intimation that the failure of a litigation concerns the claimant of damages rather than the defendant. Any unfavourable judgment of the conduct of the English Government would be at least premature; and it is right that those who are charged with the conduct of a negotiation should lean to conciliation rather than to defiance. One of the best qualities of professional diplomats is the dispassionate calmness which it is the business of their lives to cultivate. It is only when the encroaching spirit of an adversary is encouraged by concession that the display of a pacific disposition may possibly become mischievous. After all that has passed there is no reason to grudge either the detention of the English agents and counsel for a week or two at Geneva before the commencement of their main business, or the expense of the telegraphic messages which have passed backwards and forwards. It was far more desirable that the question should be settled on the spot than that the abandonment of the claims should be purchased at the cost of accepting another new-fangled supplement to international law. The retrospective rules are the most obnoxious part of a Treaty which is otherwise not satisfactory, and the cumbrous phrases of the Supplementary Article might easily have served as the foundation of future misunderstandings. There would not have been the smallest advantage in the judicial rejection or diplomatic prohibition of forms of extortion which have never been recognized by any civilized nation, except when the American Government thought fit in an evil hour to adopt the extravagances of Mr. SUMNER. It is possible that the conduct of a neutral might be the direct cause of the prolongation of a war, although, as Mr. FISH justly observed, such conduct would be a foundation rather for hostilities than for a claim of damages. The terms of the Supplementary Article might, if it had been ratified, not improbably have been quoted by the American Government in defence of a repetition of its repeated connivance at Fenian invasions of Canada. The unofficial intimation addressed by the Arbitrators to the American agent was distinguished by the rare merit of being adequate to the solution of the immediate difficulties, while it implied no assumption of authority to establish any general precedent.

MR. DISRAELI AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

ONCE more the Conservatives have been cheered with a great banquet and a great speech. Mr. DISRAELI's speech on Monday was in its way a masterpiece. It was full of novelty, of telling points, of vigorous and highflown phrases. What the speaker did he did thoroughly. He set himself to offer his hearers a complete travesty of the history of England during the last forty years, and he never once wandered into soberness or accuracy of statement. Mr. DISRAELI is thoroughly alive to the great fact that if recent events are skilfully and boldly misrepresented, and if the misrepresentation is adapted to flatter the tastes and prejudices of a sympathizing audience, there is not the slightest reason why a practised orator should hesitate to say anything he pleases. Mr. DISRAELI had invented for Monday night a totally new theory for the glorification of his own party and the disparagement of his adversaries. It had struck him as a wild and beautiful conception that the Liberals might be portrayed as the non-national, the Cosmopolitan, or, as with a variation he termed it, the Continental party, while the Conservatives might be invested with a new halo of brightness as the national, the insular, the truly English party. Around this theory a coating of fanciful facts and a web of sparkling rhetoric were laid. It was a speech to listen to and to believe in, not to criticize or refute. Mr. DISRAELI did not condescend to give any instances in which the Cosmopolitanism of the Liberal party had been distinctly marked. On the contrary, if his hearers had analysed his statements, they would have learned that after forty years of power and success the Cosmopolitanism of Liberals has never been known to display itself except in a tiny Republican movement which utterly failed, and in the existence of a few hundred London Jacobins who are totally powerless. If this is the only result of the fixed bias of the majority of Englishmen operating during nearly half a century under the most favourable circumstances, Englishmen must be a singularly helpless and impractical set of people. Still Mr. DISRAELI chose to say that there is something strikingly Cosmopolitan or Continental in English Liberals, and his speech may therefore suggest a moment's consideration as to whether there is any truth in what he said or not. Whether it would be any reproach to an English party that it is Cosmopolitan or Continental it is impossible to say. Details would be everything. In some respects it might be a great merit, and in others a great demerit, to have so wide an area of sympathies. But if we ask ourselves what are the great Liberal measures of the period over which Mr. DISRAELI's fancy played, it so happens that they have been singularly little Cosmopolitan or Continental. The abolition of slavery and the slave trade, the abolition of Protection, and the reform of the Law have been the fields in which the labours of Liberals have been most successful and most persistent since the Reform Bill which brought them first into power. So far from borrowing the ideas of other nations on any of these heads, England has been labouring ever since, and often with very partial success, to induce the Continent to put down slavery and to adopt Free Trade. English Liberals have been the teachers, not the pupils, of the outer world in these spheres of labour; while in the department of Law Reform, so long and so pertinaciously resisted by the Conservatives, the most that can be said is that English law has in late years lost enough of the impress of a grotesque and effete barbarism to attain a character which has great virtues and great faults, but which still remains eminently national.

The Conservative party whose achievements were lauded and whose principles were proclaimed by Mr. DISRAELI exists simply in his fertile brain. He announced that he had nothing whatever to say for the Tory party before the first Reform Bill. They were a set of silly old-fashioned creatures, clinging to antiquated notions and unfitted for practical life. He was equally averse to the name and memory of Sir ROBERT PEEL. But there has been, he hinted, a secret Conservative party which has been all along working wonders. Among the other great feats of this party was the passing of the Factory Act of Lord SHAFTESBURY. As history is written in prose, the facts are that this Act was introduced while a Conservative Government was in office, and was violently and successfully resisted by it. It was afterwards carried while a Liberal Government was in office, and was strongly supported by Lord RUSSELL and Sir GEORGE GREY, who, together with Lord PALMERSTON, had spoken or voted for it when the Conservative Government crushed it for a time out of existence. As history is written or spoken in poetry, this Act was the gift of the secret Conservatives to those ungrateful working-men who are just beginning to know their true friends. In another respect, however, the action of secret Conservatives has not been so successful. It appears that it is a special feature of the Conservative policy to bind the colonies to the mother-country. The proper way to do this, according to Mr. DISRAELI, is for the mother-country to fix the colonial tariffs, control the grants of colonial lands, bargain to keep in the colonies a certain number of troops, and to have a Council of colonists resident in London. It is by their clear perception of the value of these ideas that the Conservatives have won one of their chief titles to be called the National party, the party that maintains the Empire as a whole, and keeps alive the glory of Britain. Certainly the secret of the Conservatives as to their colonial policy has been admirably preserved. No one in the last few years has ever heard of their Imperial views as to tariffs or waste lands or troops, and few persons even in the colonies will believe that when they come next into power they will summon a Council of colonists to reside in London. But the National party, in its quiet way, has its eye on friends nearer home, and in its own good time is going to reveal itself as the special protector of the poor. It has not come forward in any hurried and premature manner to assume this character. In fact, for years it devoted all its energies, and Mr. DISRAELI owed his fortune, to trying to make the bread of the poor as dear as farmers could wish it to be. But it was biding its time. It was waiting till sewage became the question of the day, and now that the hour has struck, it claims the question of sewage as its own. Mr. DISRAELI of course did not say what it would do with regard to sewage that Liberals are not likely to do. He left it to be inferred that a Cosmopolitan and Continental party was not the party to make English homes sweet and English air pure. It will take a really National party to do this, and it will be from Sir CHARLES ADDERLEY, when he returns to office, that Birmingham will learn what on earth it is to do with its refuse. Every one will allow that that will be a secret of secret Conservatism well worth knowing.

Descending from these lofty flights of romance, Mr. DISRAELI got himself and his hearers to earth again by asserting that the Liberal party is now regarded by the country with mistrust and repugnance. That the Government has been and still is unpopular, and that it has wearied the general patience by its many blunders, is true enough; nor does any one doubt that the Conservatives would gain largely if there were a dissolution. But that the Liberal party is viewed by the country with mistrust and repugnance is a great exaggeration. There is not a piece of Liberal legislation passed in the last twenty years that the Conservatives would have the most distant prospect of being able to repeal if they were in power. There is not a single measure on which both Liberals and Conservatives have any open, distinctly marked, conflicting opinions, on which the country has pronounced, or is likely to pronounce, in favour of the Conservatives. It is not even at all certain how large the Conservative gain would be if an election were held at once. The Liberals, contrary to general expectation, have managed to retain possession of the contested seat for Bedfordshire, and the reality of the conviction of the Conservative leaders as to the changed opinion of the country will soon be tested when the Lords have decided whether they will adhere to or abandon those of their amendments to the Ballot Bill to which Mr. GLADSTONE has announced that he cannot agree. When once the Ballot Bill is carried, there is every probability of a period of comparative quiet, and questions of a mild order which either party would deal with in substantially the same way will occupy general attention. The only question to be decided is which party shall be allowed the privilege and amusement of dealing with them. What the Conservatives have in their favour is that the existing Government has made many enemies and committed many errors. At a time when most men would allow that it does not really make any great difference which party is in office in an era of sewage Bills and anti-adulteration Bills, it is a great advantage to a party that it has lately given no offence, and has had no recent opportunity of making patent mistakes. The present Government has carried, or has tried to carry, a series of measures, each of which has raised up against it a little knot of enemies, who will like to have their revenge when the next election comes. Clergymen, landowners, wild Irishmen, soldiers' sailors, publicans, mine-owners, Nonconformist teachers have all their special scores against the Cabinet which they would like to wipe off in their own way. Then a mess has been made in almost every department of public affairs. A year ago the Foreign Office would have remained as an exception, but now it may be said that there has been blundering all round. Those who like a mild change may say to themselves that it is time another set of performers should try their hands. Directly the Conservatives were in office, they too would begin to give offence, and, unless they are very much changed, it may be safely added that they would begin to blunder. Then in their turn they would be viewed with mistrust and repugnance. But what seems as near the truth as anything else is that the country does not know—and, if asked at an election, would not be able quite to make up its mind—whether it wishes the present Ministry to give place to the Ministry of Mr. DISRAELI. It would have no great mistrust or repugnance, and no great preference, for one set of politicians or the other. Either would do, and neither would do very well; and the consequence might be that neither party would have strength enough to hold office with credit, or even to carry good Sewage Bills in a satisfactory manner. In spite of the revelation of their true character as the National, not the Cosmopolitan party, it is extremely doubtful whether the friends of Mr. DISRAELI have any chance of securing him such a majority as will enable him to show what he really can do for unhealthy England.

FRENCH FINANCE.

THE arrangements between the German and French Governments for the evacuation of French territory by the Germans under new conditions are said to be concluded. No official statement has yet been made from which the precise nature of these arrangements could be gathered. But the general result is known. M. THIERS is to hurry forward the payment of the three milliards still payable, and the evacuation is to be effected bit by bit, as the money is paid over. A very large loan must therefore be effected at once, and it is stated that a sufficient amount will shortly be issued for subscription to produce two milliards in cash, while the remaining milliard will be provided partly by the aid of private firms, and partly by the Bank of France, and from the proceeds of Treasury bonds. The instalments on eighty millions sterling cannot possibly be called up very rapidly, as the bulk of the subscribers will be Frenchmen of a humble class, and the last payment to the Germans may not improbably be made at a date nearly the same as that fixed by the Treaty for the payment of the whole three milliards. Some portion of French soil, and especially the stronghold of Belfort, will, therefore, it may be expected, remain in German hands for perhaps another eighteen months. But it will be an enormous gain to the country that each successive payment will rapidly diminish the area occupied by the foreigner. There can be no doubt that the money will be forthcoming, although the terms on which the loan can be effected still remain uncertain. The national creditor, whether he is a Frenchman or a foreigner, must inquire not only whether the nation wishes that his interest should be paid, but what is the machinery provided for paying it. In other words, the annual taxes must be enough to meet the demands of the creditor; and although it is certain that enough taxes will be levied for the purpose, a fierce controversy is going on as to the particular taxes which shall be selected to make up the deficiency of eight millions sterling which the Government wishes to see covered before it issues the loan. It is not possible to scrutinize the statement that this is the amount by which the revenue is short, just as it is not possible at present to calculate the total cost of the war to France. The Government says that so large a sum as eight millions of additional taxation is not absolutely necessary, but it thinks it not prudent to ask for less. One reason given for taking a good margin is that some of the taxes recently imposed are not yielding so much as was anticipated. Of course the Government says that this is only due to the temporary derangement of trade, caused by purchasers abstaining from the consumption of articles the price of which they find enhanced. Soon habit will make them buy what they have been accustomed to have, and then the anticipations of the collectors of the revenue will be fulfilled. This may be so or not, but at any rate M. THIERS is quite right in saying that in order to silence all contention and make the subscribers to the loan feel perfectly secure it is necessary to show an annual revenue about the sufficiency of which there is no question. During all the warm financial debates of this week the position thus occupied by the Government has not been contested, and it has been assumed that a sum amounting as nearly as possible to eight millions sterling shall be raised by additional taxation. Sometimes the thought that this is precisely the amount which the Government is going to repay to the Bank of France within the year seemed to force itself on the mind of a speaker, and he was almost ready to suggest the idle remark that, if the Bank were not repaid, the new taxes would not be wanted. But all that it has read or heard about finance for the last twelve months has at last impressed the Assembly with the conviction that the repayment of the Bank advances is one of the conditions that make a loan possible on favourable terms. If the credit of the Bank had not remained intact during all these times of trouble, the paper currency would have been greatly depreciated, and the difficulties of borrowing immensely increased; and it is because the nation is pledged to repay the advances made by the Bank that it has stood the shock and kept its credit unimpeached.

On the 19th of January last the Assembly passed a vote which bitterly affronted M. THIERS, and the upshot of which was that the Assembly was to endeavour through special Committees to devise new taxes which should replace the taxes on raw materials proposed by the Government. The Committee naturally found this a most difficult task, but they arrived at the conclusion that three new taxes might be adopted—a tax on securities other than Rentes, a tax on mortgages, and a tax on business transactions. When, however, the arrangements with the Germans were on the eve of being completed, M. THIERS thought that he might strike a bold stroke and have his own way; the Assembly would be driven into a corner, and might be made to choose between adopting the hated tax on raw materials and incurring the odium of upsetting a scheme for liberating the national territory. On Monday, accordingly, the Government brought forward its own proposals, in opposition to those recommended by the Committees of the Assembly. The basis of the scheme was the old tax on raw materials, but M. DE GOULARD, the Minister of Finance, was obliged to own that nothing like the required sum could be got out of taxing raw materials at present, as France is still hampered by numerous treaties of commerce. If he could get in the full proceeds of the taxes he proposed to levy, they would yield about five millions sterling. But at present they will yield under two millions, and even when the treaties with England and Belgium have ceased to operate, they will bring in less than two millions and a half. Over the deficiency which must, even according to the calculation of the Government, continue to exist while the treaties of commerce are in force, M. DE GOULARD threw the veil of a discreet silence. The remaining four millions are to be derived from an augmentation of the direct taxes, and of the salt-duty, and also from a rigorous suppression of frauds on the revenue in the manufacture of alcohol, which now deprive the State of nearly a million a year. M. THIERS, who knew that the augmentation of the direct taxes would be exceedingly unpopular, was most earnest in explaining that the burden was only a temporary one, but he did not explain why it should be so. The proceeds from the tax on raw materials must fall for years much short of the four millions at which they are estimated; and although, if the country remains peaceful and prosperous, the receipts from the taxes generally will increase, and some of the taxes now levied can be remitted or lessened, there does not appear to be any reason why the payers of direct taxes and the consumers of salt should have the exclusive benefit of the improved state of affairs. Either it is fair to put a heavier burden on those who pay direct taxes or it is not. M. DE GOULARD said that it is quite fair, for he only asked for fifteen additional centimes, while in times not very long gone by, and while France was still untouched by any great calamity, the payers of these direct taxes had been gratified by seventeen centimes being taken off what they had to pay; and he asked his hearers to reflect whether, when the Assembly met at Bordeaux, every payer of direct taxes would not have thought himself very lucky if he could have been sure that the war would have done nothing worse to him than bring back fifteen of the seventeen centimes from which he had been relieved. The tax on salt was also justified on the ground that the consumption had not been found to increase in proportion as the duty had been lessened; and hence M. DE GOULARD inferred that the consumers would take a certain quantity and no more, whether the duty was raised or not. If a million sterling can really be saved by repressing frauds on the revenue in the manufacture of alcohol, no one can say that it ought not to be saved. The proposal, therefore, of the Government was not to find anything like the whole money required by the taxation of raw materials. It proposed to find the other half by totally distinct means, which it justified as its own merits. As to the other half, it is proposed to find it by a number of measures for the present, and rather more than a moiety for next year, from taxes on raw materials, and to leave the balance unprovided for.

Nothing but strong political pressure could make the Assembly agree to such a proposal. Financially it has nothing to recommend it. It is not as if the Government could say that there was one class of taxes which would, without having recourse to any other, furnish all that is wanted. Free-traders might then at least have the satisfaction of giving up their theories to obtain a great immediate good. But the taxes on raw materials are only advocated as a stop-gap, and as a very bad stop-gap. It is owned that the revenue officials were instructed to report as to the amount that could be got at once from those taxes, and they reported that the utmost that could be obtained from this source was forty-two millions of francs. The adversaries of the tax on raw materials broadly assert that the State would get little or nothing from them, owing to frauds and drawbacks. But the Government has naturally taken care to get the most favourable report it could, and the report it has obtained only ventures to anticipate forty millions of francs. All beyond that is merely conjectural, and it is in order, not to fill up the whole deficit of the Budget, not to secure the freedom of France by one bold stroke, that Protection in one of its worst forms is to be introduced, but merely to get forty millions out of two hundred millions of francs which the Government alleges to be necessary. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at that almost every speaker with any pretension to financial eminence protested that such a sum might be got in some much better and simpler way. M. CASTILLER-PELIER warmly supported the tax on securities, but no vote was taken on that point. On Thursday, however, a vote was taken on the proposal of the Budget Committee to impose a tax of two per cent. on mortgage revenue, and the Government was defeated by a majority of 324 against 302. M. THIERS was instantly up in arms. He commented on the smallness of the majority, and asked to be allowed to have the question re-argued, conceding, however, that if after hearing his views the Assembly did not record its vote by a decisive majority, he would offer no further opposition to the Bill. The voting in the Assembly seems just at this moment so little else than a struggle between the Right and Left for power, that no one can be sure for an instant how far mere financial considerations may guide the Assembly in its ultimate decision. M. THIERS just now leans on the Left, and treats the Right with defiance. Accordingly the Left, which is almost to a man composed of the adversaries of taxes on raw materials, is ready to support him in opposing every other tax until the taxes on raw materials are arrived at by a process of exhaustion; while it is in vain that M. THIERS reminds the Right that taxes like that on mortgages will chiefly press on the rural population, whose interests they are specially called on to represent. The financial proposals of the Government must therefore be looked at apart from the votes of the Assembly, and may be sanctioned for a totally distinct reason than any based on their merits; and if they are regarded simply as financial proposals, it is difficult to see how the scheme of taxing raw materials could have been put in a worse light, or have been brought forward with less to recommend it.

THE MINES REGULATION BILL.

A MEASURE which has hung fire so long as the Mines Regulation Bill gains a new kind of importance by getting into Committee. A second reading is no longer the critical ordeal that it once was; indeed it is hardly even so earnest that a Bill is likely to become law. It is only when the House applies itself steadily to the details of the proposed legislation that it seems worth while to take much interest in it. Now that this stage has been reached there is every reason why the progress of the Bill should be carefully watched. The subject is one of great importance, and the treatment which it has received and is likely to receive from the House of Commons is not such as can safely be allowed to pass uncriticized. The Bill as it left the hands of the Select Committee was in all essential respects a good Bill. The clauses relating to education had been altered for the worse by the substitution of twelve for thirteen as the minimum below which boys shall not be employed, and the exception unless under certain prescribed restrictions, and the exception the Bill was a fair embodiment of the principles which the miners and those interested in the mines have for years been insisting on. The employment of women and children in the mines is a system; it creates a machinery for securing the competency of managers; it lays down certain general rules for the prevention of accidents; and it charges a staff of inspectors with the duty of seeing that all these provisions are carried out. The two most important clauses in the Bill perhaps are those which provide that every manager shall hold a certificate, and that an adequate amount of ventilation shall be produced in every mine in order to dilute the noxious gases. It is the omission of these two safeguards that has done more than anything else to make coal mining so fatal to human life. The absence of adequate ventilation is, in one form or another, the great cause of accidents; and the want of competent managers is one of the principal reasons why ventilation has hitherto been so imperfect. It is not left, however, to the manager alone to see that proper precautions are taken against danger. The general rules laid down in the Bill provide that mines shall be inspected by competent persons once in the twenty-four hours, or, under certain circumstances, in twelve hours. The results of this inspection are to be recorded in a book, and they may be checked by those of another inspection which may be carried on on behalf of the workmen at least once a month. The managers, who are responsible for the observance of these rules, were originally to be examined under the direction of a Secretary of State, and no certificate of competency was to be granted unless their examination had been satisfactory, and they had in addition given evidence of sobriety, experience, ability, and general good conduct. These clauses have, however, been omitted with a view to alterations in the composition of the Examining Board. A certificate of service will be given to all existing managers, and to all persons who have so acted for a period of twelve months within five years before the passing of the Act. This certificate of service will have the same value as a certificate of competency. The Secretary of State is empowered to institute a public inquiry into any charges of negligence or incompetency which may be brought against a manager, and in the event of the charges being proved, his certificate may be suspended or cancelled. A violation of any of the provisions of the Act, including the general rules contained in it, or of any of the special rules which may be made under it for particular mines, will entail a penalty of 20*l.*, and an additional penalty of 1*l.* for every day that such violation is continued after the Inspector has given the offender written notice. If an Inspector observes any cause of danger not provided for by the rules in force in a mine, he is to give notice to the owner or manager and require it to be remedied. If the owner or manager objects to remedy it, and forwards his objection to the Secretary of State, the matter is to be determined by arbitration. Otherwise, or if the award goes against the owner, the omission to comply with the Inspector's requisition will constitute an offence against the Act. A clause to which the miners themselves attach great weight orders that all wages shall be paid in money and at an office not being or belonging to a public-house, and if the amount of wages depends on the amount of mineral gotten, this amount is to be determined by weight.

The House of Commons began its consideration of the Bill at a morning sitting yesterday week. The opening clauses deal with the rules for the employment of women and children. Women are forbidden to work underground; and an attempt was made to get this prohibition extended to work at the bank-top. As a general principle, the employment of women in such work as even the open-air labour about a colliery usually must be is greatly to be deprecated. But when legislative prohibition is proposed, another consideration comes into play. This work, rude and unfeminine as it doubtless is, does at least keep many women from starving. We are not speaking of married women, because it may be argued that the withdrawal of wives from the labour market would lead to a proportionate increase in the wages of husbands. If the wages that are now earned by the man and the woman jointly could in future be earned by the man alone, the gain to the miner would be immense. His income would remain the same, and he would practically secure the services of a housekeeper into the bargain. But the case of unmarried women is certainly different. They can support themselves by lifting coal at the pit's mouth, and other similar occupations, and if this means of earning a livelihood is denied them, they may find great difficulty in making one in any more feminine pursuit. There are some kinds of labour which so degrade and demoralize women that the Legislature is justified in forbidding them to have recourse to them. Underground work in coal mines comes under this category, and, so far as we know, the same preachers of the absolute equality of the sexes do not object to the clause in the Bill which absolutely closes this form of industry to their clients. But it does not appear that labour at the bank-top is necessarily of this description, or that it may not be so conducted as to be compatible, if not with refinement, at least with physical and moral decency. Under these circumstances it would be hard to close against unmarried women the only kind of work perhaps for which there is any demand in the neighbourhood, or which can supply them the means of subsistence.

The discussion as to the age below which boys are not to be allowed to work full time threw an unexpected light on the unreality of much that has been said by the professed friends of education. The usual argument against the compulsory retention of children at school until there has been time to give them a good elementary education is based on the unwillingness of parents to sacrifice the value of their children's earnings. In the present case there is no difficulty whatever as regards this point. The restriction of children's labour has been one of the things on which the miners themselves insist most strongly. Instead of showing themselves anxious to make their children work too early, they have asked Parliament again and again to postpone the time at which it shall be lawful to give them work. It might have been expected, therefore, that the House of Commons would have offered no opposition to a Bill fixing thirteen as the age below which it is to be unlawful to work boys full time. Instead of this, the Select Committee carried twelve as the limit instead of thirteen, and the Government felt it to be useless to support an amendment restoring the clause to its original form. The real motive of much of the opposition to compulsory education was thus disclosed. The alleged unwillingness to deprive parents of their children's earnings appeared in its true colours as unwillingness to deprive employers of the opportunity of buying labour cheap. To a similar desire to make the measure as innocuous as possible to economically disposed mine-owners must be attributed the amendment making it necessary, in order to bring a violation of the provisions concerning children home to the employers, that it shall have been committed "knowingly." That an employer shall "knowingly" employ a child under ten underground, or a child under twelve for full time instead of half time, is next door to impossible. His purpose will be perfectly answered by employing children about whose age he knows nothing. Mr. BRUCE proposed on Thursday that instead of the liability of owners being limited to acts done "knowingly," it should be limited by a provision that owners and managers shall alike be held harmless, if they can show that they have used due diligence to prevent any violation of the law. To this compromise there seems no objection. It is one thing to require the authorities to prove that the owner knew that a child was under twelve, and another thing to allow an owner to prove that he made all the usual inquiries on the subject and received satisfactory answers. On Thursday the feeling of the mine-owning interest in the House of Commons seemed to be against this mode of settling the difficulty. The Government ought to be able to carry such a proposal in face of any amount of interested opposition.

SPAIN.

THE events of the next few months will probably determine the fate of the new Spanish dynasty. The seventh Administration within a year and a half now proposes to try the experiment whether Parliamentary government is possible in Spain. In the recent crisis the King for the first time placed himself in direct opposition to the majority in both Houses, as well as to SERRANO and TOPETE, who with all their faults are probably the most honourable and loyal of contemporary Spanish politicians. Remembering perhaps CAYOUS's famous saying that anybody can govern with a state of siege, the King positively refused to suspend the guarantees of personal liberty which are provided by the Constitution of 1870. When the Constituent Cortes, in the enthusiasm which followed the fall of Queen ISABELLA, were adding one more project to the long list of Spanish democratic Constitutions, it was sufficiently evident that paper prohibitions would never prevent the application of martial law in case of conspiracy or insurrection. It is probable that when SERRANO proposed the suspension of constitutional restraints he may have had strong reasons for apprehending danger. His premature amnesty has been followed by a revival of the Carlist movement in the North; and the necessity of drawing for reinforcements on his scanty reserves involved a difficulty in providing for the safety of the great towns.

It is said that the Republicans threatened to take advantage of the opportunity by rising in rebellion, and the Ministers easily convinced their friends in the Senate and the Congress of the expediency of entrusting them with extraordinary powers. It would seem that SAGASTA has, by his unscrupulous interference with the elections, deprived the Cortes of political and moral weight. SERRANO was supported by an overwhelming majority, and the leader of the Opposition had professedly seceded for the time from public life; yet the KING refused to confirm the decision of the Cortes, and for the first time he has called to his councils the leaders of the Radical party. It remains to be seen whether ZORRILLA or CORDOVA will be more successful than their Conservative opponents. The first step to be taken will necessarily be a dissolution, and the management of the elections will be in the hands of the new Ministers. Without the aid of the Republicans it is doubtful whether they will be able to secure a majority, and there must be danger in an alliance with a party which is avowedly hostile both to the dynasty and to the existing form of government.

The Republican orators, relying on the unpopularity which attaches to a foreigner, are never tired of reminding King AMADEO of the fate of the unfortunate MAXIMILIAN. It might be well that they should reflect whether the subsequent history of Mexico has illustrated the advantage of overthrowing even the unstable fabric of an alien Empire. Spain might perhaps under a Republic prove less anarchical than Mexico; but the overthrow of the monarchy would almost certainly be followed by civil war. The army has for three or four years abstained from direct interference in political struggles; but the strife of factions is not unlikely to prepare the way for military supremacy. The KING will either find his position untenable, or he will gradually learn to suppress his constitutional scruples. If he can rely on the chiefs of the army, he may perhaps think it useless and hopeless to depend in turn on rival politicians of the type of ZORRILLA and SAGASTA. It is not certain that his fall would be followed by the establishment of a Republic. The Carlists, indeed, are not likely to find partisans beyond the limits of two or three provinces, but the coalition of the adherents of the Duke of MONTPENSIER and Prince ALFONSO may perhaps secure the favour of the army. The fusion which has so often been vainly attempted in France has already been accomplished between the Spanish Pretenders. The Duke of MONTPENSIER, who has joined his family in Paris, has published a letter in which he recommends his nephew to his friends as the most eligible candidate for the Crown. The rest of the document consists in the vague generalities in which exiled princes are accustomed to express their unselfish patriotism, and their sorrow for the misfortunes of an ungrateful country. The Duke had hoped to contribute to the regeneration of Spain by taking his seat in the Cortes, until he found that his presence, instead of allaying political passions, might tend to excite them. He now contributes his share to the pacification of Spain by intimating his opinion that the reigning sovereign ought to be dethroned; and it may be presumed that the Duke of MONTPENSIER would be not unwilling to succeed to his authority as Regent in the name of Don ALFONSO. The occasion of his letter is probably the dismissal of SERRANO and TOPETE, who have always inclined to the cause of a Bourbon dynasty. There is, however, no reason to believe that the ex-Ministers have disclaimed their allegiance to the present KING. The general confusion of parties almost furnishes an excuse for the otherwise hopeless enterprise of the Carlists. To sanguine reactionists it may seem possible that, in its despair of permanent tranquillity, the country should at last take refuge in a stagnant absolutism. The present designs of the insurgents are unknown, except that they apparently hope to wear out the troops by isolated risings in various districts. It is remarkable that for many weeks nothing had been heard of Don CARLOS or of his brother before a recent rumour that the Pretender was holding a council of war to consider the expediency of his return to Spain. Princes who succeed in revolutions are not in the habit of consulting their advisers on the question of their personal share in the vindication of their rights. In the absence of the Princes it appears that there is no recognized chief of the insurrection. The leaders of the bands will derive encouragement from the resignation of his command by General BONAQUE, who was the principal lieutenant of SERRANO. It seems that seven or eight general officers have simultaneously retired from active service, for the purpose of expressing their disapproval of the change of Government, and their distrust of ZORRILLA. No equally serious exhibition of political feeling has occurred in the army since PRIM issued his celebrated order against the intervention of military officers in domestic contests. From a protest against the choice of a Minister the step to open mutiny may be easily taken; but there is reason to hope that SERRANO and TOPETE will discountenance any attempt to convert their retirement from office into a military grievance. If the most popular generals were to appeal to the army against the KING and his policy, it is not improbable that they might be followed by a large section of officers and soldiers. General CORDOVA, the new Minister of War, appears not to be distinguished by ability or experience, though his brother acquired some reputation in a former Carlist insurrection.

The difficulties of the Government are increased not only by the Carlist insurrection, but by the constant demand for troops to repress the rebellion in Cuba. More than half the army, under one of the ablest generals in Spain, has for a long time been stationed in the colony, where its services are required not only to hold the rebels in check, but to maintain the authority of the Government over the local Volunteers. It is for this reason that few troops can be spared for service in Biscay and Catalonia, and that conscious weakness induced SERRANO to attempt the compromise which has apparently resulted in the revival of the Carlist movement. The Republicans are fully aware of the drain on the resources of the Government, and they probably meditate a rising of their own whenever they may judge that the army is fully occupied elsewhere. There is no reason to believe that, even if they succeeded in obtaining possession of the capital and the great towns, they would be able to maintain themselves permanently in power. The country decided two or three years ago by overwhelming majorities to maintain the Monarchy, not so much because the institution is popular in Spain, as on account of the dislike and fear with which a Republic is regarded by the respectable classes. Whatever may be the intentions of CASTELAR and of other Republican leaders, the mass of the party consists of Socialists, of Jacobins, and of members of the International Society. The owners of property deprecate a form of government in which theories of spoliation might perhaps be adopted in practice. It is impossible for foreigners to estimate with even approximate accuracy the comparative numbers and strength of the five or six factions which are incessantly contending for power. Each party by itself is in a minority, and none of them are content to acquiesce peaceably in defeat. A dispassionate and patriotic Spaniard would probably think that, in a choice of difficulties, the public interest would be best promoted by the maintenance of almost any Government which happens to exist. There may be little moral difference between the chiefs of the two principal parties in the Cortes; but ZORRILLA, now that he has attained office, will desire order and tranquillity, while SAGASTA would perhaps welcome any public misfortune which restored him to power. There is still better reason for wishing that the KING may be able to defeat the schemes of the various Pretenders. In the prime of life, brave, honest, and able, he is infinitely preferable to Don CARLOS or Don ALFONSO, and he is scarcely more of an alien than the Duke of MONTPENSIER. Even if King AMADEO is ultimately compelled to trust to the loyalty of the army, he will in the first instance have shown a stronger attachment than any politician in Spain to the principles and to the restraints of constitutional government. If he retains his position for a few years, his merits will perhaps be appreciated, and his foreign origin will be partially forgotten. The enemies who taunt him with the fate of MAXIMILIAN forget that he was not an intruder landing with an invading army, but the chosen candidate of the Cortes, who had received from their constituents full powers to select an occupant for the vacant throne.

PARTIES IN THE VERSAILLES ASSEMBLY.

THE visit of the deputies of the Right to M. THIERS has conclusively established that the majority for disregarding which the PRESIDENT has been so much taken to task has no existence in fact. That the number of deputies who prefer a Monarchy to a Republic may be greater than the number of those who prefer a Republic to a Monarchy is quite possible; but it must be remembered that the deputations which attacked M. THIERS has carefully dissociated itself from purely monarchical intentions. The majority which the deputies composing it claimed to represent is a Conservative majority—a majority anxious above all things to put down Radicalism, and shocked above all things at M. THIERS's disposition to coquet with it. This is the substance of the Duke of BROGLIE's letter. The deputies of the Right had no wish, he says, to obtain from M. THIERS any declaration of adhesion to their monarchical views. All they asked was that he should make no declaration of adhesion to any other views; that he should adjourn the controversy as to forms of government in order to unite all the Conservative elements in the country under the common banner of resistance to revolution. The majority, the Duke maintains, is not divided upon questions of social order. He might have added, however, that it is divided upon almost every question of practical politics, and that, where Parliamentary tactics are concerned, this sort of division is as mischievous as any other. No one suspects any member of the majority of being unsound on the rights of property, or of cherishing a secret passion for street fighting. But men must be agreed upon something more than this if they are to work together for any common end, and it is this further agreement that does not seem to be forthcoming. For example, there is no form of French Conservatism which more deserves respect than that represented by the Journal des Débats. The one object of this newspaper ever since the formation of the present Government has been to drill the majority into something like concerted action. Yet what has the Journal des Débats to say of the interview between the Right and M. THIERS? Speaking by the mouth of M. JOHN LEMOINNE, it ironically congratulates the Conservatives on the pains they take to set up the Republic and to give M. THIERS every possible opportunity of assuming and affirming its existence. Until now, says M. LEMOINNE, the PRESIDENT has told every deputation that has come to him that he intends to stand by the Bordeaux Compact, to maintain neutrality between parties, and to consecrate all his efforts to the reorganization of the country. Now his language has changed, and he has frankly avowed his determination to labour for the consolidation of the Republic. The Conservatives have forced him to make a declaration of principles, and if, now that they have got it, they do not find it exactly to their mind, they have only themselves to thank. When they complain that M. THIERS does not take his Ministers from the ranks of the majority, and his policy from their ideas, they forget that the majority of which so much is said is nothing better than a coalition of parties which can only hang together on condition of putting their standards in their pockets, and hiding their opinions under a bushel. They are a majority when they have M. THIERS on their side; they become a minority as soon as he turns against them. When the Right assumes that it constitutes the Conservative majority, it forgets that agreement upon the abstract merits of a Monarchy would immediately be followed by disagreement upon the personal and visible merits of a King and a flag. There is far more real accord between the moderate sections of the Right and the Left than there is between the extreme and the moderate sections of the Right.

This plain speaking on the part of the ablest and most influential organ of French Conservatism has produced quite a ministerial crisis in the staff. M. ST. MARC GUERIN has written a letter announcing the cessation of his connexion with the paper, and two other of its principal writers have separated from it on the same grounds. So far, therefore, the step which was to exhibit to admiring France the spectacle of a united majority exercising a firm though gentle pressure on M. THIERS can hardly be said to have answered. The coalition which was meant to overawe the PRESIDENT has proved to be destitute of the power of coalescing either with itself or with any one else. In the midst of this confusion a deputy of the Left Centre has come forward to explain his views by way of an answer to M. D'HAUSONVILLE. M. LABOULAYE is, as Conservative, in the sense in which the Right profess to use the word, as the most pronounced Legitimist could be. He holds the same views upon questions of social order, and consequently, on the Duke of BROGLIE's showing, he has every title to call himself a member of the majority. M. LABOULAYE insists that M. THIERS could not confine himself within the limits which the Right have traced out for him even if he were personally inclined to do so. He has been elected President, not for his own sake, but because he represents certain ideas, certain desires, certain interests. When M. THIERS was chosen Chief of the Executive Power the nation did not mean to name a constitutional sovereign; it meant to elect the citizen who was marked out by long experience and past services as the best man to conclude peace, to re-establish government, to reconstruct the army, and to obtain the liberation of French territory. A President appointed to achieve these ends has no right to betake himself to the serene indolence of a Constitutional Olympus. The country which needs to be governed, and has fixed upon M. THIERS as its governor, would reproach him more bitterly for doing nothing than for doing too much. M. THIERS is the first and the only Minister of the Assembly and of the nation, and as such he has the right to make the acceptance of his policy the condition of his remaining in office. M. LABOULAYE holds that the Left Centre acted wisely in refusing to associate itself with the Right even for so plausible a purpose as the construction of a Conservative majority. He avows that he is by no means sure that the majority of the Chamber represents the majority of the nation. The Republic, he thinks, has now the support of that vast body of citizens who, having no strong political feelings, and only asking to be allowed to work in quiet, attach themselves as a matter of course to the existing Government, provided that it can guarantee them security at home and abroad. A Cabinet representing the majority of the nation would consequently be a Republican Cabinet. But a Cabinet chosen from the majority in the Assembly would be essentially a Monarchical Cabinet. As such it would have no title to the confidence of a country which shuns above all things the prospect of a new civil war. M. LABOULAYE does not pretend, either for himself or for his party, any very keen enthusiasm in favour of a Republic. But he denies that patriotic Frenchmen have any choice in the matter. A Legitimist, an Orleanist, a Bonapartist restoration are alike impossible. The time has gone by in which France could safely be kept in suspense between various forms of government. The only hope she has of peace and order is the foundation of a Conservative and Constitutional Republic.

It remains to be seen what influence the action of the Right and the more open avowals of political opinion which it has called forth will have upon M. THIERS. Certainly the Bordeaux Compact has not escaped uninjured from the turmoil. Instead of an Assembly in which all parties except the two extreme fractions on either side were bent upon postponing constitutional questions to a more convenient season, there is now an Assembly in which the Left Centre and the Moderate Left are bent upon establishing the Republic, and fully conscious that there is a power out of doors which, if appealed to, can be trusted to aid them in the enterprise. Every fresh election gives this party increased influence in the Chamber, both by adding to its voting strength, and by storing up additional evidence that it represents the opinion of the country more accurately than any of its rivals. Hitherto it is the monarchical party that has steadily insisted on the right of the present Assembly to frame a Constitution; but the force of this claim has been impaired by the passionate refusal of those who urge it to submit to the test of a general election. The Republican party is not hampered by any such inconsistency. It can assert the constituent character of the present Assembly, because, if the fact is disputed, it is willing to go to the constituencies by way of qualifying itself for its new work. It will be a curious instance of the unexpected effects which sometimes spring from trifling causes if the ill-judged effort of the Right to assert its power over M. THIERS should lead to the deliberate adoption of a Republican form of government.

LAW OFFICERS.

THE total defeat of Mr. FAWCETT's motion for the abolition of the Treasury Warrant on the remuneration of the Law Officers will perhaps satisfy him that his project of establishing a Ministry of Justice is for the present impracticable. Mr. LOWE's sarcasms and Mr. GLADSTONE's just and unexpected eulogy of the quality of humour were more acceptable to the House than Mr. FAWCETT's theories or Mr. HARCOURT's lamentations over the clouded prospects of law reform. Frequent experience has shown that in controversies which affect professional interests laymen are no match for lawyers; but on this occasion the lawyers themselves were divided or neutral, while Mr. FAWCETT was answered by Mr. LOWE, who has long since left the profession, and by Mr. GLADSTONE, who never belonged to it. It can scarcely be said that either Minister took the trouble to discuss the principles which may have been involved in the motion. Mr. LOWE sneered at the assumption that an able man could not dispose of any requisite amount of business; and it is perfectly true that professional or official training cultivates in a high degree the faculty of doing in the shortest time whatever can be done at all. Mr. GLADSTONE, who has been in office during a great part of his life, declared that the demands of the Government on the attention of its legal advisers were habitually irrespective of the exigencies of private practice. Prudent debaters often deliberately prefer the most superficial arguments which may be expected to satisfy the assembly which they address. More recondite reasons open up doubtful issues which may perhaps unnecessarily provoke differences of opinion. The real impediment to the creation of a Ministry of Justice is not that Attorney-Generals are active and able men, but that the English Constitution concentrates all power in the hands of party leaders. In all branches of administration there have been numerous schemes for transferring the control of affairs to the permanent functionaries who are familiar with the details of their respective departments; but even if the functions of Government were nominally redistributed, authority would inevitably gravitate back to its Parliamentary centre. The advocates of Mr. FAWCETT's plan condemn their own proposal in their definition of the attributes which a Minister of Justice is to possess. Learned, dispassionate, indifferent to the struggles of factions, and perhaps not possessing the abilities of a brilliant advocate or debater, the official legislator would be as helplessly isolated among his colleagues as an archbishop in the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. He might probably be the most dignified and efficient member of a Government of clerks, but he would not be in the English sense of the word a Minister, except in title. Chancellors and Law Officers would be tempted to regard him with jealousy or with contemptuous indifference; and he would find himself absolutely dependent on their support. There is nothing to prevent a Lord Chancellor, with all the patronage of the profession at his disposal, from doing all that could be done by a Minister of Justice, except that he holds his office by a precarious tenure, as a principal member of a temporarily dominant party. It is easy to dilate on the anomalous position of a great judge who depends from day to day on a Parliamentary majority; but the disabilities of the Chancellor are inseparable from his dignity and authority as a member of the governing Committee of Parliament. As long as the constituencies think fit through their representatives to exercise supreme power, they must accept the consequence in the subordinate position of all non-political functionaries.

It is not the business of a Minister of high rank to draw Bills, but to prescribe the principles on which they are to be framed for the attainment of certain objects. A competent jurist might devise remedies for many defects in the legal system; but, unless he had a seat in Parliament, he would be shut out from the opportunity of legislation, while as a peer or as a member of the House of Commons he would be simply Chancellor or Attorney-General under a novel designation. Mr. STEPHEN, in his published letter to Mr. FAWCETT, recommends the appointment not of a Minister of Justice, but of a permanent Board, Committee, or Commission, which "should not be in a position of official subordination to the Government for the time being." The Commission would frame measures, which, if they met with the approval of the Government, would be introduced into Parliament by the Chancellor or by the Law Officers of the Crown; and Mr. STEPHEN will perhaps on reconsideration admit that the condition assumes the subordination which had been previously excluded. The mere assent of the Government would not be sufficient, unless its legal members were willing to exert themselves in promoting the measures of the Commission. As in all questions between official politicians and mere administrators, the difficulty arises in the necessity of finding a motive power for any machinery which may be invented. The formal resolutions of the Commissioners, their drafts of Bills, and their published statements of objects and reasons, would in vain be laid on the tables of both Houses, unless the Crown lawyers could be induced to assume the conduct of each measure. "If the Commissioners drew a Bill which the Government refused to introduce, the reasons for that refusal should be assigned, and the Commissioners, on the other hand, should assign their reasons for availing it to be pro-ceeded with." A glance at the Parliamentary reports at this time of year will suggest the reasons which would too probably be assigned for a refusal to introduce any measure. To an official assertion that the state of public business unfortunately rendered the introduction of a useful Bill impossible, the Commissioners would, whatever might be their own opinion, find it impossible to return an answer. Nevertheless Mr. STEPHEN's plan is the most practical which has yet been suggested. A Commission which was charged with the duty of making its proceedings public would, if it were properly constituted, possess considerable weight and influence. Mr. STEPHEN proposes to substitute for the irresponsible advisers and assistants of the Government a higher rank of draftsmen, who would receive the credit of the measures which they framed and prepared. An essential part of his scheme is that every measure of the Commissioners should be referred to a Select Committee, and that its objects and provisions should be fully explained to the Committee by the author of the Bill. The alterations which might be introduced by the Select Committee or by the House would be referred back to the Commissioners for a report, not on the decisions of Parliament, but on the language in which they might be most conveniently carried into effect. As Mr. STEPHEN observes, Chancellors and Attorney-Generals rarely possess the faculty of legislative expression; and they have little leisure for considering clauses and phrases. They are therefore compelled to rely on the aid of persons who are unknown and possibly obscure; and it would be desirable to provide them with a comparatively independent Council. The relations of the Government to the proposed Commission would resemble those which exist between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the heads of the great revenue departments. Any attempt to make the Legislative Commission more independent than the Boards of Customs and Inland Revenue would probably result in failure. Mr. FAWCETT's Minister of Justice with the salary of three Prime Ministers is a mere chimera, while Mr. STEPHEN's Board, which might perhaps with advantage be formed of a Legislative Committee of Privy Council, is carefully designed to create the least possible disturbance of existing institutions.

It seems not impossible that a Department charged with the preparation of Parliamentary measures might at last solve the arduous problem of framing a code of law. Mr. STEPHEN selects for mention a code of Penal Law, which may perhaps deserve the preference, not because it is most urgently needed, but as the simplest and easiest branch of legislation. A portion of the task has been already accomplished; and it happens that criminal jurisprudence is often administered not unsatisfactorily by judges who had scarcely seen the trial of a prisoner before their elevation to the Bench. If a Penal Code were once in operation, a Commercial Code would perhaps follow in course of time. It is not likely that Parliament would reject a well-considered measure of codification proposed by competent authority, whether it embraced the whole province of law, or formed a mere fragment capable of being adjusted into the whole fabric which may hereafter be completed. The process of original legislation would be more invidious and more difficult. A Ballot Bill, and even a Licensing Bill, can only be introduced by a Ministry which must consider political expediences and possibilities as well as public advantage. A permanent Commission would be limited to the application of principles which are universally acknowledged. If their assistance was invoked in the construction and details of measures of which they might perhaps disapprove, they would subside into the irresponsible position of Parliamentary draftsmen. It is extremely difficult to insert any new kind of mechanism into the constitutional and administrative system; but Mr. STEPHEN's plan deserves careful examination, and, if it is approved, it may be fairly and easily tried. That any new institution will effect the purpose for which it is designed cannot be hastily assumed. A dozen Departments have been created and abolished within the last five-and-twenty years; and it is possible that a Legislative Commission might be equally transitory. The more ancient offices seem not to have been endangered by recent attacks.

BETHNAL GREEN.

THE visit of the Prince and Princess of WALES to Bethnal Green was a happy idea, which was very happily carried out. As a pageant it could not of course be compared with the scene on Thanksgiving Day; yet it was, after a fashion of its own, singularly impressive, touching, and even brilliant. Strangers from the West who had never been so far East before must have been surprised to find a district, associated in their minds with the idea of the most abject destitution, looking so spruce and blooming; but perhaps those who were familiar with it in its ordinary aspects, and especially the inhabitants, had most reason to rub their eyes and wonder where they were. Bethnal Green is one of the poorest and dingiest quarters of London. It is the seat of a number of precarious industries, and the refuge of a large floating population which is either struggling on the brink of pauperism or has just dipped under. It is at Bethnal Green that one hears stories of silk-weavers starving at their looms, of sempstresses pining over shifts at "three halfpence a piece, and find your own thread," and of little children of three and even two years old being set to the making of match-boxes. This is the dark side of the picture, and nothing can be darker or more pathetic. But it is a mistake to suppose that the whole region is uniformly steeped in squalor, poverty, and wretchedness. It has its humble, but thriving, working classes, and it has also a substantial middle-class element to give it backbone, and to bear the heavy burden of the rates. Bethnal Green is certainly something different from a vast Seven Dials, but to the eye it is sad and dismal enough. What is most depressing about it is not so much its look of poverty, though it looks perhaps even poorer than it is, as its monotonous meanness and dullness. The whole life of the people seems to be washed down to a dingy, ashen monotone, which is reflected in the weary sameness of the shabby streets. It is a poor, careworn existence, without colour or animation, or anything to refresh the mind and stimulate the imagination. Such is the district which on Monday fluttered with flags and pennons, and made itself gay with strips of calico, festoons of paper flowers, and inscriptions in honour of the PRINCE and PRINCESS. Very little had been said about the affair beforehand, and to those who were not in the secret the surprise was startling; indeed, so much was left to spontaneous feeling and impromptu effort, that it is doubtful whether anybody knew what the display would be till it was actually set out. The artistic inspiration was of the most primitive character. Local Committees had decked the route for several miles with strings of flags suspended across the streets; the rest was left to the voluntary enterprise of the householders, who simply stripped their rooms of the most showy objects they contained, and stuck them up outside. Old rugs, carpets, curtains, tea-trays, chimney-piece ornaments, and fire-place finery in tissue paper were all included in this frank and homely system of embellishment. Here and there a shopkeeper had come out strong with crimson-cloth and Dutch metal; but the most significant and touching feature of the scene was the unsophisticated heartiness and sincerity with which the people produced their simple domestic contributions to the general display. It was in every sense a genuine popular festival, and nothing could be more honest or spontaneous than the welcome which the PRINCE received. It is probable that a great many of the inhabitants of the East of London saw the PRINCE for the first time on Monday, and those who had seen him before must have felt the difference between going to see him in a distant part of the town and receiving him at home. This time they were not merely spectators, but hosts. The PRINCE had come to see them, and they were there to do the honours in their own fashion, sitting at their windows in a crush of children, with the best rug thrown over the window-sill, a row of flower-pots, and festoons of tissue-paper flowers to represent their homage. The PRINCE is pretty well used by this time to flags and cheering, but he must have felt that he never had a more flattering reception than he met with at Bethnal Green.

It is impossible to doubt that it is a good thing that the PRINCE and the people should be brought together in this way. The people will feel that the PRINCE belongs to them more than ever now that he has been to see them in their own part of the town; and they will henceforth have a pleasant sense of personal intimacy with the institutions under which they live. It seems that when there was first a question of establishing a Museum at Bethnal Green there was some difficulty in getting at the "proper authorities"; but the inhabitants have now had the satisfaction of seeing in the flesh both the PRINCE of WALES and the LORD MAYOR. Philosophical persons who revel in abstract ideas would perhaps not be confirmed in their attachment to the Constitution by the sight of a young man in a general's uniform riding in a carriage, by the side of a charming PRINCESS in a pretty pink bonnet, and bowing and smiling pleasantly to right and left, or even by the escort of Life Guards, with their flashing swords and breastplates and waving plumes. But the popular imagination delights in a personal embodiment of great ideas, and it is as well that the Government of the country should be identified in the minds of the people with somebody more agreeably impressive than Policeman X. Apart altogether from the political influence of the PRINCE's visit, which it would be as easy to exaggerate as to underrate, it can hardly be doubted that the people of Bethnal Green will be the better for their holiday and for the brightness which it shed, if only for a moment, upon the very shady place where they live. It is a pity the rainbow should fade away so completely, and one cannot help regretting the chromatic austerities of modern English architecture. But even when all the flags are down, and the decorations removed, a bright streak of colour will linger in the recollection of the people, and will be reflected in the associations of the district, so that the mean, dingy streets will perhaps never be quite so commonplace to them as before. The new Museum will of course always be associated with the PRINCE's day, and will probably help to enliven and elevate the poor life of the dull and weary people around it. Even if they do not go much inside it, the majolica fountain in the courtyard will be a cheering thing to look at as they pass to and fro. It will certainly be a great mistake if too much is expected from the Museum all at once. Its influence must necessarily be slow and gradual. The enjoyment of fine pictures is not a taste to be acquired in a day, or by merely studying pictures; it is the result of general culture and refinement. There is sure to be a good deal of curiosity about the Museum at first, and the startling value of some of the little canvases which Sir RICHARD WALLACE has generously lent for exhibition will invest them with a peculiar interest for people whose ideas of money and money's worth are, beyond a certain limited point, of a sentimental rather than a practical character. But when the first flush of curiosity and amazement has passed away, it is not improbable that the Museum may not be much frequented by the people of its own neighbourhood; and the rival attractions of the pot-house and the gin-palace will not be readily overcome. Yet there is much in the magnificent HERTFORD collection to appeal to popular sympathies. The humour and bluff candour of the Dutch pictures, the graces of Sir JOSHUA's beauties, and the marvellous workmanship of the MEISSONIERS, can hardly fail to be appreciated, if only dimly; and the examples of artistic furniture may also be expected to find admirers.

Sir RICHARD WALLACE shared with the PRINCE of WALES the honours of the day. His liberality has evidently made a deep impression on the public mind; and the reporter of one of the morning papers, who describes him as a quiet-looking gentleman "in plain morning dress and lavender gloves," perhaps expected to see some one resembling the good prince of a fairy tale. Sir RICHARD deserves all the praise that has been bestowed on him; but there is surely a touch of conscious or unconscious satire on the measure of social duty ordinarily recognized by very rich men in the kind of startled admiration with which what is called his munificence is regarded. Sir RICHARD has proved his munificence in many ways, as in his prompt and really munificent gifts to the city of Paris during and after the siege, and his present of the TEBBERG to our National Gallery; and there can be no doubt that he has just done a wise and generous thing in sending his pictures to Bethnal Green. There is no reason, however, to suppose that his treasures will not be properly protected; and he can see them whenever he chooses by merely taking the trouble to drive in a comfortable carriage to the East of London. That this particular act should be extolled as a personal sacrifice of the most heroic and unparalleled kind can hardly be considered flattering to the public spirit which is usually displayed by rich men in this country. If capitalists understood how much is in their power, and how easily they might win distinction by a judicious application of their wealth, such incidents might be expected to be less uncommon. The new Museum is not only a branch of the South Kensington collections, but the building actually consists of the historic "Boilers," which have been transplanted to the far East. It is well that Bethnal Green should have a Museum of any kind, but it may be observed that, besides presenting the discarded and useless "Boilers," South Kensington has done nothing for its protegé except start it in the world with a dusty collection of stale pickles, which is supposed to convey a vivid idea of the chemical analysis of food. This would seem to be but poor and tardy compensation for the policy which South Kensington has persistently and perseveringly pursued, of removing all the museums and collections it can lay hands on to as great a distance as possible from the masses of the people.

ORIGINALITY AND PLAGIARISM.

WE have received a little pamphlet, written with curious simplicity of style and thought, by Mr. Cruikshank. As admirers of his genius, we should be glad to do him any justice in our power; and we are therefore happy to announce to all whom it may concern that Mr. Cruikshank considers himself to have "originated" the stories of the Miser's Daughter and the Tower of London. Mr. Cruikshank put forward these claims in a letter to the Times in the month of April last; and Mr. Harrison Ainsworth, who has hitherto passed for the exclusive possessor of such claims to glory as may result from the authorship of these stories, contented himself with giving a "flat contradiction" to Mr. Cruikshank's letters. Hereupon arises a controversy, on which, as it depends on the private understanding which existed between an author and an artist some thirty years ago, and as our only knowledge comes from the statements of one of the persons concerned, we must decline to express any decided opinion. We may regret, indeed, that Mr. Ainsworth did not express himself more mildly, and we are sorry that Mr. Cruikshank should have thought it necessary to his honour to plunge into so fruitless a discussion. But we cannot go into the ins and outs of a dispute which, for reasons to be explained directly, possesses very little interest for any human being, and which can hardly be decided by any information at our disposal.

The fact, however, that the controversy exists is suggestive of some obvious reflections. And, in the first place, it is rather singular that anybody, and more especially any one who deservedly enjoys a high artistic reputation, should be at the present moment anxious to establish so equivocal a claim. When the discussion between Messrs. Pugin and Barry as to the design of the Houses of Parliament was raging, some people urged that filial affection should have induced them to exchange places, and that each of the combatants should have been anxious to prove that his father did not, rather than that he did, deserve to be considered as the main architect. However it might be in that case, we should certainly say that, if Mr. Cruikshank were well advised, he would say as little as possible about his share in the letterpress of Mr. Ainsworth's novels. We have indeed a kind of lingering affection for those remarkable productions, founded upon boyish associations. We can remember the time when we took a keen interest in the simple-minded sensationalism of the tremendous romances in question, and though our memory of details is fast vanishing, we have a distinct vision of Dick Turpin's ride to York, as commemorated in Rockwood. This, by the way, is one of the stories to which Mr. Cruikshank makes no claim, but we strongly suspect that it was just as good or bad as those in which he had a hand. Good or bad, they have been plunging pretty deeply into oblivion, and the rising generation has found new food more to its taste, and leaves poor Dick Turpin to moulder on forgotten shelves side by side with the two eternal cavaliers of G. P. R. James. If, however, they are remembered at all, they will be remembered chiefly from Mr. Cruikshank's illustrations. In a pleasant criticism of the artist's works, published in the Westminster Review in 1840, Thackeray makes some appropriate remarks upon this subject. Speaking of Jack Sheppard, he says, "It seems to us that Mr. Cruikshank really created the tale, and that Mr. Ainsworth, as it were, only put words to it." Let any reader, he says, think over it now that a few months are passed, and "tell us what he remembers of the tale. George Cruikshank's pictures, always George Cruikshank's pictures." He goes on to describe two plates representing storms on the Thames, and compares them with the pictures in words; Mr. Ainsworth describes steeples toppling and towers reeling in the tallest of language, and declares that any one who had faced the gale "would have been instantly stifled." But on the whole we can believe that the illustration puts the scene before us more forcibly than the text. Now Jack Sheppard, according to Mr. Cruikshank's own account, was "originated" as well as written by Mr. Ainsworth. Yet, as we see, the plates which it suggested to him were so powerful that they produced upon Thackeray's mind the impression that the state of the facts was just what Mr. Cruikshank alleges to have occurred in regard to the Tower of London and the Miser's Daughter. Now we would simply suggest to Mr. Cruikshank that this places him in a much more satisfactory position in regard to the first stories, where he makes no claim, than he would occupy in regard to the others if his claim were admitted. Surely it is far more creditable to an artist to have produced some excellent work on the suggestion of what it would be absurdly complimentary to call second-rate literature, than to have produced both the good pictures and the bad writing. There is no better proof of imaginative power than the capacity for extracting—if we may so speak—a good sermon from a bad text. Nothing gives, to take an example from a higher region of art, a greater notion of Shakespeare's power than a comparison of the raw materials of some of his plays with the marvellous poetry which he engrafted upon them. And we should certainly think more highly of Mr. Cruikshank's art the more completely we could free him in our mind from any complicity in the text of Mr. Ainsworth's stories.

To another dispute in which Mr. Cruikshank has unfortunately been engaged these remarks are not altogether applicable. Though we do not consider Oliver Twist to be amongst the best of Dickens's writings, it is certainly a book in which Mr. Cruikshank might be proud to claim a share. Upon this point, however, his claim suggests a different observation. Let us suppose that Mr. Cruikshank is entirely correct in his recollection of the part which he played. His whole statement is simply that he described the character of Fagin to Mr. Dickens, who took it up and made what we see of it. Now, if this be entirely accurate, to what does it amount? Suppose that Mr. Cruikshank had described a Jewish receiver of stolen goods to any other writer, as, for example, to Mr. Harrison Ainsworth. Does he suppose that the Jew as described by him or by any other writer would have been equal to the Jew as described by Dickens? He may have given the hint; but the whole merit of the character really depends upon the way in which it was made to move, and talk, and act by the novelist. It is not the mere outline, which would have done equally well in any hands; but, on the contrary, it was the filling up of the outline which gave to it all that is really interesting. The theme might have been treated by a hundred different writers, and the result would have varied in merit from the merest lay-figure up to the most complete and admirable embodiment of genius. Imagine the cases to be reversed; if Dickens had described the Jew to Mr. Cruikshank, would the merits of the portrait have belonged exclusively to the novelist? Hundreds of artists, Mr. Cruikshank among them, have endeavoured to portray Falstaff. They have all made him preposterously fat, and, as far as they could, jovial, cynical, and humorous. But Falstaff in the hands of a bad artist is no better than the stupidest caricature that ever disgraced the pages of a comic journal; in the hands of the best, he may be almost a worthy representative of the great poet's creation. When Raffaele embodied his vision of feminine grace and dignity in the Sistine Madonna, he was not original in the sense of having invented the character; but nobody would think of detracting from the praise due to him because there had already been numberless attempts to do that in which he excelled all his predecessors. Or take the best description of Falstaff that was ever composed in prose, the most careful analysis of his character that has ever been put together by the ablest writer, and suppose that Shakespeare had had that description before him when he wrote; would it have been of the slightest use to him if he had not been Shakespeare? It is possible to give useful hints to the greatest imaginative creators, whether they work in words or in colours, but the merit lies in the power of embodying the bare suggestion in living and moving realities.

And now, to return to the case of Dickens, Mr. Cruikshank may have suggested to him the propriety of writing a story about a thieving Jew, but that circumstance makes singularly little difference to the claims either of Dickens or of Mr. Cruikshank. Mr. Cruikshank appears to be under the common impression that originality means the creation of a new character out of nothing. If that were the case, there would be very little original writing in the world, and moreover the original writing would be far from the best. All the greatest characters in poetry and fiction are in reality portraits; and very many of them are portraits of the creator himself. It would be curious to go over the most celebrated novels from this point of view, and to show how the characters which are most deservedly admired are almost invariably drawn from the life. The distinguishing peculiarity of the great artist is not that he invents something absolutely new, but that he can see fresh sources of interest in objects which to the ordinary observer are stupid and colourless. There is nobody of whom this is more conspicuously true than of Dickens, and some curious cases have been revealed by Mr. Forster's biography. We now know for certain what any literary critic of the smallest experience could have pretty well guessed beforehand, that all the most striking figures in his stories were in fact drawn from nature; and the only result is that we wonder more than ever at the extraordinary quickness of eye and freedom of touch which could clothe commonplace figures in such vivid colours. To evolve characters from one's inner consciousness is not really the method of a great writer, unless indeed that phrase may be applied to his descriptions of himself; and the more closely we examine any great work, the more distinctly we shall realize the fact that the most brilliant imagination can only throw new light upon old materials. Dickens's extraordinary fertility in inventing types of character is merely another name for extraordinary keenness of observation. Whether he took Fagin at first hand from some genuine old Jew whom he observed in his peregrinations, or drew him at second hand from Mr. Cruikshank's description, is a question which may possibly be of some interest to the literary historian, but is of no real significance as affecting his claim to originality. The same remark applies to Mr. Cruikshank himself. He has the merit of having drawn powerful pictures, and we care not who was the original who sat to him—a flesh and blood Hebrew, or the creation of Mr. Dickens's fancy, or whether, as one would rather suppose, Dickens's description served to awaken in him recollections of figures which he had seen with the bodily eye. The writer and the illustrator may mutually quicken each other's imagination; but it is little matter who throws the match when the essential thing is that it falls upon a mental magazine already stored full of images. We regret, therefore, that a matter which is really of such minor importance should have excited so much feeling; though we hope that, as Mr. Cruikshank happens to feel so strongly on what we consider to be a trifle, he may be satisfied by more courteous treatment than a "flat contradiction."

PARISH CONSTABLES.

WE spoke a little time back about the question now before Parliament as to the payment of Clerks to Justices of the Peace by salaries instead of by fees. Since then we are glad to see that the matter is now before Parliament in another shape. The question is no longer left in the hands of private members, but the needed reform is now brought forward as a Government measure. There is no need for us to say over again what we have said already, but we wish to call the thoughts of Mr. Bruce and Mr. Winterbotham, whose names are on the back of the Bill, and of all others whom it may concern, to a consequence which, as it seems to us, ought to follow on the adoption of the proposed change, and which—whether or not with a distinct perception of the logic of the case we cannot say—is in fact contemplated by Mr. Hibbert and Mr. Stanfeld, the authors of another Bill also before Parliament. The consequence indeed is of so remarkable a kind that we should not wish to guess its adoption.

unseemly or irreverent haste. But the startling thought has sometimes come into our heads, If Justices' Clerks are paid by salaries, might not Parish Constables safely be abolished? We feel that we have a case to make out which calls for our best powers of argument, and it is quite a relief to us to find that, in our practical conclusion at any rate, we have at least two legislators already on our side. For, first of all, we feel that the backs of all steadygoing people cannot fail to be set up at the bare thought of getting rid of so ancient and venerable an office. And, secondly, we feel that, as we have put it, there may seem to be no logical connexion between the premises and the conclusion. One who has not lived much in the world of local administration may think that a Parish Constable and a Justices' Clerk are two quite distinct functionaries, each, no doubt, equally useful and admirable in his own way, but who stand in no possible relation to one another. Why should a change in the payment of one of them lead to a result so fearful as the utter sweeping away of the other? We can only say that, though there is no kind of connexion in idea, there is the closest possible connexion in practice. We call on doubters to listen to the words of experience.

We must leave to constitutional antiquaries so grave a task as that of working out the origin and the primitive functions of the parish constable. Perhaps it might be safe, at least within the walls of University College, to attribute his invention, like the invention of other things, to the wisdom of Alfred. The King who summoned the first British jury, who divided England into counties, hundreds, and tithings, who invented frankpledge, the curfew, and the feudal system—we beg pardon, we rather think it was William the Conqueror, or perhaps Julius Cæsar, who invented the last two—and who was so far in advance of his age as to invent a collegiate system which for four hundred years nobody thought of imitating—surely he and no other must have devised the great institution of the parish constable. That this functionary bears a French name is no difficulty. We know a borough, governed not by a portreeve, but by a bailiff, which firmly believes, no doubt in good faith, that its present constitution, titles and all, was a device of Alfred. And must we not believe it? If we fail to do so, we shall get called “carping antiquarians” or some such name, which we doubt not sounds very ugly in some quarters. As such old-fashioned notions as truth and accuracy have given way to that peculiar form of “historical essay” of which—so one great authority tells us—“Dean Stanley is the founder and master,” there is nothing to do but to follow the example of the Δικαίος Λόγος. We therefore take the plunge;

Καυτοποῶ πρὸς ἑνὸς.

We hail then in the parish constable a genuine institution of the Founder of University College. As in later times many things besides joints of meat turned on the King's turnspit being a member of Parliament, we will venture on the rash suggestion that the wise King, remembering his own fault, ordained that the constable, among other important functions, should act as a common turncake to all who were under his authority.

We say “authority”; because there can be little doubt that the constable once was, as his sounding title implies, a person really clothed with authority. According to a little book which we read and reviewed some time back, he was properly a military personage, the commander of the contingent which the mark, gemeinde, or parish sent to the militia, the fyrd, the constitutional force of the realm. We have not a word to say against this doctrine, except that, if it ever was so, it must have been a long time ago. In these later times we never heard of any division of the Militia or Volunteers being headed by the parish constable. If we had ever seen any constable discharging any such palpably useful functions, far be it from us to propose to sweep him away. We should rather hail with delight a military functionary of so strictly constitutional a type. What could be more worthy of Alfred than a captain named from among the people at large by one civil officer in the shape of the overseer, and approved by another in the shape of the justice of the peace? Our own memory only goes back to days when the parish constable was, in theory at least, a terror to evil-doers, but in a character purely civil, or military so far only as his duties might sometimes call for an appeal to the strong arm and to the use of the official truncheon. We suspect that in those days he had somewhat fallen from his high estate. He had stooped to be the executor of the sentences of a tribunal much less ancient than himself. We speak, especially in these times, under correction, for we are not clear whether justices of the peace are to be set down as an invention of Alfred. Of course we do not positively deny it, as their foundation by Alfred may have been proved in some historical essay of a peculiar character; but we have a notion, picked up perhaps from carping antiquaries, that justices of the peace date, with some changes in their nature and way of appointment, from the days of the later Edwards. At all events, within our memory the parish constable had sunk to be the executive power to carry out the decrees of the local administrators of justice, till the wisdom of Parliament found out another way of discharging his duty.

In short, it has fared with the parish constable pretty much as it fared with the elder Gods of the Greek mythology. Νέρεως, Γαίης, and their fellows were not exactly destroyed, nor yet formally degraded, but they were quietly shamed aside, and new Gods took their places. Something like this not uncommonly happens in the history of law-abiding England. It is not easy to get rid of even the smallest detail of the British Constitution.

When the Oxford Reform Bill passed and decreed that “the Congregation of the University of Oxford should consist of” certain persons, instead of certain other persons of whom it had hitherto consisted, it was fondly believed that the new Congregation, with its new constitution and its new duties, would absorb the old, with its different constitution and its different duties. But the result of the Act turned out to be to create a quite new “Congregation of the University of Oxford,” and to leave standing beside it the “Ancient Congregation,” just as it stood before. Something in the same way, we have created the Guardians of the Poor, practical persons enough according to their own construction of their duties, that of guarding the purse of the parish against the poor. But alongside of them still abide the ancient Overseers of the Poor, persons who also discharge useful functions enough, but with which the poor are, since the creation of the Guardians, only very indirectly concerned. So in the like sort, when the County Police—first tried, as usual, as an optional measure—was made compulsory everywhere, one might have thought that the parish constable would have vanished. His duties as the protector of life and property, the man bound to bring wrongdoers before the magistrate and to carry out the sentence which the magistrate pronounced, might seem to have been altogether transferred to other hands. His occupation seemed wholly to have gone, the reason for his being seemed quite to have come to an end, when all that he had ever tried to do after his own deoulatory and parochial fashion was much better done by the men in blue, working under regular discipline according to a regular organization. He now seemed to belong to a past state of things; he was a curious fragment of an earlier generation, like those strange animals of the edentate and pachydermatous orders which look as if they had no business in the reign of Zeus, but ought to have passed away with Kronos or Ouranos. It might have been thought that the parish constable would have gone, simply leaving his name behind him for carping antiquaries to discuss his exact relations to the Constable of France, and for lovers of proverbial lore to search out what kind of an officer it was that gentlemen of an extravagant turn are popularly said to outrun.

We have made some researches into the practical working of the parish constable, now that he exists in this shadowy state alongside of the officers to whom his duties have really been transferred. One magistrate tells us that in the space of twelve years he has known a parish constable act once, and that, if he rightly remembers, was by way of helping the police when he had a special motive to help them. Another tells us that all that he ever had to do with parish constables was to commit the constable of his own parish—perhaps his own natural military chief—to prison for beating his wife, and that, to add to the scandal of so great a functionary so misbehaving, the order for taking the culprit to prison had to be addressed to the culprit himself. All that another could tell us was that he had once been named for the office himself, that he was not clear whether he had ever been formally appointed, but that he certainly had no remembrance of having discharged any additional duties on the strength of his new dignity, if he held it. These small facts may be taken as showing that the action of the parish constable is at least not very vigorous or permanent, and that he might pass away without the foundations of society being seriously shaken. But there is one class of men who, as the law stands at this moment, would suffer a good deal by the abolition of parish constables. This brings us round to the doctrine with which we started. For whose sake is the parish constable kept up? It is hardly for his own sake. There may be minds so oddly constituted as to have a special ambition for the office of parish constable, but we cannot think that they can be many. The dignity nowadays is at least not great; the revenues are nothing at all; the duties, if they are ever discharged, cannot be very agreeable. The constable is something like a Roman Consul under Theodoric. In one point he differs. If his dignity is not the first on earth, he is at least freed from the necessity of providing games for the people. But he closely follows the steps of his Roman prototype in this. The Consul, so at least Cassiodorus assured him, enjoyed all the honours of office, while the Gothic King did all the work. Even so the parish constable enjoys all the honours of office, whatever they may be, while the work is done for him by the county policeman. Still we can hardly think the attractions of the post can be so great that many candidates would be found to volunteer their names if the overseers did not put them down on the list. If, then, the office is not kept up for the sake of the constables themselves, is it kept up for the sake of the general public? That can hardly be, when the constables do so little for the defence of the general public as appears by the evidence which we have already brought forward. Is it for the sake of the particular parishes for which the constables are chosen? That can hardly be, when the parishes get no more out of the constables than other people, while they have to pay fees on their appointment. This brings us to the real final cause of the existence of parish constables now that there is nothing whatever for them to do. They exist for the sake of those who receive the fees which the parishes pay on their appointment. That is to say, they exist for the sake of the Justices' Clerks. The constables are appointed yearly after a fashion not lacking in solemnity. The overseers bring their lists, and out of those lists the magistrates appoint the constables under what we might venture to call a lettre nominative from the overseers. There is some swearing and paying on the part of the overseers. On another day the constables come themselves in person, and are admitted to their office. Then there is more swearing and paying on the part of the constables. For what purpose, then, is all this? The time of the overseers is wasted, the time of the magistrates is wasted, the time of the constables themselves is wasted. The general public gets no good; the particular parishes have to pay. Who then gains? The Justices' Clerk, and the Justices' Clerk only. All the rest go through an empty ceremony; he goes through the very practical business of receiving his fees. But if Justices' Clerks are to be paid by salary instead of by fees, it would seem to follow as the necessary consequence that parish constables might be safely done away with. The constables exist only to pay fees to the clerks, and, if the clerks are no longer to receive fees, there is no longer any reason for the existence of the constables. It can hardly be said that they should be kept up in order that fees may be paid to the counties, for that argument is as broad as it is long. What the ratepayers would gain at one end they would lose at the other. The parish constable no doubt once had his use; he may or may not be an invention of Alfred; he may or may not have been the military commander of the parish; but, now that he exists only to pay fees to the Justices' Clerks, he may safely go the way of other things which have once been useful and are so no longer.

LONDON AS SUMMER QUARTERS.

LONDON is perhaps the last place that intending holiday-makers would select as eligible summer quarters, and yet, in our opinion, they might do very much worse. We should hardly recommend it to those who love the quiet beauty of nature for its own sake, and who like to take their pleasures placidly if not dreamily. It is true that solitary City churchyards may be romantic enough, when the business tide has ebbed away of an evening to the suburbs. But although the moss-grown slabs, German-silvered by the smoke-tinged moonlight, may have a certain weird and solemn picturesqueness, a little meditation among those melancholy tombs would go a very long way. The early freshness and the first blaze of bloom in the Parks soon wear and fade in the smoke and soot of a London season, and the first charming contrast with brick and stucco swiftly changes to the depressing uniformity of urban tone. In short, if you are one of the few who can begin the enjoyment of the day by merely opening the windows, who feast their eyes on waving foliage, and soothe their minds with the song of birds and murmur of bees, who thoroughly delight in some quiet ride or long rambling walk—if you are one of those rare exceptions to the almost universal rule, you would certainly make a mistake in coming to London for summer. But most of us are so used to movement of one sort or another that a sudden arrest of accumulated momentum would be like a sort of paralysis. Our recreation is merely the change of one excitement for another. If we are men of business, we may consent to bore ourselves for the sake of our health and our families, but we insist on being hurried along breathless as we swallow our fresh air in gulps. If we are idle, we must be always exchanging one pleasure for another, and dare not leave ourselves time for the reflection that would infallibly turn to regret or remorse. As for women, the atmosphere of brisk society of some sort is absolutely necessary to brace them. They might as well recruit for the summer in the Dismal Swamp or the Pontine Marshes as go where there is no one to sneer at them for wearing their last year's dresses. So, if we can afford it, we go to foreign baths or to English watering-places; and a most unsatisfactory time we have of it for the most part.

What is the invariable foreign tour in the season, now that summer travel is the easily gratified ambition of the million? It is a perpetual scramble—a race for seats on steamers and in railway carriages, and for beds in inns. Given a certain distance to be covered in a certain time, and we are all started to the motto of "Répos ailleurs." We bolt our meal at early morning. We are hustled from the breakfast-room into the hotel omnibus. We fight over the weighing of our luggage, after losing our temper in the railed gangway that leads past the ticket wicket. We are locked up in a stifling waiting-room with swarms of flies, half a hundred of English and American competitors, and a sprinkling of fervent natives. We are emancipated at last. After being worked up to the utmost and heavily handicapped with bags and umbrellas, we enter for a literal heat along the hard hot flags of the platform. We are distanced of course by those who are in the best training and the most lightly weighted. The short-winded head of the household, in his tight-buttoned English frock-coat, comes groaning in a bad last, having waited dutifully to stimulate his better and heavier half to increased exertion. The family is scattered through the worst places of various carriages, and all they see of the country which they came ostensibly to admire is the samples of dust and decomposed limestone that come flying in through the close-drawn sunblinds. After being turned away superciliously from a couple of hotels, they find their miserable billet in the attic of an inn of the second class. The table-d'hôte has begun twenty minutes ago, and they descend to be served with the tepid soup, when the earlier guests are helping themselves to the wings and breasts of the chickens. Touring of this sort is but a modified form of enjoyment, even if one looks forward on the morrow to a nice long day among pictures and churches. Yet, such as it is, it is livelier work than that which follows when you are temporarily domesticated at one of the fashionable German baths. Our typical English tourists are of course eminently

English and respectable, and the meretricious attractions of these places, it must be confessed, address themselves primarily to miserable foreign sinners. They may be all very pleasant if you go in for play; you may count on an absorbing excitement so long as your rouleaux last, while you are tossed backwards and forwards in the ceaseless fluctuations of your luck. Among the woods, and the fountains, and the flower-beds, you are always pursuing the illusive fortune which you hope to clutch before the last of your Napoleons has taken flight. But our respectable English family eschews the tables with all their seductions and their viciously delusive gains. The presence of the sirens of the Parisian theatres, tricked out in their cool flowing garments of gold and gossamer, and the finest of purple and fine linen, is an absolute abomination to them. Turn which way they will, they must always be drawing in their petticoats to avoid the contact of sin or folly. They dare not show at a ball, for the free and easy foreign custom permits any pushing foreign roué to request the hand of any of the rosy daughters. If they venture to a concert, as likely as not the robes of some Mademoiselle Anonyma are overflowing from the next seat; and the shady walks in the beech woods very soon begin to pall upon them, and drives to the Elizabethbrunnen or Schloss Galgenstein become dullness itself. The men are little better off than the ladies. Even if they are sportsmen, they find that an occasional sluggish grayling but ill repays them for whipping the still German waters through a sweltering summer day; while, if they try their fortune in the forests rented by the Administration for the enjoyment of more munificent patrons than themselves, they learn that the game is a myth, or is preserved for the later battues of the autumn. We need say little of our English counterpart of the foreign bath. We suspect that the "twelve hours by the sea" which some of our enterprising railway companies advertise might be almost sufficient to satisfy the longings of any one. At any rate you escape the extortions of the marine lodging-housekeepers, and the miseries of their plain cookery. You accept as so many incidents of the expedition the brass bands and the hardy-gurdy men, the Christy Minstrels and the Punch and Judy shows. Your delicacy is not outraged by bathing under the gaze of the local beauty and fashion; you have not to perform a succession of pedestrian feats in the shape of diurnal strolls along the holding sands; nor need you stumble through perilous equestrian performances over the downs on horses that have broken down under the ceaseless hiring of the sunny season. If you really move yourself and your belongings to the sea for the summer, what with the dullness, and what with the positive suffering, it needs all the bracing influences of the briny air to send you home again as fresh as when you went there.

Suppose, on the other hand, you were to fly for once in the face of custom and prejudice and try London. We do not assume that you are "in society," otherwise of course you would be in London already. We do not hold out as an attraction the entrée to circles more or less exclusive, the privilege of eating indigestible dinners at crowded tables at abnormal hours, the scrambling for unwholesome suppers after getting up an unnatural appetite by a course of social gymnastics in stifling drawing-rooms. We propose that you should come to London simply for the same sort of distraction which you gladly welcome as an event at Slowcome-super-Mare; and we say that, looking at the matter dispassionately, London is the most charming centre of distractions in the world. We know that it is the fashion in Europe, and in Paris above all, to sneer at our grand agglomeration of brick and mortar. Frenchmen shudder unaffectedly at a city that has no cafés and no climate suitable to al fresco beer sipping, and that is sadly deficient in restaurants. Americans, who regard Paris as Paradise, used to shun London as a foretaste of Purgatory, but they are coming round rather to like it now, and admit that it has its good points. Frenchmen care nothing for country life either. They can understand nothing of the pleasures which we English people look for in our holiday time. It is just as well for them. The Boulevards of Paris are always agreeable, it is true; and it used to be a pleasant drive to the Bois de Boulogne before the trees were felled by the Committee of Defence, and when the gravel and the turf were watered by the Imperial water-carts. But, except the afternoon drive in the ring at a foot's pace, what object can anybody propose to himself in Paris to kill the summer day? A visit to the Jardin d'Acclimation, or a solitary scull at Asnières. At intervals of long weeks, a little racing at Long-champs or the distant Chantilly. Come to London, however, and you are positively embarrassed by the choice of amusements, if your tastes are at all universal. Racing is going on everywhere around you, within an easy railway distance. To say nothing of mere cockney carnivals like Hampton or the Alexandra Park, you have Ascot and Goodwood, with several days' sport at each, treading close on the heels of Epsom. No scratch meetings, like those got up once in a way at your pet German resort, where some miserable platers strain themselves on an unnatural course, doubled up in the folds of some rocky valley, but a competition of the best blood in the world, with more money depending on the events than ever changed hands of an evening at the tables. The worst of it is, that you may have a weakness for cricket as well as for horse-flesh, and the very day that the winner of the Derby is to meet the first favourite for the Leger, the Marylebone Club and Ground plays All-England at Leeds, while a friend has pressed you to run down to Eton for the sake of old times and see the Zingari match with the school. There are Fourths of June too, and speech days at Harrow, and international boat-races below Teddington, between picked crews from either hemisphere. You are fond of yachting, and the Royal Thames Yacht Club has commenced its season, and a shilling fare in a Gravesend boat carries you down to see the craft becalmed in the reaches; and wherever you go you are likely enough to encounter an acquaintance from your own town or county. Or if you care for none of these things, or if the ladies of the party prefer more feminine amusements, which of the Continental Kursals or casinos can vie with the Crystal Palace in the ever-changing variety of its programmes? And how many of them can match its grounds and its gardens in the rare charms of the wide prospect they command? One day there is a dog show, the next a grand concert with an harmonious clamour of countless voices and solos by the stars of both operas, and then again there are displays of cats, and fireworks, and poultry, and roses. You have horticultural and botanical fêtes at Kensington and the Regent's Park and Chiswick. You have dinners on Norwood and on Richmond Hills, with the prettiest domestic scenery in England stretching away below your dinner-tables; and you have the drives home afterwards through the shady gardens of the suburbs in the cool of the evening. Then, we own, the worst is to come, and you might easily sleep in fresher air than awaits you in London. But after all it is little worse than the atmosphere of such stifling valleys as Enns or Spa, and we cannot possibly have everything as we would like it in this world. Englishmen would grumble, of course, over their summer in London, yet we suspect that, if they were candid, they would confess that they found it more enjoyable than their last season's holiday on the Continent or by the sea.

VARIETY IN RELIGION.

WHATEVER may be thought of the justice of Mr. Disraeli's classification of Liberal and Conservative principles, there can be no doubt that he showed his usual discrimination in the choice of an opprobrious epithet, and that Cosmopolitanism is at present very much at a discount. Ever since the Paris Commune exploded in a shower of real or mythic petroleum, Cosmopolitanism has been going down. Communists, Comtists, Red Republicans, Internationalists, Deceased Wife's Sister people, and that oddly-mixed horde which is always attacking the Church of England, appear to be all in a bad way just now. The tide which at one time seemed to be bearing them forwards has turned, and the current of opinion is dead against them. The Dilkeites are under a cloud, and the Odgerites have been in bad odour ever since their leader had to seek refuge in a retirement which perhaps reminded him soothingly of the seclusion of the Ballot. Ecclesiastical or theological Cosmopolitanism has also gone to the dogs in an equally remarkable manner. The frenzied Nonconformity of the Manchester Conference has been ignominiously snuffed out in Parliament. The Burials Bill—which was, as it happens, the very first Bill brought into the House of Commons this Session—has suffered the fate of the early worm, instead of enjoying the privilege of the early bird. It soon got knocked out of time, and expired a few days ago without a kick. The Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, notwithstanding the notorious eagerness of the reckless couples who defray the heavy expenses of the agitation to hide their shame under retrospective legislation, is continually being postponed; and on Wednesday the Occasional Sermons Bill—an insidious project for stabbing the Church of England in the back when it was thought that nobody was looking—was decisively rejected by a large majority. The Burials Bill is a characteristic example of the unscrupulous spitefulness of political Dissent. Mr. Samuel Morley was surprised in a moment of candour into an acknowledgment of what was indeed obvious, that the Burials Bill involved a question of religious feeling, or at least of public decorum, on which Churchmen and Nonconformists were at one. He admitted that it was necessary to take some precautions against offensive addresses or outrageous performances in the parish churchyards, and he promised to draw up an amendment with that object. We are not aware that Mr. Morley has ever fulfilled this promise, and he has probably discovered that it was not agreeable to his political associates, who have other objects in view than the maintenance of public decency. We cannot imagine that there is anything in the Burial Service of the Church of England to which conscientious Nonconformists can object; but it is a reasonable compromise that it should not be read unless desired, and that if another service is preferred, it should be performed elsewhere than in the churchyard. There is no reason why the Church should not do all in its power to facilitate the burial of Dissenters, but it is not desirable that every little knot of fanatics or political agitators who choose to set up something they call a religion and to proclaim themselves a Church or sect, should be permitted to perform any ceremonies or deliver any harangues they please under the pretext of burying a friend. It is intolerable that the solemn and tender thoughts which are associated with the burial of the dead should be liable to be outraged in this manner. It cannot be doubted that it is not for their own sakes, but simply as a means of injuring the Church of England, that this singular Bill is supported by the Nonconformists. The opening up of the churchyards to all and sundry appears to be a natural and useful step towards getting the churches similarly thrown open.

It is not perhaps surprising that the enemies of the Church of England should assail it in this manner, but it is difficult to understand by what process of reasoning those who profess to be friends of the Church can bring themselves to join in the assault. At least it would be difficult to understand this if we had not the benefit of the highly instructive speeches of Mr. Cowper-Temple and Mr. Hughes on the Occasional Sermons Bill. We should be sorry to doubt the sincere attachment of either of these gentlemen to the Church of which they are members, but it is obvious that, if they were able to carry out their views, the Church would speedily become something very different from what it now is. The object of the Bill is, or we should rather say was, since the Bill is dead, to throw open the pulpits of the Church of England to all the world. Laymen and clergymen of every denomination were equally to be put in possession of the churches of the Establishment for the purpose of propagating any opinions they might choose to advocate. A nominal check on any abuse of this remarkable privilege was provided in the shape of a bishop's licence. It is obvious that if the practice of granting licences were to become common, a bishop would find it very difficult to refuse an application for one, except in an extreme case where the objections to the applicant were notorious and overwhelming. The bishop was to be empowered to grant a licence on application, but it was not stated how long the licence should run. As the person thus authorised to preach would be altogether beyond the discipline and control of the Church, he could uphold whatever doctrines he liked with perfect impunity, and it is doubtful whether, under the Bill as it stood, it would have been possible to revoke a licence when it had once been granted, no matter what use might be made of the privilege. Mr. Cowper-Temple justified this extraordinary measure on the ground that it was a good thing to have a little variety in religion. He thought it would be a great advantage if congregations could be occasionally treated to "different schools of thought and different styles of preaching." Most people will allow that tonjours perdrix gets to be tiresome at last, and that it is desirable to stimulate the appetite by a judicious change of dishes. Mr. Cowper-Temple appears to be of opinion that this great principle of gastronomy is equally applicable to religious teaching. He would no doubt admit that what he calls the "conventional teaching" of the Church of England is very well in its way, but he thinks it is quite possible to have not only enough, but too much of it, and that "everybody would like a little variety in that respect." If this system were thoroughly worked out, the monotony of Trinitarian doctrines might be relieved by occasional doses of Deism or Rationalism. A series of Low Church sermons would be appropriately followed by a course of Anglicanism; after which a little cold Positivism would supply a refreshing douche. Every school of thought would of course be taken in turn, and when a congregation began to find that it had had enough of thought, it would be glad of some "popular and stirring preaching" by way of relaxation. The effect of this kind of treatment would naturally be to keep the mind in a highly flexible and elastic condition, and to prevent it from contracting any narrow "conventional" prejudices for or against any particular religion. As Mr. Cowper-Temple says, it is desirable that religion should be as free as possible, and variety is wholesome. We presume that, under the new system, preachers would not be tied down to what the member for Bedfordshire calls "that glorious old book"—the Bible. The Koran or the Book of Mormon might be occasionally substituted for it, or perhaps selections from Goethe and Voltaire. If something very "stirring" were required, a band of Shakers might be secured "for this occasion only." It is possible that the result of this system might be to make the services of the Church of England more popular and attractive. It may be admitted that at present these services are not as exciting and amusing as they might be, and, as Mr. Cowper-Temple complains, it is always the same thing over again, creeds and all. If the "stirring" system were to be adopted, with a free range of churches and religions to choose from, and if incumbents would throw themselves zealously into the duties of theatrical managers, and endeavour to provide a constant succession of "great effects" and "startling novelties" for the entertainment of their congregations, a revival of an unexpected kind might perhaps be witnessed in the Church.

Of course, if it is to be understood that people go to church just as they go to the play and the opera, merely to pass a pleasant hour or two, a good deal might be said in favour of Mr. Cowper-Temple's ingenious scheme for introducing variety and "stirring" effects into the Divine service. If, on the other hand, the services of the Church have anything to do with the inculcation of religious truth, it is obviously necessary that some precautions should be taken to prevent congregations from being outraged or imposed upon. Mr. Cowper-Temple thought it was a great merit of his Bill that it did not touch any doctrine whatever; but it is clear that the doctrines of the Church would cease to be distinctive and authoritative if its pulpits were to be thrown open for the indiscriminate and promiscuous preaching of every kind of religion or philosophy. He also objected to an "artificial barrier" being raised between clergymen of the Church of England and clergymen of other denominations. It has been said to be possible to conceive of a Lord Mayor without his robes and gold chain; and Mr. Cowper-Temple appears to be able to conceive of a Church which has no particular doctrines of any kind attaching to it. The ordinary notion of the Church of England is, that it is an association based on certain definite religious doctrines. If Nonconformists hold these doctrines, the Church is open to them; if they do not, they have no right to complain that they are not permitted to go into the pulpits of the Church in order to contradict and denounce its teaching. Mr. Hughes holds that Babylon and Jerusalem are very like each other, especially Jerusalem; and that there is no difference worth mentioning between the doctrines of the Church of England and the doctrines of the great body of Protestant Dissenters. If that is the case, it is an excellent reason why the Dissenters should cease to dissent. We cannot help thinking that in all these discussions the question is argued too much on the assumption that the compact between the Church and State is all on one side, and that the Church is bound to take what it can get and be thankful. Those who think thus must surely be blind to the signs of the times. If such attempts at legislation as Mr. Cowper-Temple's fantastic Bill were to be made in earnest, it would become a serious question how much of this kind of thing the Church would endure. Mr. Cowper-Temple suggested that, if congregations did not care for the preaching of the strange crew whom he wished to let loose upon them, they could stay away, and there were plenty of other churches where they could go to. But perhaps he would be rather startled if the congregations were to take him at his word. It can hardly be doubted that the effects of such legislation would be to tease and worry both clergy and laity out of the Church, so that the mere shell of it would be left.

WHO PAYS FOR IT?

PUBLIC opinion with regard to Trades Unions and strikes has gone through some curious fluctuations during the last few years. A violent prejudice against them was followed by an equally unreasonable and absurd reaction in their favour; and it is possible that we are now about to witness another rebound of popular sentiment. It is not very long since the Unions were regarded as everything that was evil. The whole fabric of society was supposed to be shaken to its foundations whenever a little knot of labouring men announced that they would not continue to work for their employers except on their own terms. The delegates and other officials who had the management of strikes were represented as profligate adventurers, who stirred up mischief solely for their own profit; and arson and assassination were supposed to be the familiar weapons of their daily work. The feeling against the Unions reached its climax after the horrible revelations at Sheffield in 1867; but it was plausibly observed that all Unions were not as the saw-grinders, and it was at least possible to hope that even the saw-grinders were exceptionally unfortunate in having for a time fallen into the hands of such a villain as Broadhead. The Lancashire brick-makers were perhaps only a little way behind the Sheffield grinders in the ferocity of their warfare against all who transgressed the arbitrary laws of their association; but it was shown by the inquiries of a Royal Commission that the Unions were managed as a rule by respectable men, who were by no means highly paid for very onerous and laborious duties; and that, with the exception of picketing, there was nothing of a positively criminal nature in the ordinary course of their operations. It was obvious that some injustice had been done to the Unions, and in the revulsion of feeling which ensued one prejudice was exchanged for another. Now that it was agreed that working-men were entitled to combine, it was rashly assumed that the objects for which they combined were always wise and just; and that in any dispute between them and their employers, they were invariably in the right and the masters in the wrong. Sentimental people who wished to see everybody happy and comfortable were shocked that the masters should be so hard-hearted as to grudge the poor working-man an addition of a few shillings a week to his wages, and, above all, a little more leisure for mental improvement and the cultivation of domestic virtues. It was in this general mood that the engineers' strike at Newcastle last year was generally criticized. But London has now a strike of its own; and its confidence in the native sagacity and moral perfection of the working-men appears to be somewhat shaken. It is evident from the tone of the press and of general conversation, that those amiable persons who were so delighted with the strike of the Newcastle engineers are not disposed to hail the strike of the London builders with the same cheerful enthusiasm. It is true that the demands of the carpenters and masons and the demands of the engineers come to pretty much the same thing; nine hours a day is, we are told, the essential principle of the movement in London as in the North. But then for the Londoners there is this rather important distinction that they are very much interested in houses, but not in steam-engines, and that the one strike took place at a distance, and, as far as they were aware at the moment, did not touch them at all, while the other strike is going on under their eyes and touches them very closely. It is wonderful how good-natured and philanthropic people can be when good-nature and philanthropy cost them nothing. Charity has been described in a familiar apothem as a kindly feeling which prompts A. to urge B. to give C. something. Last year many persons thought that the capitalists of the North ought not to hesitate to surrender a share of their profits to oblige the operatives; but the demands of the London carpenters and masons have not met with similar encouragement. It is impossible not to see that, if these demands were conceded, there would be a general rise in rents, which would in time raise prices; and the Friends of Humanity resent a direct levy on their own purses. Very few of us are in the habit of buying steam-engines for private use, but sooner or later of course we shall all feel the effect of the increased cost of machinery. Already the bill has been sent in for the strikes in the coal and iron trades. It appears from the letter of one of the Times Correspondents in the midland mining district, that the prices of spades, locks, files, nails, and other hardware goods have gone up fifty per cent. in nine months, and that they are still rising.

It may in itself be a very good thing that working-men should receive higher wages and do less work than formerly; but there is no getting rid of the fact that increased wages and diminished labour mean the abstraction of so much money from somebody's pocket. Up to a certain point prices can usually be raised without seriously diminishing consumption; and when that point has been reached, there is again a margin of employers' profit of which by higgling the operatives can obtain a larger or smaller share. If prices are forced up too high, or if employers' profits are cut down too low, the operatives themselves will suffer for it, inasmuch as capitalists and consumers will strike against their demands. The capitalists will transfer their money to some more remunerative business, and consumers will try to curtail their wants, or to satisfy them with some cheaper commodity. It is probable that, within the limits we have mentioned, there is still plenty of room for an improvement in the circumstances of the operatives, provided it be effected gradually and in moderate instalments. It can hardly be doubted, however, that in the present instance the carpenters and masons are asking too much at once; and that the magnitude and suddenness of their demands would, if they were granted, produce a disturbance of trade which in the long run would recoil upon themselves. A good deal of silly cant is sometimes talked about the working-men's duty to society in such a case. It seems to us that, if the industrial greatness of England can only be maintained by a sacrifice of industrial profits, the working-man may reasonably suggest that the capitalist should begin by setting the example. He has a perfect right to insist upon getting the highest wages within his reach; and the only question he need trouble himself with is whether he really can get them and keep them. Of course, if trade suffers, he will suffer too; and he will do well to bear that in mind. But otherwise he can hardly be blamed if he leaves society to shift for itself, and confines his attention to his own private interests. We imagine that in doing so he will have a large proportion of the human race to keep him in countenance. Admitting, however, to the fullest extent the right of working-men to combine, it does not follow that the objects for which they combine are necessarily sound and wholesome; and it is unfortunate that their friends should be so ready to encourage them in economic fallacies. The whole system of the Trade Unions is founded on the theory that wages can be raised by producing an artificial scarcity of labour. This is the object of the rules against the employment of machinery, piece-work, overtime, &c.; and it is also the object of the Nine Hours' Movement. The bricklayers join with the brick-makers in opposing machine-made bricks. The masons set their face against quarry-worked stone. A bricklayer is not allowed to set more than a specified number of bricks in a given time; bricks must not be wheeled in a barrow, and only eight or ten may be carried at a time; labourers are not to go up one ladder and come down another—that would save time, and the object is to waste it. These are a few of the rules taken at random. They vary in different districts and in different trades, but the spirit of them is always the same. It is assumed that whether the work is done quickly or slowly, cheaply or dearly, the amount of employment will always be the same, and that it is necessary to spread it thin to make it go fur. It does not seem to occur to the Unionists that prices have any effect whatever on the development of trade. If they had been generally successful in their opposition to machinery, the effect would have been to restrict the area of employment; and there can be no doubt that the various devices in restraint of trade which are resorted to for the purpose of providing work for a larger number of hands have just the opposite result from that intended.

It is important that it should be understood that the strike in the building trades, like the strike of the Newcastle engineers last year, is only the beginning of the battle. It has been repeatedly asserted that the engineers completely defeated their masters. But, in point of fact, the men surrendered their chief point. They obtained an increase of wages, but the limitation of hours is only nominal. A day is held to mean nine hours, and after that the men receive a higher rate of pay for the rest of the day's work. The masters gave way only when the men pledged themselves to work so many hours each day as might be necessary. The real object of the nine hours' movement is to get a hard and fast day of that length, and to put down overtime. An increase of wages is very satisfactory to the men who have found employment, and especially to strong, energetic, industrious workmen, who have no objection to increase their earnings by overtime; but the unemployed clamour for a share. The Unions imagine that, by artificially diminishing the supply of labour, they can not only enhance its value, but secure employment for a larger number of workmen. It is assumed that when a man has passed his apprenticeship—say as a carpenter—and has joined a Union, paying his dues regularly, and observing the rules of the society, he is entitled to have work, or at least wages, found for him, as a carpenter, for the rest of his life; and it is the business of the Union to see to that. This is of course only the principle of national workshops in a modified form. It is agreed that in a civilized country a man who is willing to work should not be exposed to absolute starvation; but it does not mean to follow that because a particular trade is overstocked with labour, the community should consent to employ two men to do one man's work. The natural conclusion would seem to be, that if there are too many carpenters, some of them should turn their hands to something else. It may be admitted that a man's labour ought not to be habitually prolonged to a point at which it involves either physical or mental exhaustion; but it is not pretended that ten hours' work is injurious to health, and the notion that the men would do ten hours' work in nine is contradicted by the frank avowal of the object for which a reduction of hours is sought. The heads of the public works in the United States do not speak favourably of the operation of the Eight Hours Law in the reports just laid before Congress. It is stated that the men have not done as much work in eight as in ten hours, and that it is doubtful whether the reduction of hours has been beneficial to them. Some of the carpenters have turned their time to good account in study; the masons and stone-cutters have devoted it to animal repose, and the labourers to "carousing and other mischief." It does not follow that when the men have got accustomed to leisure, and have learned to appreciate it, they will not make a proper use of it; and in any case they have the same right as other classes to spend their time as they choose. The immediate question is not whether the working-men are likely to occupy their spare moments in an edifying manner, but whether they can compel the masters to reduce their hours. On the whole, it is probable that the shortening of the day's labour would in the long run have an elevating effect on the working classes; but the grounds on which they now demand this concession are fallacious, and the moment is hardly propitious. English industry in all its branches is every day exposed more directly and sharply to foreign competition; and the general adoption of the nine hours' movement in this country, in its literal and stringent sense, would place our manufacturers at an obvious disadvantage as compared with those on the Continent, where the ordinary hours of labour range from twelve to sixteen. It is true that an Englishman will on the average do at least half as much again within a given time as a German or a Frenchman; but, on the other hand, the English workman costs twice as much in most and drink as his Continental brother, and he will be apt to find himself seriously handicapped in the industrial race, if, in addition to his expensive habits, he makes a serious reduction in his hours of labour. We can hardly be surprised that the proposal to settle the differences in the building trade by arbitration has failed. As we have before observed, arbitration can only be successful when certain fixed principles have been laid down as to the relation between masters' profits and workmen's earnings, and other questions of a similar kind. When the nature of the present dispute is considered, it will be seen that the operatives have acted in an honest and straightforward manner in rejecting the silly or insincere suggestion of the Trades' Council of working-men, of which Mr. Ocker is the presiding genius, that the rate of wages should be determined by arbitration, on the basis of nine hours for a day's work. The state of the case is simply this. There are at present more carpenters in London than there is work for. Those who are out of employment insist that the Union should procure for them a share of the work which is in the hands of their more fortunate comrades. The latter say they have no objection if their wages are not reduced, and they will like it all the better if their wages are increased. They have no objection to do less work in order to oblige their fellows, but then the masters or the public must pay for the loss of time. The whole question is out of whose pocket this loss shall be paid for; and as the men are determined not to pay for it themselves, it would be a mockery to submit it to arbitration.

THE POPE'S LAST MANIFESTO.

THE full text of the Pope's letter to Cardinal Antonelli, dated on June 16, the twenty-sixth anniversary of his election, has now appeared in the Osservatore Romano; and it shows at least that advancing years have in no wise curtailed either the pungency or the fecundity of his verbiage. The special occasion alleged for breaking silence is the profound grief inspired by the last resolve of the usurping Government to consummate its robbery of the Holy See by the suppression of the religious orders "in this our city," which is nothing short of a fresh assault on the liberty and independence of the supreme Pastor of the faithful, who has ever found in those communities his most powerful instruments for ruling the universal Church. For it is notorious to all the world that, as Rome is the centre of Christendom, so the religious houses and novitiates there established are the centre of religious life and energy for the whole Church. Thither come together pious spirits from all nations to renew their zeal, and there, under the shadow of the Apostolic See, the concerns of the religious orders throughout the world are arranged, and their superiors and office-bearers chosen. To plunder and suppress the mother-houses in Rome is therefore to plunder and suppress the orders they represent; it is not only a violation of individual rights, but of the international rights of all Catholic Christendom. And it is further a grave injury to the Holy See, to which the members of these communities supply information from the most remote quarters, and from which they learn how to confute false doctrine everywhere. And thus the true object of this nefarious scheme reveals itself clearly enough. Like the original seizure of the patrimony of St. Peter, it is not, as was hypocritically pretended, simply a blow aimed at the temporal power, but a direct assault on the supreme apostolical office of the Papacy. No illusion on this point is any longer possible. A general crusade is being waged against religion, morality, and justice, as is exemplified in the suppression of charitable and educational institutions, the enforced conscription of youths training for the cloister or the altar, the unrestrained freedom of the pulpit and the press, the general licentiousness of manners, and the profanation of sacred persons and sacred images. Gladly, indeed, if he were only to consult his own feelings, would the Holy Father spare himself so bitter a chalice by retiring to a foreign land, where he need no longer witness abominations which he now daily weeps over, but is powerless to remedy. But the high responsibilities of his office constrain him to remain, and thus proclaim to the world the gravity of the crisis which has robbed him of his liberty and independence. It has been said, indeed, that he is personally free to come and go as he will; but that is not enough. He is not really free while his authority is subject to the caprice of the secular power, and at the mercy of political passion and partisanship. There can be no harmony between the rival powers of Church and State under such a system, and history is full of their conflicts whenever the Pope has even for a moment been subjected to the control of any alien authority. The only real guarantee for the harmony of the various and unequal States into which the world is divided lies in their common submission to the impartial fiat of the common father of them all, who stands above and independent of all. There is another matter, which lies as near the heart of the Holy Father as the integrity of the religious orders in Rome, and that is the absolute independence, both in fact and appearance, of the Sacred Congregations "which have to answer the questions of the whole Catholic world," and of the Sacred Conclave which elects the successors of St. Peter. It is of enormous importance that their freedom should be above the lightest breath of suspicion. The freedom of the Pope, who is their supreme judge in faith and morals, is a necessary condition of the freedom of all Catholics; and because he is not free, the faithful are now penetrated with anguish, and States are distressed by religious tumults. His Holiness proceeds to observe on the absurdity of talking at such a time of a reconciliation between the Papacy and the usurping Government. To dream of such a thing would be voluntarily to surrender the rights of the Holy See, to disturb the conscience of the faithful, to stop the preaching of truth, and, in a word, deliberately to sacrifice to the caprices of a Government the lofty mission which the Roman Pontificate has received direct from God. To such a humiliation Pius IX. will never bow; rather will he pour out his blood than betray the interests of his supreme apostolate. On the contrary, he will continue to set an example to the pastors of the Church who are fighting so hard a battle for the eternal principles of morality and justice.

In conclusion, the Pope has a word to say about "the so-called guarantees which the usurping Government has affected to offer to the head of the Church, for the obvious purpose of hoodwinking simple souls." Even the personal immunity of the Holy Father is a mere sham, for the Government lacks the power, if it has the will, to protect him from daily insult. And it is useless to leave open the doors of his palace when he cannot quit it without being publicly insulted and witnessing the most horrible spectacles of impiety, immorality, and violence; when the dignitaries and ministers of the Church are constantly exposed to outrage in the streets, and the solemn ceremonies of religion cannot be celebrated because they would be profaned. Still more illusory is the proclamation of his freedom in the discharge of his pastoral ministry, when the law interferes even with the administration of the sacraments, when the bishops he appoints are not acknowledged, and by an unprecedented injustice are deprived of their revenues, and even kept out of their palaces. They would be left, indeed, in utter destitution but for the pity of the faithful, which, as yet, has enabled the Pope to share his misde with them. The Cardinal Secretary is therefore directed to make known this lamentable state of things to the Governments accredited to the Holy See, and to protest solemnly in the Pope's name against the assaults, accomplished and threatened, on his Holiness and the whole of Catholic Christendom. It is the true interest, not only of Catholic but of non-Catholic States, to live at peace with the great Catholic family, and to maintain the real independence of its head, and they should remember that in maintaining the rights of the Roman Pontificate they are in fact defending their own. "They should remember that the Papal Throne, far from impeding the peace and welfare of Europe, or the greatness and independence of Italy, was always a bond of union between peoples and princes, and a common centre of harmony; for Italy especially it was the source of her true greatness, the safeguard of her independence, and the constant bulwark of her freedom."

Such is a condensed, but accurate, report of the lengthy document which, as being addressed, not to the Sacred College or the faithful generally, but specifically to the European Governments, both Catholic and Protestant, must be presumed to contain the matured statement of the Roman estimate of the situation, in the form considered best adapted to impress the public mind. Perhaps the first thought likely to occur to any one, with the last words about the relations of the Papacy to Italy fresh in his ears, would be that the Holy Father is somewhat sweeping, not to say indiscriminate, in his phraseology

—facta, infecta refert. A great many assertions of fact, particularly in the earlier part of the letter, will hardly be denied by any one familiar with Catholic affairs, though opinions may differ considerably as to the practical inferences to be deduced. And in one sense, no doubt, the Papacy may be said to have contributed much towards the greatness of Italy; it could hardly have been otherwise, at a time when the Papacy itself was the most effective and most conspicuous power in Europe. But it is a little startling to be assured, even if we confined ourselves to an historical retrospect, that it has always been the source and support of her liberty and independence; and the statement becomes still more perplexing to the uninitiated when it is taken to include—as the writer evidently intends it to include—the recent relations of Italy to the temporal power. On that side of the question we took occasion to say something last week, and we need not recur to it now. Nor do we care to enter here on a minute discussion of the precise details of alleged insult and outrage to Papal functionaries in the streets of Rome. The Tablet sees a signal confirmation of the charge in the recent acquittal by the Roman tribunals of a National Guard accused of murdering one of the Pontifical gendarmes, while other journals represent the Papal party as the sole aggressors in the fray. To such a dispute a looker-on may be content to say transeat—neither law courts nor newspapers claim to be infallible. There is little new, however, in this part of the Papal indictment; it is rather to the bitter jeremiad over the suppression of religious orders and the anticipated interference with the freedom of the Conclave, that we turn for the explanation of this elaborate exposition of the present mind of the Curia. As to the latter point, we have already spoken of the right of veto, which clearly cannot be claimed on historical grounds by the Governments either of Germany or Italy. A writer in the Allgemeine Zeitung has lately argued that they nevertheless must and will insist on having a voice in the next election, in order to prevent the continuance of a state of things which places the 150,000,000 of the Roman Catholic Communion under the rule of an oligarchy of some thirty or forty Italian Cardinals, all pledged to the infallibilist dogma and to internecine war with Italy. He adds that there is no foreign Cardinal residing at Rome, except one German, who would have a right to take part in the Conclave. And of course, if the report may be relied on that Pius IX. has prepared a Brief for the next election the proscribed interval of nine days before the Conclave assembles, and the preliminary ceremonies, that would practically leave the Italian electors complete masters of the situation. But it would hardly be safe to assume the truth of the report, though it is far from improbable, for Pius IX. is not a man to stick at trifles when it is a question between following precedent and carrying out his own cherished policy. And one or two precedents might be cited in favour even of so extreme an exercise of power, though the latest is just five centuries old; Pius VI. did indeed frame the rough draft of such an instrument in 1797, but it never got beyond that initial stage. It may further be questioned whether the Brief, if formally issued by the present Pope, would be acted on after his death by the Cardinals; and whether, if it were, the Catholic Governments would recognize the validity of their proceedings. Any surmises on such points must as yet be purely conjectural.

But when the Pope complains of the suppression of the mother-houses of religious orders in Rome, and of the various "Congregations" of Cardinals through which the administration of the Church is practically carried on, there can be no doubt that the grievance, from an Ultramontane point of view, is a very tangible and real one. In this part of his letter he has certainly not at all overstated the facts, though the argument might easily be turned the other way. The Act for the expulsion of the Jesuits which has just passed the German Parliament includes in its scope all kindred orders, the detailed application of the rule being left to the Executive. We cannot say what may have been the precise intention of the Imperial Chancellor in framing the decree, but the real distinction of the Jesuit and other modern orders from those anterior to the Council of Trent consists in their rigid hierarchical organization, under a supreme ruler resident in Rome, which is admirably adapted for purposes of administrative despotism. It is perfectly true that the Curia has always found in them its most effective instruments for manipulating the consciences and intellect of the faithful throughout the world. Elizabeth used to boast that she "tuned the pulpits" of the Established Church, and the Popes might boast with greater reason that, through the instrumentality of these great orders—Jesuits, Redemptorists, and the like—they have for centuries been able to tune both the pulpits and the confessionals of Roman Catholic Christendom. The formal work of Church government in matters of doctrine, discipline, and ritual is carried on through the medium of the various Roman Congregations set apart for the purpose, which, as the Papal circular expresses it, "have to answer the questions of the whole Catholic world," and to answer them, of course, under the direct inspiration of the Holy See, and in the most approved Roman sense. Any interference with the action of these Congregations would undoubtedly and very seriously hamper the working of the spiritual bureaucracy of the Curia. But it may be questioned whether to dissolve the intimate connexion hitherto subsisting between "the white Pope" and "the black Pope," as the Italians call them—between the Holy Father himself and the General of the Jesuits and other Generals of orders residing in Rome—would not be a still more fatal blow to the moral power of the Papacy. The Jesuits especially, who were destined from the first to be the standing army of Rome, have often been described as "the Catholic Church gone into commission," and it is mainly through their influence, direct or indirect, that the Romanizing reaction has been so successfully accomplished in the post-Tridentine Church. And if the final result, summed up in the Vatican dogmas, is to be a permanent triumph, we can hardly be wrong in surmising that it must be achieved by the same instrumentality. Prophecies are always hazardous, but when the Pope perceives in the threatened suppression or reduction of the great religious communities which have their centre at Rome, and which ramify throughout the Catholic world, a grave menace to his supreme and infallible claims, those who have least confidence in his supernatural wisdom need not hesitate for once to agree with him.

LADY LECTURERS.

AMONG the many odd results which have sprung from what has been called the Modern Revolt, we may count the sudden outburst of lady lecturers as one of the oddest. Scarcely a week passes without our hearing of some strong-minded sister taking the chair at an indignation meeting, or appealing from a platform to a mixed audience against the vileness of men and the wrongs of women generally; while a few among them do not scruple to add indecency to folly, and to dabble in shamelessness to give flavour to their nonsense. Sometimes, by way of varying the menu, they go in for literature and æsthetics, and air their feminine conceptions of what poets and great men meant, as complacently as if they were saying something which the world really wanted to hear, and was the better for hearing; sometimes they give a quasi-dramatic reading, with more or less success as their education in elocution has been attended to or not; and sometimes they appear as religious teachers, and preach dogmatic theology with a considerable effusion of hysterical sentiment. Anyhow, they contrive to excite a good deal of attention in these latter times, and to make their voices, like the turtle-dove's, pretty well heard in the land.

With our views of what is called the woman's question, we cannot say that we regard the race of lady lecturers as a divinely appointed order. Still, aside for a moment the lingering prejudices which we still entertain about the reserve and modesty once held essential to the sex, we cannot concede that what most of these lecturers say deserves special attention from the world at large, or that their manner of saying it makes up, by the consummate perfection of its art, for the inherent weakness of their matter. Their arguments are generally superficial, and their line of reasoning narrow; their partisanship is one-sided; they are incapable of doing an opponent anything like justice. They deal largely with assumptions, and spin out logical conclusions from utterly unproved premises; committing the fault common with the dialectically untrained of stating sentiments as facts, and challenging categorical disproof of assertions which are essentially figments of their own brains, and never existed out of them. They tilt at wrongs that are about as real as the giants slain by Jack the valiant Cornishman; and when you press them for their authority, they say, grandly, Everybody knows; or, A gentleman of high respectability told me so. When they stand up and boldly maintain a foolish theory against all that statistics, Commissioners' Reports, and the like can bring against it, when they make sweeping assertions which your knowledge of human nature and the working of society tells you are utterly false, what can you say? Arguments, figures, indisputable proofs—whatever you like to bring as the besoms wherewith to sweep away the cobwebs of lady lecturers—are wholly inoperative, and your words fall as stones in the water, and with no more abiding result. If you think that your counter-argument will induce the lady lecturer to reconsider her telling points, you are mistaken. We are not too hard in saying that, as a rule, she lectures for partisanship, not for truth; she studies effect, not accuracy—at least when she is not primarily influenced by the prosaic aspect of the money question. There is almost always the desire of display dominating every other; and if we had to name the generic quality of the tribe, it would be vanity. Not that we object to a reasonable amount of vanity in a woman. It prevents her from sinking into a mere domestic drudge, which is one of the dangers she has to avoid; it keeps her up to the mark of pleasing by her wish for admiration. In a broad sense and with noble aims, we call it ambition among men, and we find it a serviceable quality; but the ambition of man is not the same thing as the personal vanity of a woman; and that desire for professional distinction and for doing the best work of its kind which characterizes the one sex is not the thirst for public display and notoriety which is the modern passion of the other.

The very dress and appearance of the lady lecturer nine times out of ten mark her purpose. One glides on to the platform as a picturesque pre-Raphaelite "study"; her drapery hanging in long straight folds over her feet, her golden hair carded into a fairy aureole about her head, her whole costume a capital model for an artist. She knows that her get-up is effective, and that every woman in the audience will envy her, while many will try to copy her; and she knows too that the men will admire her, and for the sake of her beauty be leniently disposed, or something more, to her logic. But if she were to tell you the absolute truth, she would confess that she regards lecturing as the best advertisement for her beauty, and that, if she were snub-nosed and a fright, she would be far less earnest about woman's rights and wrongs than she is at present. Only she does not tell the truth, and she acts out her pretence to the last. Another wears her hair cut short and parted on the side like a man; like a man too she comes squarely to the front; her brief skirts, lapelled vest, uncompromising shirt-front and severe shirt-collar, are her protest against feminine vanities or the assistance to be derived from personal enchantment. She is of the kind which emulates men while scorning them; and, like the famous minister who set hymns and psalms and spiritual songs to dance music, on the plea that he did not see why the devil should have all the best tunes, she adopts in her own habits and person the characteristics of the sex she affects to despise and condemn. A third is a mere fashionable lady, beflowered and bejewelled to the last extreme of the mode. She puts her trust in "style," and thinks herself safe from rude critical handling if she shows herself got up as a grande dame should be. A fourth is feminine, refined, spiritual, with floating locks streaming back from her brow, and a certain kind of Fra Angelico look about her suggestive of saints and seraphs, and really very pretty; while a fifth does not hesitate to present herself a dowdy, indifferent to her personality as a woman, and only wishful for the plaudits which follow on successful intellectual endeavour. Her ambition is not to be a well-bred lady, or a beautiful picture, or even a semi-man, but a talking creature of no sex at all, a lecturer pure and simple. But whatever the line they take, what they are and how they look is that which chiefly interests them; and the kind of personality they display is not second in importance to the character of the doctrine they advocate.

In this personal self-consciousness lies the secret of woman's weakness as a lecturer, and the main difference between her and a man. No one thinks twice of what the lecturing man is like; how he wears his hair, and whether his shirt-fronts are plain or worked; we think only of what he says, and, as a matter of art, how he says it. But more than half the effect produced by women is due to their manner and appearance, their special physical type, and, above all, their taste in millinery. And their wilfully ignoring this fact is perhaps the most wonderful bit of humbug among the many of which they are habitually guilty. They take care not to recognize the admiration which they excite, as part of the play; yet they know that, if they are pretty, men go to look vastly more than to listen, that it is the woman, not the lecturer, who attracts the crowds of applauding black coats. Even the one who is most keenly alive to her own beauty, and sets it off to greatest advantage, acts her little drama of unconsciousness with the rest; in which perhaps she is wise, if not quite sincere, securing for herself a retreat if need be. Yet if women could get rid of this self-consciousness, and of the affectation resulting from it, and if they would make it the first condition of lecturing to have something to say, there is no reason why they should not speak to an audience as well as write to one. But let them keep to their own subjects. Of these, dramatic effects and common-sense teaching to their own sex are the most promising. Many women are born actresses; and to give them a platform when the stage has been denied to them, and a reading as a substitute for a part, is to give them work exactly congenial to them, and a means of making money that carries no dishonour with it, though it may include no profit to the world at large. All that is wanted from them is to learn how to manage their voice, and to avoid vulgarisms of pronunciation; nature has done the rest; and there is no reason why, in the existing need of lucrative employment for portionless unmarried women, those who have dramatic power, and who are not on the stage, should not utilize their gifts in readings if they can get people to go and hear them. Again, educated women can teach their uneducated sisters many things which they ought to know; and a lecture may be better than a book, because more likely to reach the class to be instructed. But lessons on the best methods of managing children, on the higher arts of house-keeping, on cooking, hygienic observances, cleanliness, comfort, economy, and the like, though of supreme importance and usefulness, are just the things which lady lecturers despise; they prefer to talk political rubbish of the weakest description, which converts no one, rather than to give solid and enduring instruction, which would benefit many. And the simple reason why is, that the one is an occasion for display and the gratification of vanity; the other is unostentatious work, and has no incitement beyond its object. The truth is that, revolt against it as much as ambitious women may, all the best work done by women is unostentatious. We do not pretend to explain why this should be so; but the fact is plain enough. Every now and then some notable woman has come before the world and made her public mark—some Hypatia with her learned following, or, may be, only some half-crazed Joanna Southcott with her equally crazed supporters; but, as a rule, the more beneficent the action of women the more modest and secluded is its method, the more frothy and mischievous the more public and blatant. No one wishes to see the powers of women nullified or their lives rendered meagre and miserable for the sake of a prejudice; but neither do we care to see wasted on barren objects impulses and endeavours which have within them such large potentialities of good, if rightly applied, and for which there are so many channels, if only women would care to seek them. If the passion for lecturing possesses them, in Heaven's name let them lecture; but let them lecture to women on feminine subjects, teaching the ignorant what it is well for them to know, and doing their work with that noble simplicity which of itself excludes both vanity and self-consciousness, and which seeks its reward in the good effected, not in the applause gained or in the admiration offered.

THE FIJI ISLANDS.

CONSIDERING that the annexation of the Fiji Islands by this country is pretty certain to take place some day, it may be interesting to observe what are the reasons which Mr. Gladstone has to urge against that step. He says in the first place that "we are groaning over the mass of work left undone"; and whether "we" means Parliament, Government, or the country, the statement is, or ought to be, entirely true. We are, he says, overwhelmed with, and totally unable to overtake, our own immediate responsibilities, and yet it is proposed that these responsibilities should be increased. It may be conceded to Mr. Gladstone that domestic legislation is greatly in arrear, and whether by the misfortune or the fault of himself and his colleagues need not at this moment be particularly inquired. But if the Government determined to annex Fiji, the necessary arrangements need not occupy any considerable time. The country could easily find a competent governor for a new colony, and supply him with an adequate force. The principles upon which he should govern would be manifest to himself, or, if they were not, the staff of the Colonial Office would be adequate to the composition of a despatch elucidating them. Mr. Gladstone says in substance that there are some things which the country, at least under his guidance, cannot do, and therefore it ought not to attempt other things which it clearly can do. But further, these islands already have a Government "which is endeavouring to organize itself in a sense favourable to civilization." This statement may be true, but nevertheless the endeavours after civilization may be only slowly and partially successful. His Majesty King Cacobau has doubtless instructed his Prime Minister, Mr. Weld, to offer to Earl Granville his co-operation with Her Britannic Majesty in regulating the labour traffic, and we may infer from this fact that pens, ink, and paper, and skill to use them are at the disposal of the Government which is endeavouring to organize itself in a sense favourable to civilization. But many actual, and more possible, inhabitants of Fiji think that the progress of civilization, which implies prosperity, would be more rapid if King Cacobau were neither a real King nor a puppet in the hands of some Englishman or American who has secured the manipulation of him. In other words, they would desire that he should make room for a representative of the Queen of England. There can be no doubt that if the European community in Fiji is properly fostered by this country it will grow into a colony having the same kind and perhaps an equal degree of value to England that Australia and New Zealand have. Many persons think that this value is great, and Mr. Gladstone is possibly among the number, although he does not declare his opinion as distinctly as could be desired. Of course there will be an annual bill, and Mr. Gladstone reminds the country of what it will not easily forget, that the bills for New Zealand were very heavy for many years. But if he means to suggest that the expense of governing Fiji is a sufficient reason for leaving it to govern itself, there are very few politicians even of his own party who would agree with him. The limits of the British Empire ought only to be extended with caution, and perhaps reluctance, but this generation is hardly prepared to hear that they must henceforward remain fixed until they begin to recede. Even the present Government has felt obliged to initiate in South Africa a process of enlargement which is almost certain to be continuous. When Mr. M'Arthur agrees with Mr. Disraeli, their unanimity deserves attention, and the Conservative leader uttered a widely popular sentiment when he declared that it is the duty of an English Minister "to respond to those distant sympathies which may become the sources of incalculable strength and happiness to this land." If Mr. Gladstone does not remain in office long enough to annex Fiji, his successor may be tempted to take a step which will be likely to benefit the country at the same time that it is advantageous to himself.

The only tangible reason alleged by Ministers against Mr. M'Arthur's motion was that the Fijians themselves had not manifested a desire for annexation. But if we are to understand that this desire, when expressed, will be gratified, we may safely leave the question without further discussion to settle itself. Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen objects to the statement that Fiji is contiguous to New Zealand and Australia, from which countries it is, as he says, distant respectively 1,150 and 1,700 miles. But those who make this statement have an intelligible meaning, although they may not choose strictly accurate language to express it. The advantage of an advanced post in the Pacific is too evident to escape even the official mind, and it is also clear that unless a strong Government in Fiji co-operates with the exertions of our cruisers, no effectual control can be kept upon the "enterprise" of dealers in the labour market. To put this matter plainly, we must annex Fiji if we really desire to control the Polynesian slave trade. It is better to take those islands under our government than to "protect" and perpetually interfere with a Government which we profess to consider independent. The question of expense cannot, however, be left out of view. As Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen puts it, "when speaking of philanthropy and the growth of cotton, the British taxpayer must not be entirely ignored." But the British taxpayer, voluntarily or otherwise, has already invested heavily in the article called philanthropy, and he cannot now draw back from his bargain. Lord Belmore, as Governor of New South Wales, lately wrote a despatch in which he pressed on the Home Government the necessity for the constant presence of one or two ships of war in the South Sea Islands, "cost what it may." It is not alone "philanthropy" in a general sense that is concerned. The character of this country must suffer by the perpetration of outrages by its own subjects. The soil and climate of Fiji are suitable to the growth of cotton, for which Europe affords a profitable market. The only thing wanting is labour, and by fair means or foul the cotton-growers are certain to procure it. England must take care that only fair means are used. We hear much of the results, real or supposed, of missionary efforts in the South Sea Islands, and the very fact of these efforts being made obliges the country which makes them to maintain its own character for civilization and Christianity. Churchmen and Dissenters of all sorts who subscribe to Polynesian missions are interested in the preservation of law and order, because religion would have a very small chance without them. If Government refuses to annex Fiji on account of the expense, it would be worth while to collect money for this object in every church and chapel in the kingdom. We do not, of course, assume that the Government will refuse on this ground, although a Cabinet containing Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Lowe labours under strong suspicion of preferring economy to every other virtue that can help to make a nation great. We do not say that Fiji ought to be annexed, but we do say that we disapprove Mr. Gladstone's arguments against annexation. It is easy to complain of the cost of colonizing New Zealand, but if the intended inference is that New Zealand ought not to have been colonized, we repudiate it. This country did not attain greatness, and will not preserve it, by timidity and parsimony. Time was when we counted our posts in every part of the world as means of striking our enemies, but now they seem to be regarded only as affording objectionable opportunities of expending stores.

The Earl of Belmore has lately spoken from his own knowledge of the condition of the Pacific Islands, and the Government has admitted the necessity of strengthening our naval force which is employed in checking the outrages which he describes. Gross atrocities, he says, are being committed against the natives, although it is hoped that vessels belonging to Queensland are not implicated. There is difficulty in arriving at the exact truth. "Natives, even nominally Christians, are very unreliable." They tell stories of kidnapping which are false, and yet other stories of the same kind are true. It is clear that the labour traffic is liable to abuse, and it often develops itself into a slave trade of the worst description. It is almost equally clear that this traffic will not be effectually regulated until the Fiji Islands have been brought under our authority. Attempts will be made to control the importation of labour which will only partially succeed, and will embroil us with the Government from which Lord Kimberley now professes to expect assistance. Thus one more possession will be added to the British Empire. We hear so much at home of torpedoes and other contrivances for obliterating ships of war, that we are sometimes almost tempted to suppose that the British navy has ceased to exist. But in the South Pacific Ocean that navy is, and is likely long to continue, a reality. The strongest naval power in those seas must necessarily be that which has the largest and best colonies to form its base of operations. It really does appear probable that by the kind permission of Mr. Gladstone we may continue to be important people at the antipodes for some time longer. But of course we cannot maintain our position without expense, which however is likely to be well repaid. Still it may not after all prove necessary or expedient to annex Fiji. The question must be decided when it arises, and all we now ask is, that it may not be considered in the penny-wise and pound-foolish spirit. One thing is certain, that if Fiji requires to be supplied with a Government from without, we ought not to attempt to shuddle the burden of supplying it from ourselves to the colony of New South Wales. Some points of the case may be disputable, but upon this point we feel no doubt at all. The conduct of our Government has been utterly unworthy of a great nation. Whether or not Lord Palmerston would have undertaken to govern Fiji, we are quite sure that he would not have asked New South Wales to govern it for us.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS.

THE Select Committee on Habitual Drunkards have composed a very remarkable Report. All the witnesses whom they have examined declare the inadequacy of the existing laws to check drunkenness, and the Committee infer that those laws should be made "more simple, uniform, and stringent." This, they say, is the more requisite because there is much evidence to show that in large towns and populous districts the great evil of drunkenness is on the increase, which may be "attributed in some measure to the higher wages and shortened hours of labour." The agriculturists do not get so drunk because they have less money and less time to spare. But we assume that, if the strike among them succeeds, they will be able and willing to imitate the example of the dwellers in great towns. Small times and short imprisonments are useless. The moderate use of alcoholic liquors is unattended by any bad effects, but excess in ardent spirits is far more deleterious than in wine or beer. There is a very large amount of drunkenness among all classes and both sexes which never becomes public nor is dealt with by the authorities. It is recommended that the fine of 5s. now imposed on drunkards should be raised to 40s. The fine should be recorded against the offender in a Drunkards' Register. After three convictions within twelve months, the magistrates should be empowered to require the offender to find a surety for sobriety and good conduct for a fixed period, and in default thereof, or in case the surety is forfeited by a fresh offence, to sentence the offender to a considerable period of detention in an "industrial reformatory for inebriates." It is further recommended that reformatories should be established for those who, "notwithstanding the plainest considerations of health, interest, and duty, are given over to habits of intemperance." These institutions are to be divided into two classes—one for those who can pay, and the other for those who cannot. The admission to these institutions would be either voluntary or by committal. "In either case the persons entering should not be allowed to leave, except under conditions to be laid down, and the power to prevent their leaving should be by law conferred on the manager."

Thus far we have carried our summary of this Report. It is impossible to proceed further without expressing the amazement and consternation which it produces. There is not the slightest prospect that any such proposal will ever be adopted, but the fact is sufficiently serious that a body of fifteen gentlemen of ordinary knowledge and understanding could bring it forward. It involves, among other consequences, an enormous extension of the powers which the law confers of dealing with persons who are alleged to be of unsound mind. Let us remember the cases arising out of the exercise of these powers, which have occupied the courts of law during the last few years. Let us remember also the novels in which Mr. Charles Reade has described, partly from reality and partly from imagination, the outrages that have been practised upon persons wrongly immured in madhouses. It is not the least alarming feature in cases of this kind that oppression has been practised from the highest motives, and with a firm belief that all that was done was for the patient's good. There would be needed for the carrying out of this proposal a vast quantity of buildings, and a numerous army of inspectors, who, although they would make inspections of "a very stringent character," would not, we may be sure, be able to prevent monstrous abuses. Besides the power of commitment to be given as already mentioned to magistrates, there would be inquiries before Courts "established under proper safeguards," and on proof that a person cited is "unable to control himself and incapable of managing his affairs, or that his habits are such as to render him dangerous to himself or others, and that this arises from abuse of alcoholic drinks or sedatives, such person might be committed by the Court to a reformatory." A vision arises before our minds of the Alliance raising a fund of 100,000*l.* to pay the costs of proceedings against habitual drunkards under these provisions. Zealots would doubtless argue that if a man were a drunkard a reformatory would do him good, and that if he were a sober man who had been put in by mistake it would do him no harm. The sellers of liquor against whom so much legislative persecution has been proposed would be subjected under this Report to a new and particularly burdensome liability. Provisions similar to those applied to Habitual Criminals by a recent Act would be made applicable to Habitual Drunkards. This will be facilitated by the keeping of a Drunkards' Register, and by providing a form of notice to be served on a liquor-seller by the relations of the drunkard or by order of a magistrate. It is not explained how a liquor-seller is to know that a person named in such a notice stands at his bar. But probably the author of this Report would not scruple to propose that habitual drunkards should be labelled. There is no country in Europe, or perhaps in the world, where irresponsible tyranny is carried further than it might be under this Report. We can offer no more emphatic protest against the proposal than by referring to a recent declaration of the Bishop of Peterborough, that if he must choose between England free and England sober, he would prefer that England should be free. The only qualification of the stringency of the proposal would be the enormous and unmanageable number of the victims of it. As wages rise and hours of work are shortened, workmen take to drinking and are put under restraint. Thus the number of workmen diminishes and their wages rise still further, and so on until all the inhabitants of towns are locked up, while the more sober dwellers in the country have to act as gaolers.

A paragraph laudatory of the Chairman is, we believe, a novel feature of a Parliamentary Report. The Committee desire to acknowledge the valuable aid afforded by him in the investigation of the subject referred to them. He personally undertook during the recess a special voyage to the United States for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of inebriate asylums, and he has volunteered his evidence to the Committee, as we believe the authors of legislative projects commonly do. The House of Commons cannot get through its real business, but there is always time and opportunity for any quantity of pretended business to be performed in Committees. If Mr. Dalrymple were not a member of Parliament, he might be reduced to writing a book, but he avails himself of his privilege to obtain the ventilation of his pet crotchets at the national expense. He keeps his hobby-horse out of the taxes. We have before us at present only the Report of his Committee, but a blue-book of evidence will follow in due course, and the newspapers will comment on it during the recess. Next Session there will doubtless be a Bill founded on the Report.

which will occupy the House of Commons on Wednesday until Government has decided upon the most inoffensive method of quashing a ridiculous proposal. There is just one line of this Report that we approve. "Watchful inspection over the purity of liquor sold" can hardly be carried too far in theory, but in practice the word "purity" suggests endless difficulties. The authors of this Report have not, however, taken the trouble to put their recommendations into a shape which might be satisfactory to a legal critic. We cannot forget statements which have been lately published as to the "purity" of wine. It would be easy to draw a Bill under which the entire stock of champagne in the grand stand of a racetrack might be seized, condemned, and destroyed as impure. Indeed such a Bill might be so worked that the stock of beer, wine, and spirits in the kingdom would be largely reduced. The Report does not even stop at the furthest point of condemnation to which a test of purity might be carried. It states that the deleterious character of whisky often arises from its being new and raw. We are by this time prepared for anything, and a proposal for condemning all new and raw whisky would not surprise us. We could probably have supplied the Committee with evidence tending to show that people who mix their liquors get drunk much sooner than those who keep to a single tap; and such a statement, duly formulated in a Report, might serve to found a Bill providing that after dinner every person should declare his election between port and claret. It is remarkable that this new variety of fanatics are strongly opposed to the Alliance. We had forgotten another line of the Report which may claim our unqualified approval. "The moderate use of alcoholic liquors is unattended by any bad effects"; but still their immoderate use would be attended, under the Report, by the disagreeable effect of imprisonment. It appears that Mr. Dalrymple has written a full account of the visit which he so kindly made to the United States, and a member of the Committee laid the whole of this account before it in the form of a draft Report. The Committee, however, seem to have felt that the adoption of this draft would be rather too much, so the Chairman's composition is only printed in small type. He shows amid his fanaticism occasional gleams of common sense. Thus he quotes the opinion of a law officer of Canada, who said to him, "Whatever you do in shutting up your public-houses, take care you do not drive your people to spirits." He confirms other witnesses in stating that the Maine Liquor Law is habitually evaded. He quotes some examples of the sort of system which he wishes to introduce here. In Pennsylvania commissions of inquiry are issued against drunkards, just as in cases of alleged lunacy among ourselves. If a man is found to be an habitual drunkard, he may be confined in an asylum, or in prison if refractory. "The asylum authorities have as much power over him as a warder over a convict in a penitentiary." The startling proposal that a man who enters an inebriate asylum voluntarily should be detained involuntarily, originates, like many other strange things, in America. Magistrates inflict fines for drunkenness in the United States, and they pay themselves fees out of the fines, which practice is obviously liable to abuse. The authors of the Report insist that drunkenness produced by beer is less prolific in crime than that produced by spirit; and this opinion appears to be entertained in some parts of America, where the sale of beer and cider is permitted, while that of spirits is forbidden. This Report is grotesque, and its conclusions are amazing, but nevertheless its authors may be useful by encountering the fanatics of the Alliance with a zeal equal to their own. Mr. Dalrymple is entitled to the credit of having, by his extravagant absurdity, introduced an element of mirth into a dreary controversy.

THE ITALIAN OPERAS.

SINCE our last notice of the two Italian operas but very little in the way of novelty has been produced. We have had some singers hitherto unknown to this country, and among them, at Drury Lane, two of more than ordinary promise. These are Signor Campanini, a tenor, and Signor Rota, a barytone-bass. Mr. Gye's French Canadian soprano, Madlle. Emma Albani, whose real name is Lajeunesse, but who assumed the professional title of "Albani" in remembrance of the city in which not long since she made her first public appearance, has already been referred to. Other new comers have been heard, as for example, Madlles. Marie Rose and Carlotta Grossi, at Drury Lane, Madlle. Marianne Brandt, Madame Saar, and Herr Köhler, at Covent Garden. What they have done up to this moment may be speedily told. Madlle. Marie Rose, in one or two of Auber's works at the French Opéra Comique, and especially in the Premier Jour de Bonheur, the deceased composer's penultimate opera, earned for herself a reputation which she afterwards seriously imperilled at the great theatre in the Rue Lepelletier, where she made her début as Margaret in M. Gounod's Phœbe. This lady does not possess the physical requisites for the Grand Opéra; nor is Margaret a character suited to her means. She selected it nevertheless for her first essay before a London audience, and though, on the whole, well received, she created no deeper impression than she had created with the same part in Paris. She simply added one more to the list of demi-failures in a character which, oddly enough, almost every young lady, no matter what her natural gifts and artistic culture, imagine she can play, till experience has taught her the contrary. We by no means impute that Madlle. Rose is the least meritorious of those aspirants who fall more or less short of M. Gounod's ideal in his musical presentation of Goethe's heroine. On the contrary, she is superior to many who have striven like her, and striven vainly. She is a more than tolerable actress, but has not the power of exhibiting deep emotion. After a way of her own, she is, moreover, a clever vocalist, with a certain command of expression; but her voice, imperfectly trained, is not naturally flexible. Thus the so-called "Jewel-song" in the garden scene of Phœbe, generally the show-piece of singers whose voices do possess flexibility, is precisely that which exhibits the shortcomings of Madlle. Rose to disadvantage. She cannot execute the shake and scale which lead up to the theme, with the required facility and evenness. Madlle. Rose has appeared in nothing else of importance, the Italian version of Auber's Diamant de la Couronne, under the name of La Caterina, in which the Prospector assigns to her the part of Diana, having even thus late in the season, given no sign; and, indeed, we are inclined to doubt whether it will be produced. Nor has Der Freischütz, in which she was cast for Annchen (Annetta), a soubrette just in her line, been even put into rehearsal. Madlle. Rose, however, has made herself useful by strengthening the cast of Chorubini's Deux Journées, about the production of which masterpiece we shall have a word or two to say further on. Meanwhile, if she can be persuaded to work for the general good, and not look to what, in conventional phrase, is denominated "first business," she may be welcomed as an acquisition of value. Madlle. Carlotta (Grossi, who, despite her name, is German pur sang, has only appeared once—at a performance of the Huguenots, in which she sustained the part of Marguerite de Valois. Madlle. Grossi is very young, has a fine soprano voice of wide compass, and great vigour of delivery. Her voice, nevertheless, is as yet but a rough diamond, which needs polishing to make its worth evident. She gave much of her music well, portions of it in a less satisfactory manner. On the whole she met with a very warm reception, her handsome appearance, graceful attitudes, and generally dignified deportment (to say nothing of her youth) exercising a manifest influence. Madlle. Grossi's career will be watched with interest.

The new tenor, Signor Campanini, created an extraordinary impression on the night of his first appearance, when he played Gennaro, to the Lucrezia Borgia of Madlle. Tietjens, and the Alphonso of Signor Rota (another stranger). Signor Campanini, whose name did not figure in the prospectus, was an afterthought of Mr. Mapleson's, and turned out a lucky one; for, though we may not be able to rate him altogether so highly as he is rated, for the most part, by our contemporaries, there can be no question that he has hit the public taste, has been a real attraction and a considerable aid to the fortunes of the season. In our opinion, Signor Campanini's voice, musical and telling as it is, wants, to render it as penetrating as it is agreeable, a touch of that "ringing," "metallic" quality which musicians so much admire. Signor Campanini is already versed in all that relates to the art of phrasing, and yet he would be the better for a little more decision of accent. What he lacks, so far as we are competent to judge, is flexibility. He has little or none of what Italian professors suggestively call "agilità"—of which Mario was so incomparable a master. Thus his florid singing generally, and his execution of grappetti in particular, is seldom satisfying. He declaims, however, with genuine expression; never tortures his phrases by spinning them out indefinitely; is free from exaggeration and affected sentiment; free also from the so-called "tremolo," a prevalent vice with the actual race of singers; a complete adept in messa voce singing; and, last not least, his intonation is rarely at fault. Then, apart from his qualities as a vocalist, Signor Campanini has an excellent stage presence; is mainly in bearing, graceful in gesture, and, for one of no matured experience, shows more than common intelligence as a comedian. Since his début, a success beyond the reach of evil, he has sung better on some occasions than on others. Up to this time we cannot but regard his first part, Gennaro, as his best. Yet in the Trovatore he evoked the sympathies of the audience by an eloquent delivery of the address to Leonora ("Ah! sì, ben mio"), and heightened the impression by the enthusiasm which he threw into its vigorous sequel, "Mi quella pira." This last, as the phrase is, "drow down the house," and the curtain fell on a second triumph for the new tenor. Neither in Lucia di Lammermoor, as Edgardo, nor in Styphello, as the Duke of Mantua, although much in both may fairly be eulogized, was Signor Campanini so entirely at ease. Upon what he may eventually become it would be fruitless to speculate. Our own conviction is that, if he does not attain a high rank in his profession—the highest is, we think, beyond his reach—it will be his own fault exclusively. He is gifted with exceptional means, and must learn to make the best of them; he has not with more than ordinary encouragement, and should endeavour to demonstrate his sense of it. If earnest and industrious, he can hardly miss the mark; if neither, so much the worse. In the dearth of good operatic tenors, one so endowed is naturally looked after with anxiety; and all opera-goers must wish that Signor Campanini may reach the ultimus thale of his ambition, not more for his sake than for their own. Signor Rota, "from the Imperial Opera, St. Petersburg," is a barytone-bass of real distinction. He has the same drawback as Signor Foll, being somewhat too tall for stage-effect; otherwise he possesses most of the requisite qualifications. His voice is telling and of good quality; he sings well, in spite of an occasional addition to that obnoxious "tremolo," the plague of modern times; his presence is imposing, and he is thoroughly up in the business of the stage. Signor Rota's first appearance was as Duke Alphonso, when Signor Campanini came out; and though he created a marked effect, particularly in the duet (with Lucresia), and trio (with Lucresia and Gennaro), two conspicuous features of the second act, in the general summing up he was almost forgotten, so absorbed had the audience been with the new tenor, who, in "Di pescatore," the trio of the poisoned cup, the duet of the antidote, and the death scene of Gennaro, pleased beyond measure. In his next parts, however—Antonio (Linda di Chamouni), and Mephistopheles (Faust)—Signor Rota took ample revenge, and was at once recognized as an artist of superior pretensions. We no longer possess a Tamburini, or a Ronconi; and Mr. Santley having, for the present at least, abandoned the Italian opera, it may be said that there is no Antonio now at hand to be compared with Signor Rota, who in the scene where the old peasant rejects the proffered alms of his daughter, which he imagines to be the price of her dishonour, exhibits a dramatic power beyond the common. As Mephistopheles Signor Rota reminds us occasionally of M. Faure, whose impersonation, if he does not absolutely equal, he fairly emulates. The reading is exactly similar; we have the mocking fiend, blended with the would-be courteous gentleman, which M. Faure portrays in such perfection.

We may add to the list of Mr. Mapleson's new comers the young American prima donna, Miss Clara Louisa Kellogg; for, while not unknown to us, she has been some four or five years absent. Miss Kellogg, who raised great hopes when she first appeared at Her Majesty's Theatre, has more than justified them, and is now a real artist. This was apparent in her Linda di Chamouni, and in her Lucia, the first two characters assigned to her, both of which she had essayed in London previously. Still more was it apparent in her Gilda (Rigoletto), a performance alike clever and replete with charm. Miss Kellogg is welcome back, and will be always welcome, because she is earnest, and does not choose to halt, as if she believed that she had already reached the goal. If she continues to advance as she has hitherto advanced, great things may confidently be expected of her.

About Mr. Gye's new singers, with the single exception of Madlle. Emma Albani, there is little to say. Madlle. Albani has appeared in the Sonnambula, Lucia, Martha, Rigoletto, and Linda di Chamouni. She is more than carrying out the promise of her début. Extremely young, with a prepossessing exterior, a sweet and sympathetic if not powerful voice, especially agreeable and soft in the higher range of notes, a command of the mezza voce rare in beginners, endowed with grace and intelligence, if with no dramatic force, Madlle. Albani has a career before her. Further than this we have nothing to add at present, unless it be that the new comer has won the sympathies of Mr. Gye's subscribers, and is invariably received with the utmost cordiality. That Madlle. Albani has a good deal to learn is undeniable; but, young as she is, she has not contracted any of those vicious habits that might interfere with her future advance. It is long since the director of the Royal Italian Opera has made an acquisition of more promise. About Mr. Gye's new German singers a word will suffice. They have been brought forward now and then, but with comparatively insignificant results. Madlle. Brandt played Fidelio, in one of the very worst conceivable performances of Beethoven's opera. Orchestra, chorus, and principals were alike objectionable. But, as Wagner's Lohengrin, after all the talk about it, and all the self-sacrifice to which Mr. Gye refers in his prospectus, is not to be given, we need say no more of the singers announced to take part in that remarkable work—one of whom, Madlle. Emmy Zimmermann, who was to play Elsa, having not even put in an appearance. In the absence of Lohengrin we are destined to find consolation in Il Guarany, the fantastic opera by a young Brazilian composer, Carlo Gomez, which has had a certain success with what Mr. Gye terms "the critical audience of the Scala at Milan." Let us hope the consolation may be complete.

What works have been given since our last article on the Italian Operas may be left to the imagination of our readers, who will find enough to guide them in the foregoing remarks, and in what remains to be said about the leading prime donne at either theatre. Madame Adelina Patti, at Covent Garden, has been going through a series of characters in which she is so well known and appreciated that to find a new word to say about any one of them would be difficult if not impossible. Abandoning three of her favourite parts (Amina, Lucia, and Martha), for a time at least, to Madlle. Albani, Madame Patti has played Dinorah, Rosina, Zerlina (Don Giovanni), Catarina (L'Étoile du Nord), and Leonora (Il Trovatore), besides the heroine in Prince Poniatowski's opera—a sort of pendant to the Esmeralda of Signor Campanini, which she introduced two years ago as a special means of exhibiting her own accomplishments. Esmeralda was performed some three nights at the most. Gelmina has been given twice, and despite Madame Patti's brilliant vaude, and painful death-scene—painful on account of its too closely realistic truth—has gone the way of all things which do not possess the elements of vitality. It would be waste of time and space to describe such an opera in detail. The libretto is absurd, and as monstrous as it is absurd; while the music consists chiefly of shreds and patches, without a spark of originality, or anything in the setting forth to atone for the want of it. Bouquets were thrown to Madame Patti, in profusion, it is true; plaudits and "recalls" were as frequent as any prima donna could desire; and the composer was brought forward twice by Madame Patti, after the fall of the curtain. The intrinsic value of such demonstrations, however, is too well known in these times, when applause is bestowed upon everybody, bouquets thrown to everybody, and "recalls" awarded to everybody, no matter what the occasion or how such honours may have been merited. That Madame Patti still holds, and is likely to hold, her place at Covent Garden so long as it pleases her, being, in her line, as singer and actress, without a superior, we willingly admit. It may be said, in strict truth, that she improves year by year—which means that she is ever more and more zealously studying her art. But she cannot be fairly complimented on her taste in the choice of new operas to be imposed upon the management of the theatre at which she is engaged. In Esmeralda there were, at any rate, two female characters; but in Gelmina there is one only, with not even a subordinate to help the matter out; and though that one female character is supported by Madame Patti, the want of a trifle more of the gentle element is not the less felt. Enough, however, about Gelmina. Let us trust that Madame Patti will be better advised in her next recommendation of an opera to her director.

Madame Pauline Lucca, Mr. Gye's other great "first-lady," and Madame Patti's only rival, has equally been limited to a series of characters in which she is seen and heard over and over again—such, for example, as Zerlina (Fra Diavolo), Valentine (the Huguenots), Leonora (the Favorita), Cherubino (Le Nozze di Figaro), Selika (L'Africaine), and Margaret (Faust e Marguerite). To these she has been allowed to add Pamina (Il Flauto Magico), in which she has no great chance of distinction in her peculiar way, and Agatha, in Der Freischütz (with M. Faure, as Caspar), in which, fortunately, she has several chances of distinction, of every one of which she avails herself. We cannot remember, often as we have heard Weber's most characteristic opera, any representation of the part, all its requirements taken into consideration, more original, more full of genuine sentiment, and more complete than the Agatha of Madame Lucca. It is a creation of the rarest type. Madame Lucca has every essential, it is true. She looks the character to perfection; her voice enables her to give all effect to the music, and her dramatic genius stands her equally in good stead. She is so much the Agatha of the poet and the Agatha of the composer, that she rivets attention from the commencement of her first scene to the termination of her last. Her delivery of the scena in Act II., where Agatha awaits the return of her lover, is a striking example of musical declamation, and the enthusiasm it excites is fully accounted for. In this, the only opportunity accorded to Madame Lucca of earning fresh laurels during the season, she has earned them, and legitimately.

What can be said about Madlle. Christine Nilsson, except that she is engaged by Mr. Mapleson for twelve representations, that she has already appeared seven times, that the characters she has hitherto assumed are Violetta (La Traviata), Marguerite (Faust), and Lucia, and that to-night she is to treat us with another novelty, in the shape of Martha? Madlle. Nilsson's two years in America, we may add, have not exactly improved either her voice or her style. The voice is still exquisite (it could never be otherwise); the vocalization is still for the most part admirable; but she has partially thrown off that quiet grace which, mistaken of old, by certain critics, for coldness, was in her an inherent and abiding charm. She seems now bent upon being highly dramatic, which is foreign to her nature. Perhaps this may wear off, and Madlle. Nilsson may again return to her old enchanting ways, again attract every spectator by her unobtrusive manner, and every hearer by those soft and dulcet tones, which used to come from her throat as from the throat of a bird—unpremeditated as irresistible. That Madlle. Nilsson is always the accomplished artist none can deny; but there is a something gone from her that was wont to fascinate by its simple unaffectedness, and that we, and all her admirers, would like to see brought back again. She is now prone to overdo expression, whereas formerly everything came quite naturally, and she could conquer with a look, a smile, or a tone. Each of the three parts she has assumed this year left upon us the impression to which we refer—not so vividly, perhaps, Lucia as the others, but still in a great measure even Lucia. We had hoped to see the gifted songstress in some new character; but we are doomed to disappointment. Not only is she to play no new character, but we are not even to witness again her impersonations of Desdemona (Otello) and Mignon, in M. Ambroise Thomas's opera so-called. We presume there is no help for it, or assuredly, if for his own interests alone, the director of Her Majesty's Opera would have again introduced Madlle. Nilsson in one or both. As it happens, the public must rest satisfied with four or five works so often heard that even such an exceptional artist cannot put a fresh bloom upon them. No one particularly wanted Hamlet (the last scene excepted); but many longed for Otello, and at least as many for Mignon.

Proh pudor! The Deux Journées of Cherubini, one of the greatest masterpieces of one of the greatest of masters—though never before produced in this so distant music-loving country as the composer wrote it, though got up with exemplary care by Sir Michael Costa, who has set the spoken dialogues to accompanied recitative in a manner that Cherubini himself would not have disowned; though every part was well played, from that of Madlle. Tietjens to the lowest in the cast, and though the orchestra and chorus were irreproachable, was, in so far as the substantial interests of the theatre are concerned, a fiasco. The house, at the first representation (the only representation, indeed, no second being announced) was about three parts filled; and as a very large proportion of the audience consisted of musical professors, we need scarcely say that, take it for all in all, that audience was not absolutely a "paying" audience. There was a good gallery, of course; and had there been such a thing as a pit, there would have been a good pit; for pit and gallery have a real love of art—as may be remembered time out of mind; but boxes and stalls for the most part only look upon the Opera as a lounge, and if their occupants are compelled to listen attentively to anything more than the favourite airs of soprano or tenor, regard the whole thing as more or less of a bore. The fact is that Italian opera ways, and Italian opera prices, leave good music, unless under peculiarly exceptional circumstances which need not be particularized, out of the question. In former times Italian opera was a luxury for the Lord Mount Edgcombe class of amateurs; and it must be admitted that the class stood up manfully for what it considered to be good music, and even raised objections to the then coming man, Rossini, because his orchestration was so full as to drown the voices of the singers. At all events, right or wrong, this class of amateurs was earnest in its convictions. Now, for a long time past, Italian opera has not been food for men, but food for children; and so pure and beautiful a thing as Cherubini's opera, with so simple and blameless a libretto, is voted dull, and none of the fashionable world can be persuaded to go and see it. Thus the manager has no alternative but to withdraw the work. Under these circumstances we shall not give ourselves the trouble to describe it. Enough that the Italian Opera season of 1872 will be remembered for two signal failures—Gelmina and Les Deux Journées. Happily they cannot be classed together as "arcades ambo."

REVIEWS.

REEVE'S ROYAL AND REPUBLICAN FRANCE.*

MR. REEVE, like several other people, has thought good to reprint his Essays in a book. His motive for so doing is, by his own account, a praiseworthy one. He has studied and thought much about the French Revolution, and he thinks that "the results of the French Revolution are a palpable demonstration" of certain truths, and that it is "important to lay to heart certain irresistible lessons." We gather that, had not Mr. Reeve stepped in, these palpable demonstrations and irresistible lessons were likely to have faded away from men's minds; for he tells us that he has "ventured to collect and republish these chapters of the history of France, before they are entirely forgotten." The essays themselves, we gather from another part of Mr. Reeve's preface, were originally suggested by "occasions and incidents," and these occasions and incidents were "diverse and multifarious." But, diverse and multifarious as they were, the essays "have not the less a common purpose." We confess that, after reading through Mr. Reeve's two volumes, we do not quite see the common purpose; though we dare say this is our own fault. But it is plain that Mr. Reeve has been stirred up at sundry times and in diverse manners to write about the French Revolution and about other things before and since the French Revolution. And of the diverse manners in which Mr. Reeve writes the latest is not the best. In the preface and during a large part of the second volume he is very angry. We are far from blaming him for his anger. When a man has to write about such things as some of the doings of the Communists in Paris, he does well to be angry. But, as a rule, a man who writes when he is angry, even when he does well by being so, will not write much that is likely to be worth the keeping. At any rate, in order to do so, he must be something else besides being angry. Many an angry man has written with great eloquence; some angry men have even lighted on new truths and new views of things. But Mr. Reeve is simply angry and nothing else. Instead of stirring him up to anything like eloquence, his anger stirs him up only to a further use of those big, unmeaning, Latinized words whose use half-educated people take for grand writing. As for new truths and new views, we feel as strongly as Mr. Reeve about the murder of the Archbishop and the hostages; but though Mr. Reeve seems to think that, without him, all these chapters of French history would soon have been "entirely forgotten," we somehow think that we could have managed to remember them even without the help of Mr. Reeve. Much of his writing comes under the head of things which are true, but not new. But statements of this respectable, if not very enlivening, class are mixed up with a good many which are new, but not true. Mr. Reeve is specially unlucky when he puts on the mantle of the prophet. Some perhaps may remember what, we believe, has been his highest flight of political sagacity. When he published his translation of De Tocqueville in the midst of the American war, he wound up his preface in a stately and emphatic manner which few could rival, with the assurance that "the destinies of the American people would be fulfilled." This prediction had the great advantage that it could not help coming true, whatever might be the result of the civil war. Mr. Reeve, emboldened perhaps by this undoubted success, ventured afterwards on a prediction about the destinies of the French people which was somewhat more definite, and therefore, as it happened, much what less lucky. Mr. Reeve, writing in January 1871, spoke as follows:—

In spite, however, of all that is past, France has still the moral energy to carry on this great contest for national independence. Victory is the prize of those who can make war longest; and if aught of her ancient spirit remains, she will not treat as long as a stranger treads her soil.

Now all the world knows that France did treat while the stranger trod her soil, and that now, a year and some months after she treated, the stranger is treading her soil still. The alternatives are two. Either Mr. Reeve was altogether mistaken in his ideas of what was going to happen, or else what did happen proved that nought of the ancient spirit of France—whatever that may be—remained. Mr. Reeve had his choice either to strike the passage out or to accept either of these alternatives. The first course would have been hard; the passage has a ring of the heroic style about it which would have made any writer unwilling to draw his pen through it. And of the remaining alternatives both must have been very unpleasant. Still it would have been better to accept either of them than to go floundering about through the mass of words in which Mr. Reeve does his best to prove two things, but naturally proves neither:—

I am aware that the concluding lines of the foregoing essay were thought at the time to express a hope which subsequent events did not justify, and which, even when it was published, could not be justified. But although France might doubtless have obtained somewhat easier terms of peace from her invaders after the capitulation of Sedan, if the Government of the Emperor Napoleon had not been overthrown by the revolution of the 4th of September, yet I confess that I am still one of those who hold that the effort made by France to carry on the war for five months longer, though the result was disastrous, is the one fact which in some degree redeems the honour of the nation. She displayed at least a certain amount of moral energy and physical vigour in that part of the contest; not enough to save her from defeat, but enough to wipe out a portion of the stain on her national character and her honour. This was the sentiment which dictated the concluding lines of this essay; and the reluctance with which she was brought to submit to an oppressive and humiliating peace was the last proof she could give that something of her long greatness still remained in the hearts of her people. I therefore leave the expression unchanged.

This brings us back to the fact that this passage, like several others, is an old friend at which we had our laugh in times past, when it appeared in its former state of being in the Edinburgh Review. We therefore looked specially for one or two of the most wonderful passages in the wonderful essay—the last but one, that headed "France in 1870"—from which we have just made an extract. We will for a moment borrow some of the flowers of Mr. Reeve's rhetoric. Mr. Reeve says, "Ere we conclude, we cannot but express the profound sorrow with which we witness even the momentary eclipse of the brightest planet in our system" (ii. 303). The brightest planet in Mr. Reeve's system seems to be France, and the whole sentence, when done into English, seems to mean that Mr. Reeve is very sorry at the overthrow of France by Germany. But the bright planets, or rather comets, the brilliant flashes which mark the somewhat erratic course of Mr. Reeve through the paths of history and politics, have none of them suffered even a momentary eclipse. He still likens the institutions of Sparta and those of Prussia on the ground of "the authority of the Kings" in each country. We believe that we asked before, but we ask again, Will Mr. Reeve be good enough to tell us the name of the Emperor William's colleague, or what body there is in Prussia which has power to put him in prison? We are still told that in arts as well as in arms, in literature, scientific research, and so forth, Germany is no more worthy to be named beside France "than the Macedonians were to rival the glory of Athens." King Philip indeed may pass for a Macedonian Moltke and a Macedonian Bismarck in one, but we ask again for a Macedonian Leibnitz, a Macedonian Goethe, a Macedonian Grimm. When we remember the strange havoc which Mr. Reeve, in translating De Tocqueville, made of the English and French languages, we are tempted to ask whether he understands the German language at all. At any rate his knowledge of German literature and learning must be about on a level with his knowledge of the New Testament. Mr. Reeve, speaking of those who bring wholesale charges of immorality and irreligion against the French people, draws a very proper distinction between different classes. He speaks up—as far as our knowledge goes, with perfect truth—on behalf of "the great mass of the rural population in France." But then he adds, "we hold very cheap the pretensions of those who think God they are not as those Sadducees." We presume then that, as Mr. Reeve has found out some otherwise unknown likeness in government and literature between Macedonia and Prussia, he has also found out some equally unexpected points of likeness between Sadducees and Publicans.

These reminiscences of Mr. Reeve's essays in their earlier state of being bring us to another point. Mr. Reeve has nowhere taken the trouble to give his writings that degree of polish and correction which is needed in turning an article in a periodical work even of the highest class into an essay which is to form a chapter in a permanent book. In periodical writing it is almost impossible to avoid a certain tut-tut-tut—if we may borrow a phrase from an intelligent savage—about the writer and the reader and the article itself, how "space fails," and all the rest. A good writer, even in a newspaper, avoids this kind of thing as much as possible, but perhaps no one can get rid of it altogether, even in a quarterly review. But in a book this kind of thing is intolerable. Now in Mr. Reeve's fashion it is more offensive than in any other writer that we can remember. We cannot turn over an essay of Mr. Reeve's without meeting at every step such phrases as these—"Our limits forbid us to enter at length," "We are unwilling to deviate from the more precise object of these pages," "We cannot ask our readers to accompany us through the technical details of Mollien's operations." Or again, we are told that certain letters from De Tocqueville to Sir George Lewis "are of extreme interest, but their length forbids us to quote them here." On this last occasion Mr. Reeve "confines himself to one observation." But the following passage, which lets us behind the curtain and gives us the privilege of seeing Mr. Reeve in the very act of making an article for the Edinburgh Review, is the very gem of its own class:—

* Royal and Republican France. A Series of Essays reprinted from the "Edinburgh Review," "Quarterly Review," and "British and Foreign Review." By Thomas Reeve. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

We had already written these remarks, when it occurred to us to turn to a half-forgotten passage in which M. de Tocqueville has described with his wonted sagacity the same distinction, and traced its consequences. The page [sic] is so remarkable, and so apposite to the present state of things in France, that at the risk of forfeiting our own credit for originality we transcribe it.

It would certainly not have come into our heads to give Mr. Reeve credit for originality, but it may very likely have come into the head of somebody else, and at all events Mr. Reeve is doubtless the happier for thinking that a belief in his originality is so firmly fixed in the mind of the world in general that he can afford to be magnanimous about it. But conceive any man first sitting down to write this kind of thing in a review, and then deliberately printing it again in a book. Let us try to measure the distance between an Edinburgh article as written and republished by Mr. Reeve and an Edinburgh article as written and republished by Lord Macaulay. The difference is simply that wide gap which divides the literary gentleman from the scholar. So again, after a long extract from a letter of M. de Tocqueville, Mr. Reeve tells us, "This noble passage is so characteristic of M. de Tocqueville's enlightened regard for this country, that we have stepped out of our course to quote it." But Mr. Reeve has not stepped out of his course to quote it. This fashion of quotation is in his course throughout his whole book. Page after page is stuffed full of extracts in small print from De Tocqueville and other people. This is done in a way which was distinctly overdoing it even in the first periodical form of the essays, but which, now that they are gathered together into a book, is utterly intolerable. The mere fact of putting such essays together shows that the author looks on them as having more than an ephemeral value. If he does so, it would surely be only civil to his readers to do something to relieve them from a merely ephemeral shape. Either Mr. Reeve would not take this trouble, or he did not know how to set about it. So we not only have the commonplace of Mr. Reeve's matter and the vulgarisms of his style—"virile" for "manly," "debile" [sic] for "weak," "febrile" for "feverish," and all the Latinisms of an unscholarly writer—but we have also all the cant phrases of periodical writing carried to a degree which even in periodical writing would be utterly wearisome. The only place where Mr. Reeve seems to have done much in the way of revision is in the article headed "Mirabeau," where "some passages were slightly modified, and some additions made to that article by the late Mr. Croker, whose knowledge of the details of the French Revolution was most extensive and accurate. But as," Mr. Reeve adds, "these emendations were of small importance, the essay is here restored to its original form." Perhaps readers of the Edinburgh Review in later times, when they come across a scholarly article patched up here and there by bits in the style of a penny-a-liner, may be tempted to think of the words "co immitior, quia toleraverat." But Mr. Reeve as writer and Mr. Croker as reviser must have been well matched. What Mr. Croker was we have been taught by Lord Macaulay; what Mr. Reeve is we have been taught by Mr. Reeve himself. Still we wonder whether Mr. Croker altered and Mr. Reeve restored the passage in which Mr. Reeve, translating a French letter, says, "I do not think the throne, and still more the dynasty, have ever run a greater danger."

We might stop here altogether; but there is something worthy of thought in the fact that volumes such as these should have come from the same quarter which once sent forth the brilliant essays of Macaulay. And Mr. Reeve's writings touch on important subjects, and his treatment of some of them is, in its own way, instructive. Having therefore said what we have to say about the form of Mr. Reeve's essays, we must still give another article to their matter.

ORISSA.*

(Second Notice)

IN a former notice we dealt chiefly with the second volume of Mr. Hunter's work on Orissa. The name of the province at once suggested the great natural calamities of which it has been the theatre, and the measures that have been taken to prevent their recurrence. But the first volume, which is mainly concerned with the religious history of Orissa, is by far the most interesting of the two. The possession of the temple of Jagannath gives Orissa a more than provincial importance; and in India, more than in any other country perhaps, the history of religion is the history of the people. Orissa however does not present that vast legendary antiquity which has grown up round Indian kingdoms more favoured by nature. Down to the sixth century B.C. the land was still being made. The muddy jungle which the Mahabharata went on piling up along the shores and in the very bed of its estuary had to become solid earth before history could claim it. The first inhabitants of whom any trace remains are the hill tribes and fishing races whose descendants remain to this day. In the midst of these dwelt the Buddhist communities who have left to Orissa its first architectural monuments. In parts of the province the hills are "honeycombed with cells and temples." These caves represent three distinct stages of religious progress or decline. The first is the age of asceticism. The earliest cells are "scarcely bigger than the lair of a wild beast, and almost as inaccessible." By and by these homes of solitary hermits give place to excavations intended for the meetings of religious communities. In the third age monastic life has become identified with the Court. The sculptures which adorn the latest excavations have nothing of religion in them until the prince and princess whose acts are represented, after enjoying to the full the pomps and pleasures of the world, have retired to end their days in contemplation. The inscriptions which preserve the eleven edicts put forth by Asoka, the Buddhist Emperor of Northern India, are probably older by at least a century than the latest of these sculptures. They date from the year 250 B.C. and their contents give a vivid picture of Buddhism at the height of its influence. Its one great feature "is its intense humanity. It provides alike for the bodily comfort and for the eternal salvation of all whom it can reach." It lays solemn commands upon its followers "to go forth among all races, and to all countries, and to preach 'the righteousness which passeth knowledge.' " At the same time "it cares for the sick, it digs wells for the thirsty wayfarer, it plants shady resting groves for man and beast." This characteristic of Buddhism should always be borne in mind as the exception to the ethnical isolation which has usually marked the Sanskrit-speaking races of India. "Buddhism is as typical a religion of these Sanskrit races as the Brahmanism which went before it and the Hinduism which succeeded it."

The Buddhist dynasty in Orissa, which Mr. Hunter believes to have been of Greek origin, was overthrown in 474 A.D. The kings of the Lion line were Brahmanical from the first. "The ancient Sanskrit gods, who had all along co-existed more or less distinctly with Buddhism, now asserted their supremacy, and came forth arrayed in their now garb as modern Hindu deities." Before the middle of the seventh century of our era the contest between Buddhism and Siva worship had practically ceased:—

Temples to the All-Destroyer formed the great public works of the six centuries during which the Lion line ruled Orissa. Their founder began the lofty tower at Bhuvanagar about 500 A.D.; two succeeding monarchs laboured on it, and the fourth of the house completed it in A.D. 657. A slab inscription some centuries later recounts how a pious princess reared another "cloud reaching temple with four beautiful halls" to the Lord Siva, "who destroys the sins of his worshippers, and gives salvation to those who touch (his image) in his holy place." Almost the only event by which the Palm Leaf Record relieves its monotonous list of kings of the ninth century is the erection of the Siva temple in Puri. And the last public act of the dynasty was the building of the beautiful vestibule to the great shrine at Bhuvanagar, between 1099 and 1104 A.D., or barely thirty years before the extinction of the race.

Bhuvanagar, the political capital of the Sivaite dynasty, once contained 7,000 shrines clustered round the great central tower, and friezes, scrolls, and carvings of wonderful beauty still adorn the long deserted walls. Jagpur, the ecclesiastical capital, served for centuries as a quarry from which Musalmán conquerors built their mosques and palaces. To this day, however, the traveller wanders "amid dilapidated temples, time-worn flights of river stairs, statues ignominiously cast upon their faces, noseless gods and jungle-buried monoliths." Three colossal statues, each formed of a single block of chlorite, representing the wife of Siva, the Queen of Heaven, and the Earth Goddess, were raised by an English magistrate in 1866. The first is represented as a naked skeleton with a death's head over her forehead and an endless string of skulls wound about her body. In another monolith she is drawn at the moment of her victory over the demon host—a "brimming cup of blood in one of her four hands, and a battle-axe in another." Yet Siva-worship was to the last an imported creed in Orissa. Jagpur was the seat, not of a native hierarchy, but of a priestly class invited by the founder of the Lion line from Oudh. The original Aryan conquerors, despised by the new comer and christened Worldly or Root-growing Brahmins, long clung to their Buddhist creed; and this schism between the royal and the popular faiths, joined to the growing demoralization of a Court religion, probably paved the way for the overthrow of the Sivaite line of kings in 1132 of our era, and the substitution for them of a new line of Vishnuvite sovereigns. For the worship of Vishnu had far more affinity with Buddhism than that of Siva, and though the descendants of the imported priests, even in Puri, the great centre of Vishnuvite pilgrimage and ritual, worship Siva as their village god, the older settlers became Vishnuvites the moment that the new dynasty had established itself.

It is this latest faith that has made Orissa famous. Earlier forms of belief, indeed, have contributed to its religious pre-eminence, and still surround it with peculiar sanctity:—

From the moment the pilgrim passes the Baitarani River he stands on holy ground. On the southern side of the river rises a shrine after shrine to Siva, the All-Destroyer. On its very bank he beholds the house of Yamah, the King of the Dead, and as he crosses over the priest whips him into his boat, the last text which is breathed over the dying Hindu. At the moment the spirit takes its flight. "In the grand gloom of Yamah's hall, in the tepid Baitarani River." On leaving the stream he enters Jagpur, sacred to Parvati, the wife of the All-Destroyer. To the south-west is the region of pilgrimage sacred to the sun, now scarcely visited, with its mysterious ruins looking down in desolate beauty across the Bay of Bengal. To the southwest is the region of pilgrimage dedicated to Siva, with its city of temples, which once clustered, according to native tradition, to the number of 7,000, around the sacred lake.

But far above all these shrines, consecrated as they are by past glories or present devotion, is the city of Puri, known to every hamlet throughout India, and to every civilized nation on earth, as the abode of Jagannáth, the Lord of the World. Here is the national temple, whither the people flock to worship. Here is the Swarga Dwára, the Gate of Heaven, whither thousands of pilgrims come to die, lulled to their last sleep by the roar of the eternal ocean. Twenty generations of devout Hindus have gone through life haunted with a perpetual yearning to visit this shrine. On its fever-stricken sand-hills a nation's adoring love has been lavished. "Even Siva is unable to comprehend its glory; how feeble then the efforts of mortal men!"

The main characteristic of the religion of Jagannáth is its catholicity. It is catholic both as regards its worshippers and as regards its rites. In the former respect, indeed, it has fallen from its original purity, for the temple gates are now closed against unquestionable non-Aryans like the neighbouring hill tribes and the landless servile castes. But in theory, priest and peasant are equal in the presence of the Lord of the World. The rice which is offered to him is eaten by the lowest as well as the highest. In the latter respect the temple of Jagannáth is a pantheon of itself. Every Indian sect finds its worship represented within its precincts. Every form of Indian belief has contributed to the composite idea which Jagannáth embodies. "He is Vishnu, under whatever form and by whatever title men call upon his name."

Mr. Hunter devotes a chapter of much interest to the pilgrimages which form the most striking and characteristic feature of the worship of Jagannáth. The whole of India is divided into districts, which are allotted to the head abbots of the several monasteries which encircle the temple at Puri. Each of these ecclesiastics maintains a staff of pilgrim guides, who go from village to village throughout the district belonging to their chief, preaching pilgrimage as the means of liberation from sin. The monotonous life which the women of India lead renders them especially open to such exhortations. The guide usually visits a house when the husband has gone out to the fields, and by the time he returns the sermon has done its work. Of the bands of pilgrims which are daily arriving at Puri, not more than ten per cent. are males. The latter part of the journey is usually made on foot, and long before they reach the Holy City many of the weakest have died upon the road, while the rest are lamed by the rough roads or prostrated by some form of bowel-complaint. The guide does his best to sustain their resolution, and to prevent the retreat which would make his labours useless to his employer. Once within sight of Puri their pains are all forgotten. They hurry across the bridge, plunge into one of the sacred reservoirs, and then, after arraying themselves in fresh garments which they have brought with them, proceed to the temple. There the guide makes them over to the priest who employs him, and the round of the various shrines is begun. Every day the pilgrims bathe in one of the artificial lakes, and each evening they rush into the surf on one specially sacred part of the sandy shore. This same spot, the Swarga Dwára, the Gate of Heaven, is also the burial-place of generations of pilgrims who have died at Puri:—

Every evening the funeral pyres may be seen glancing across the water, while groups sit sadly round in the fitful light. Devotees from every province of India come hither to do the last office for a brother, or a parent, or a wife. I have talked to many pilgrims in this shrine of death; and so far as one man can judge of the inner life of another, some of them had drawn very near in their hearts to God. One little group came to bury their mother. They had journeyed with a pilgrim band from the far West beyond the limits of British India, and had visited the great shrines at Allahabad, Benares, and Gaya upon the way. They had done as much of their journey as they could by railway; but they had walked about 500 miles besides. The journey had taken three months. One-sixth of them had already died. But the oldest woman in the party, a brave up-country matron, had never flinched. She had constantly urged them forward, in order, she said, that she might reach the holy city before she died. The same day she arrived she prevailed upon the priests to conduct her to the temple, where she gazed in silent rapture upon the god. Next morning she fell ill. The other pilgrims began to recover their strength, but she gradually declined; and now her sons had come to burn her body on the sands. She had reached the gate of heaven at last. They laid down the bier at the edge of the sea, till the ripples wetted the vermilion-sprinkled yellow shroud. A green leaf had been placed in her girdle and another in her breast. Then, with all her ornaments around her arms and ankles, they laid her on the pile, and in a few minutes the forked flames flashed up into the skies.

Of the particular ceremonial which has made the name of Jagannáth so famous, the self-immolation of the worshippers at the annual car festival, Mr. Hunter finds no present trace. The whole spirit of Vishnu-worship seems to be opposed to it. Even accidental death within the temple is enough to make it unclean. "The ritual suddenly stops, and the polluted offerings are hurried away from the sight of the offended god." The religious literature relating to the festival makes no mention of it. Mr. Hunter is inclined to think that the ritual of Jagannáth may originally have included many ceremonies borrowed from the rival ritual of Siva, and that though these were probably excluded under the influence of Chaviana, the Vishnuite reformer, at the beginning of the sixteenth century of our era, the tradition of them has survived, and has served, together with the misrepresentation of Mahomedans, the credulity of travellers, and the piety of missionaries, to make the name of Jagannáth synonymous with organized self-slaughter." Besides this the incidents of the car festival have sometimes lent themselves both to suicide and death by misadventure. "In a closely packed, eager throng of a hundred thousand men and women, many of them unaccustomed to exposure or hard labour, and all of them tugging and straining to the utmost under the blazing tropical sun, deaths must occasionally occur. There have doubtless been instances of pilgrims throwing themselves under the wheels in a frenzy of religious excitement. But such instances have always been rare, and are now unknown. At one time several unhappy people were killed or injured every year; but they were almost invariably cases of accidental trampling. The few suicides that did occur were almost invariably cases of diseased and miserable objects who took this means to put themselves out of pain." If, however, the worship of Jagannáth is not chargeable with death by self-immolation, it is the cause of a vast number of deaths of a more ordinary kind. During their stay at Puri the pilgrims live on the boiled rice and other similar foods which have been cooked by the priests and presented to Jagannáth. This food being holy, every particle of it must be consumed, and as putrefaction sets in within twenty-four hours, much of it is eaten when in a state highly injurious to health. The houses in Puri are built on little platforms, beneath the centre of which is a cesspool. In a tropical temperature this is continually throwing off pestilential gases, for which the construction of the buildings afford no outlet. Into these houses the pilgrims are crowded with an utter disregard of comfort or health. Eighteen persons is the average to each house. In one room, measuring 20 feet by 12, forty-five persons were crammed. In another, measuring 13 feet by 10½ feet, with but one entrance and no windows, eighty persons passed the night. These statistics refer to the dry season, when great numbers sleep out of doors. But the car festival comes at the beginning of the rains, when no one will sleep under the open sky who can by any means of packing possibly find a roof under which to lie. Even the sufferings of the pilgrims at Puri are not so bad as their sufferings on the journey home. Every stream is flooded, and days sometimes pass before the ferry-boats will venture to ply. At night the villages in which they seek shelter are too small to give covered sleeping places to more than a fraction. The remainder "sit upon the wet grass, not daring to lie down, rocking themselves to a monotonous chant something between a whimper and a moan, through the long and dismal night." The very lowest estimate of the deaths from these causes in Puri and on the road puts them at ten thousand annually. Nor is this the sum of the mischief. Cholera can always be traced back to India, and the great source of cholera in India is Puri. "These overcrowded, pest-haunted dens around Jagannáth may become at any moment the centre from which the disease radiates to the great manufacturing towns of France and England." Yet what can be done to prevent this? Pilgrimage cannot be forbidden, and any efficient regulation of it would involve a very large outlay. This might be met by a sanitary tax upon the pilgrims, but for the probability that any such mode of raising money might be accepted by the natives, and would certainly be denounced by the missionaries, as a public recognition of idolatrous worship. It is true of Orissa, even more than of other parts of India, that "the ignorance, prejudices, and suspicions of the people on the one hand, and the vast demands upon the revenue for more visibly and perhaps more urgently needed public works on the other, do not leave sanitation a chance."

We take leave of Mr. Hunter with many of the subjects of interest with which his book deals still untouched. The account of the tenure of land in Orissa, which fulfils a promise given in his earlier volume "to set forth the rights of the various classes interested in the soil, from evidence collected from the rural records," deserves especially careful study. If we have any fault to find with these volumes, it is that the order in which the subjects are treated is not always a very obvious one. The history of Jagannáth, for example, which forms the third stage in the religious history of Orissa, is mostly given in a separate and earlier chapter, and only completed in the chapter in which it finds its natural place. But a mere defect of form such as this is no real drawback to the pleasure which Mr. Hunter's work will give to every reader who cares to see a great subject worthily handled.

THE GOLDEN LION OF GRANPERE.*

PERHAPS there is no disposition of mind more profitable to the novelist, at all events to one who sets himself to write a great many novels, than unflagging fidelity to his calling. There are occasions when lazy folks reckon observation, flights of fancy, attention even to pleasant congenial things, as work. Their notion of a holiday is rest to their higher faculties. In this mood the fairest material for a scene or a plot passes before their eyes without causing them one thought of making capital out of it. When they laid aside the pen, it was an understood thing, a bargain with themselves, that the relaxation should be thorough and unbroken. In strong contrast with such shiftless indolence stands the author of the Golden Lion of Granpere. If writing books is a métier, as we are told it is on high authority, Mr. Trollope is among its most indefatigable followers. With him it is a business never to be laid aside. It is no pleasure to him to turn his back upon it. But we are not therefore to suppose that he never takes holiday. We may fairly presume that business in its sterner sense did not lead him to Alance; but the thrifty use of opportunities, the readiness to make the most of what chance offers, is among the supreme delights of active minds. They dread a total cessation from labour. Once let the thread go, how can they be sure of finding the end again? To be idle is to lose self-respect. They feel with the poet,

* The Golden Lion of Granpere. By Anthony Trollope. London: Tinsley Brothers. 1872.

Perseverance, dear my lord,
Keeps honour bright; to have done is to hang Quite out of fashion like a rusty mail.

It is clearly no pleasure to Mr. Trollope to lie by, to leave his gifts to rust from disuse. No day must pass without a picture taken into the memory, a scene sketched out, some glimmer of a plot seized for future elaboration. The difference between his business and his holiday work lies rather in quality than quantity; in the one human nature is treated in its outside superficial aspect as a traveller sees it, in the other with the deeper insight of close study and experience. Where his personages lead a life and speak a language out of the range of this experience, he is content to be sketchy and general, to make his people love and hate as human beings according to his preconceived notions, without much attempt to qualify these operations according to country, or religion, or race. What so practised an observer sees he can report picturesquely. Given certain figures in costume, certain accessories, and the merest passing glimpse behind the scene helps him to arrange them into a semblance of foreign life and manners. But, in fact, there is no appearance in this story of Alsatian life of the author's knowing more of the mind, manners, and character of the Alsations than could be gathered by one or two days spent at an hotel a little out of the main route. It was not because of any peculiar attraction in the people, or of his interest in a critical political situation, but simply because he was there, that he laid his scene in this world-renowned province, his fancy possibly stimulated by some examples of a striking physiognomy. Every pretty girl is a possible heroine. Wherever she is to be found there are sure to be lovers, whether the scene lies in England or Alsace. This central figure in the "Golden Lion" is so far foreign that her calling and avocations have nothing exactly to answer to them in our own country. In other respects we should have thought her views of things were more those of an English Protestant girl than of a Roman Catholic Alsatian. We do not doubt, however, that Mr. Trollope has seen Marie Bromar dispensing soup to the guests of a table d'hôte; has noted her manners, half as equal, half as dependent, towards her uncle the host; has seen her get her meals standing, at haphazard, too busy to eat like other people; and finally, when the labours of the table are over, has seen her standing behind her uncle with her hands on his head, a situation certainly not English. We don't think he heard her tell him that she preferred regular meals to "picking and stealing," for that is out of the English Catechism. He has also caught what must necessarily be the accomplishments of an active, zealous, clever girl so situated, which, as a specimen of a first-rate education of circumstances, are worth enumerating:—

During the five years of her residence at Grunpere she had thoroughly learned the mysteries of her uncle's trade. She knew good wine from bad by the perfume; she knew whether bread was the full weight by the touch; with a glance of her eye she could tell whether the cheese and butter were what they ought to be; in a matter of poultry no woman in all the commune could take her in; she was great in judging eggs; knew well the quality of linen; was even able to calculate how long the hay should last, and what should be the consumption of corn in the stables. Michel Voss was well aware, before Marie had been a year beneath his roof, that she well earned the morsel she ate and the drop she drank; and when she had been there five years, he was ready to swear that she was the cleverest girl in Lorraine and Alsace.

Mr. Trollope has really got up all the duties of a waitress at such an hotel as the "Lion d'or" with a remarkable fulness of detail. Nothing is omitted that a curious traveller would see, who, recognizing the business of his intellectual life in every human being that comes before him, attentively follows every action, and traces it to its meaning. We are told how Marie brushes away crumbs, puts away bottles and dishes, locks up cupboards, keeps accounts; how it is pleasant to watch her eyes as she dispenses the soup, interprets the wants of the guests, notes the dirty hands of the boy assistant to be commented upon afterwards, and so on; but, after all, this does not convince us that Mr. Trollope can guess any the better for all these particulars what would pass between her and her priest as to the question which of her lovers she must choose and which throw over. And it is the same with the curé, M. Gondin. We have the outer man pretty distinctly before us, as he dines every Sunday a guest at the table d'hôte at the side of the Catholic hostess, and obeys the Protestant host's stipulation that he shall converse only on general topics. We rely upon Mr. Trollope in the matter of the clean collar put on in honour of the betrothal. We have no doubt he is strictly correct as to the blackness of the beard which is shaved at capricious intervals on Tuesday, Friday, and Saturday evenings, but which was very black indeed on Tuesday and Friday mornings. He may also be trusted to have read Madame Voss's mind correctly, who certainly would have wished that the good man should have himself shaved at any rate every other day; but this does not help him to any real knowledge of the relation between pastor and flock.

The management of the story strikes us as showing the same want of easy familiarity with the inner life and thought of the people whom Mr. Trollope deals with. We perceive a clash between the French and English modes of managing matrimonial affairs. Marie Bromar and George Voss get engaged to one another in English fashion, no opinion and no leave asked. She promises to be his wife on her own responsibility, without any apparent doubt of her right to do so; though of course she would not marry him against his father's wish. But the uncle disposes of her to somebody else, as though she were absolutely his possession, at first without consulting her inclinations, and then running violently counter to them. And she acknowledges his authority, and for a time submits to it. It is not easy for anybody out of France thoroughly to master this question; reading scarcely helps one to understand it; but there is an apparent inconsistency. A native would recognize a foreign hand in the plot. Tyrannical men, however, who will have their own way, belong to no country, and the uncle, Michel Voss, overbearing and yet kind and loveable, is a spirited delineation. There is this convenience in a plot depending on unreasonable caprice, that the complications of the story can be cleared up at any moment. Michel Voss is violently set on marrying his wife's niece to a linen merchant of Basle, to whom Marie is utterly averse, and he is equally determined that she shall not marry his son; though all the time he is excessively fond of her, and her loss to the "Lion d'or" will be irreparable, like the loss of his right leg, as he tells her. Of course there is no one point at which such unreasonableness should yield more than at another; it can last just as long as the author pleases, and come to an end when the paper to be covered approaches its last sheet. The one submission to the foreign code of duty, the one distinction between Marie and her sister heroines of British birth, is to be found in her personal devotion and duty being divided between her lover and her uncle. No English girl under Mr. Trollope's management would let the dearest uncle or father in the world come between her and the most worthless of lovers, if she had once given her heart and word to him. But Marie has lived in habits of submission. "Perhaps," it is observed, "it may be said of every human heart in a sound condition, that it must be specially true to some other human heart; but it may certainly be so said of every female heart, there is always one friend to whom the woman's heart is true, for whom it is the woman's joy to offer herself for sacrifice." This one being in Marie's case had been her uncle, and so long as she believed her chosen lover inconstant, she sacrificed herself to this elder idol. She is to be excused because she was not a highly educated lady. What Mr. Trollope says of the feelings of persons constantly occupied with material things is true to every one's experience:—

As is ever the case with those who have to do chiefly with things material, she was thinking more frequently of the outer wants of those around her than of the inner workings of her own heart or personal intelligence. Would the bread rise well? Would the bargain she had made for poultry suffice for the house? Was that lot of wine which she had persuaded her uncle to buy of creditable quality? Were her efforts for increasing her uncle's profits compatible with satisfaction on the part of her uncle's guests? Such were the questions which from day to day occupied her attention, and filled her with interest; and therefore her own identity was not strong to her, as it is strong to those whose business permits them to look frequently into themselves, or whose occupations are of a nature to produce such introspection. If her head ached, or she had lamed her hand by any accident, she would think more of the injury to the household arising from her incapacity than of her own pain. It is so, reader, with your gardener, your groom, or your cook, if you will think of it. Till you tell them by your pity that they are the sufferers, they will think that it is you who are most affected by their ailments. And the man who loses his daily wages because he is ill complains of his loss, not of his ailment. His own identity is half hidden from him by the practical wants of his life. Had Marie been disappointed in her love without the appearance of any rival suitor, no one would have ever heard of her love.

This rival suitor, poor M. Urmand, is the most ill-used lover that ever made sport for hard hearts. His outer man is at any rate a reality; the coat with the silk lining, the rings and jewellery, and scented hair. He really behaves with spirit; and, not having the aquiline nose which betokens command, he would, if she could have thought so, have made Marie a good husband. We have said that the story could be brought to an end at any moment; and in fact it comes to an end by Michel Voss having too much of the company of this unlucky aspirant, all of his own wilful and obstinate seeking. He is struck perhaps by the argument of his son—If you are tired of him in three days, what would Marie be, spending her whole life with him? But the complication need never have existed at all if the lovers had behaved with any truth to nature. Mr. Trollope describes a society occupied exclusively with things material; they are not people, we grant, with whom the pen is a very ready or eloquent instrument; but what lovers of that class, living less than thirty miles apart, and with nothing but that distance (easily traversed by inn-keepers) to part them, would be content to hold absolutely no communication for a year? The lovers whom we know as occupied with material wants are very resolute in their determination to meet pretty frequently. Our cook will not let her "young man" slip from her for want of the periodical visit. He would know himself to be an unworthy defaulter if he made no sign for a year. George, who at a pettish word from his father has sulked the year out, when he hears that Marie is really betrothed to another, finds the journey easy enough from Colmar to Grunpere just to "hurl his thunderbolt," and to tell her that on him her memory would be a blight all his life long. She who was to have been the joy of his life would henceforth be its curse, and so on. It is such things as these which prevent our feeling the same trust in Mr. Trollope in Alsace as we do when he is at home, where the feelings and habits of all classes are, so to say, at his fingers' ends. There is the stimulus of holiday work about it all; it requires more earnestness than he could put into the story to warn the reader into any strong interest in the difficulties of people who have one and all got themselves into the fix we find them in. Still Mr. Trollope's books are always pleasant reading; there is the touch of a master—hand even where the stroke is not in his truest and most confident style; his narrative is constantly enlivened by characteristic comments and reflections that come home, carrying his lightest efforts quite above the conventional novel. If we forget the story, there will still remain some flash of thought, some keen-eyed observation, to tell us that we have been engaged with an author worthy of the title.

THE SECOND PERIOD OF THE FRANCO-PRUSSIAN WAR.*

READERS of the Posthumous Papers of Rossel, which we lately reviewed (May 18, 1872), will remember the lively sketch which the unfortunate writer drew of M. de Freycinet, Gambetta's War Minister at Tours—the "grave, greyish-haired, tired-looking man, who was always engaged and always invisible," and who treated the would-be Napoleon of the hour simply as an additional place-hunter. M. de Freycinet has been charged with more than a single share in the blunders and extravagances which marred the only chance France ever seemed to have of turning the tide of the war, and it is but natural that he should come forward, not ostensibly indeed in self-justification, to contribute to the gathering materials of history which the French press is pouring forth. "Very erroneous versions," he says in his preface, "of the events of the later months of the war have been in currency. It seemed to me to be a duty to correct them, and to contribute to put historical truth on a proper footing." And this, he adds, he is the better able to do from having purposely kept clear of the storms of politics. The result lies before us in a closely printed volume of four hundred pages, containing, from the view of the War Office formed temporarily at Tours and later at Bordeaux, the whole history of the five months of struggle carried on under Gambetta against the tide of German victory.

It is hardly necessary to say that the friend and confidant of Gambetta, however well intentioned his designs as an author, finds it more difficult than he imagines to avoid all political allusions. The closing pages of his work might be read as the peroration of a speech from the Left in reply to those arguments which M. Thiers used the other day to enforce his doctrine of the necessity of a regular army as distinguished from an armed nation. This great subject must of necessity be left as a question for French opinion to solve. But the opening page of the preface equally displays the partisan spirit in which it seems inevitable that a Frenchman should discuss every matter of history. For M. de Freycinet here not only claims credit—as he is fairly entitled to do—for the long resistance made by the improvised forces of Gambetta to the victorious enemy, but proceeds to draw the usual contrast between their behaviour and the collapse of the Imperial troops in the first few weeks of the war, ignoring, as all the writers of his school are wont to do, the one fact so obvious to all the rest of the world—that it was not quite the same thing to face Von Moltke on the Moselle at the head of half a million of Germans with an inferior force, and to show front to a mere detachment of the same army on the Loire, whose operations were of necessity wholly subordinate to the covering of the siege of Paris behind it. Nor is the spirit more fair, or, viewing it historically, in the least more justifiable, in which he at the same point stops to condemn "the insensate policy which had lost us the sympathy of Europe—" the declaration of war presumably; forgetting, as the Republican party so conveniently are ready to do, how largely their own intrigues have to answer for the very policy which their advocates, now that it has utterly failed, condemn with an austerity ill suited to their warlike traditions.

But we must pass from the preface and peroration to the work itself. This may be divided generally for our purpose into three main portions. The first is concerned chiefly with the organization of the Republican armies created under the inspiration of Gambetta. The second describes their efforts for the liberation of France from the enemy. The third consists of M. de Freycinet's ideas as to the reconstitution of the military forces of his country. As the pith of the last may be summed up in the common party formula of universal compulsory education and universal compulsory service—which M. Thiers and, following him, France have decisively rejected—and as we find nothing novel in the way in which this idea is developed by our author, we take leave to omit this portion of the work entirely from our notice, which we shall confine indeed chiefly to the first.

We are disposed to agree with M. de Freycinet's general view, that the judgments directed on the shortcomings of the Gambetta armies do not sufficiently take into consideration the enormous difficulties with which their organizers had to contend. What these were can only be fully understood by such a survey as M. de Freycinet affords in the early part of his work. Taking the date of October 10, 1870, when Gambetta assumed the administration, our author shows us that the whole available forces outside Paris, Metz, and the minor fortresses consisted of less than forty thousand regular troops, and as many Gardes Mobiles, with about a hundred guns, many of which were in an unserviceable condition. These were disposed as follows:—Somewhat over twenty thousand men upon the Loire under Lamotteville were retreating rapidly before the Bavarians. Cambrils, with twenty-four thousand disheartened followers, was abandoning the Vosges to retire on Besançon. Finally, in the West, thirty thousand of the Garde Mobile, raw battalions of recruits, imperfectly armed and destitute of all proper staff, not to mention the absence of artillery and cavalry, were gathering about Chartres and Evreux in just such a thin cordon as the smallest disciplined force could break through at any selected point. The administrative means for improving this poor array into a national force were of the most limited order. The Government of Defence, wrapt up as De Freycinet tells us in the notion that the part of the provinces in the general struggle was of necessity to be wholly secondary to that of the capital, had kept at the latter three parts of the strength of the War Office. Two general officers and two colonels were the whole supply of practised functionaries on the personal staff of the Minister, and the nine subdivisions of his bureau were compressed into three for want of persons conversant with the routine business of the army. But the most striking proof of the indifference or hopelessness of the Trochu Administration as to what the provinces might do for the common welfare was to be found in the fact that not a single copy of the staff maps of the country was to be had for necessary strategic purposes, nor any register of the qualifications of officers. "War had to be made, therefore, without the map," says De Freycinet, "and cadres formed without knowing anything of the antecedents of those appointed to them." Such were among the direct results of the national habit of over-centralization, which presupposed all action impossible or useless that was not directed from Paris. In default of the common means of check, nominations to command had to be made by haphazard, and corrected by circumstances. As to the maps, the first obtained were reproductions laboriously made of a single set offered by a general officer's widow. But for the not less important duty of reconnoitring in the direction of the enemy, no regular Intelligence Department was created, it seems, until the struggle was nearly over, although individual spies (or agents, as they are euphemistically termed in the work) were employed with considerable success within the enemy's lines to bring isolated reports. It would seem, therefore, that M. de Freycinet had no adviser near him much wiser than the functionaries at Paris, of whom he justly complains.

Reviewing the general results of the efforts of himself and his subordinates in the large bureau which Gambetta's energy soon formed, M. de Freycinet sums them up in the statement that within four months—October 10 to February 9—there were formed and brought before the enemy no less than 600,000 men. Of these there were two hundred and eight battalions of infantry called regular, containing 230,000 soldiers; thirty-one large regiments of Garde Mobile, with 111,000; fifty-four regiments of horse, with 32,000; and 30,000 francs-tireurs, in units of various strength; besides artillery and engineers. In other words, men were actually raised and equipped at the rate of five thousand a day—a marvellous feat of the kind, little reassuring as are the results to the cool critic who studies them for his lesson.

Perhaps the hardest task of all that fell to M. de Freycinet's lot was the formation of what we should term, in the mistaken nomenclature adopted hastily for our imitation of it, the Control Department, or Intendance, for these gigantic forces. One sub-intendant represented the staff of the civil part of the army at Tours when M. Gambetta descended after his famous balloon passage. By dint of enlisting civilian functionaries accustomed to the business of purchase and distribution, and calling in all available intendants from the provinces, five branches were formed for transport, rations, clothing, medical stores, and accounts respectively; and the supplies of the force were henceforth accomplished by means of contracts. As of these M. de Freycinet tells us that they not only fed the Gambetta armies, but sent thirty millions of spare rations into Paris after the armistice, we are not too careful to criticize them closely. "Needs must" is probably the only rule that any administration at such a crisis could be expected to hold to, and probably the celebrated American fire-arms contracts were but full-blown specimens of the sort of business which M. de Freycinet's improvised bureau was supposed to check.

When we turn to the actual details of the war as told by M. de Freycinet, the weakness and the strength of a writer who has had large opportunities of gathering correct information, with no capacity at all for making use of it, are displayed upon the most cursory examination. Thus, to take a very well-known episode, the defeat of D'Aurelle before Orleans, M. de Freycinet gives us the circumstances with an accuracy and completeness which no writer on the French side has hitherto approached. But he does all this without being able at a single point to show clearly why the French design, which in theory was sound enough, failed so conspicuously in execution. The facts are that Prince Frederick Charles, finding the French before him not only strong in numbers, but bold, and in parts well led beyond his expectation, determined to avail himself for their overthrow of the better manœuvring power of his troops. The two armies were facing each other on January 1, on an extended front of nearly forty miles long, engaging irregularly at various points, not wholly to the advantage of the Germans. The XVIIIth and XXth Corps formed D'Aurelle's right, and lay well to the eastward of the great road through Artenay to Orleans. The Prince resolved to draw in suddenly the whole left of his line which had faced this corps, and attack with the force thus gathered the centre and left of the French before they could imitate his concentration. His orders were given early on the 2nd, and carried out at once, the Germans of the IIIrd and IXth Corps showing marching powers which draw admiration from the French chronicler. The strategy of the Prince was aided by the success of his right that day against Chanzy westward of the road, and the result of the next day's attack was that the French centre was pierced and driven violently back on Orleans, whilst the XVIIIth and XXth Corps were altogether separated from the bulk of D'Aurelle's army. All this appears plainly enough in the narrative of De Freycinet; but he seems quite unconscious that the disaster was not due to individual shortcomings, but rather to the general inferiority of the raw French troops and untried staff, who were obviously unequal to any sudden or difficult combination.

* La Guerre en Province. Par Charles de Freycinet, ancien Délégué du Ministère de la Guerre à Tours. Paris: Lévy, 1872.

The Operations of the German Armies from Sedan to the End of the War. By Major Hume, from the Official Head-Quarter Staff Reports. Translated by Major Jones, 20th Regiment, Professor of Military History at Sandhurst. London: King & Co. 1872.

So again, when we study his narrative of the miserable campaign of Bourbaki in the East of France, we find at every point the same ignorance of the calibre of the forces which marched under the ex-imperialist general to certain defeat, and of the true bearings of the events recorded. Werder's successful flank march to cover the lines of Héricourt before Belfort is spoken of as a retreat, and the action of Villersexel, by which he succeeded in preserving it unmolested, as a triumph for Bourbaki's arm. Its ill-success at Héricourt a few days later is ascribed to minor mistakes of detail in the movements against the lines held by the Germans; instead of being explained, as it should be in truth, by the utter want of discipline and fighting power in the host that Gambetta had mustered for this unfortunate essay. Finally, the practical destruction of Bourbaki's force by its being driven pell-moll over the border into Switzerland has its cause assigned by De Freycinet to the mistaken negotiation of Jules Favre; whereas his own narrative clearly shows that the French line of retreat was allowed to be cut, and escape from the Héricourt ground made impracticable, owing to military blunder the responsibility of which rests between Garibaldi and Bourbaki, who each blamed the other's inaction in allowing Manteuffel to pass between them. In short, as has been before said, no military deduction of M. de Freycinet's is anywhere to be trusted, however credible his statements of facts may be.

We turn with pleasure from this toilsome, yet unprofitable, compilation on the French side to the work of Major von Blume, which in its English dress forms the most valuable addition to our stock of works upon the war that our press has put forth. Major Blume writes with a clear conciseness much wanting in many of his country's historians; and Major Jones has done himself and his original alike justice by his vigorous, yet correct, translation of the excellent volume on which he has laboured. Our space forbids our doing more than commending it earnestly as the most authentic and instructive narrative of the second section of the war that has yet appeared. One obvious remark only shall here be made. The reader who studies it carefully will discover beyond any doubt that the relative value of De Freycinet's boasted levies diminished steadily as the war went on. We find the Germans, who at the outset conquered with difficulty at Forbach and Mars-la-Tour equal bodies of their enemies, triumphing under Prince Frederick Charles before Orleans four months afterwards, when they numbered less than two to three, overthrowing rather later under the same Prince Chanzy's forces at Le Mans with one-half their strength, and finally, under Werder, defeating decisively the attacks of Bourbaki with one-fourth of his number. For, as Blume sums up the lesson, it was Gambetta's fundamental error to suppose that to give arms to a great many men was to create armies. This mistake, he adds, the result of a false reading of the lessons of the Wars of the Revolution, caused the French Republic to suffer a defeat more terrible than even that of the Empire which it succeeded.

CHILDREN IN ART.

IN the four or five essays which compose this little volume Mr. Colvin has given an interesting sketch of a portion of a very curious and attractive subject. The freedom of art is a thing we often hear of; but the limitations of art are perhaps a more fertile and more instructive field of study. Whence come those arbitrary boundaries the passage of which forms the history of art? Why was landscape-painting impossible for centuries, although the power to paint had long been gained, and the love of landscape, the sentiment of nature, had reached more or less expression in literature? The natural range of the eye at times seems arrested, the hand becomes incapable of leaving the conventional line of curve, until they are suddenly set free by some influence of which the artist is unconscious. The truthful rendering of children by the painter and sculptor forms one of these strange developments in art. It is not strange that it was made; it is strange that men were so long in making it. Pleasure in the sight of childhood is certainly no new thing in the world's history; the impulse to draw or to model a child must, one would think, be natural to every artist; the originals are to be seen in every cottage and nursery; yet Mr. Colvin's phrase—"there is a sentiment, a susceptibility of the spirit, a mode of regarding young children, both with eye and heart, of which the dawn, as expressed in art, accompanies the dawn of the English school" (that is, is of little more than a hundred years' existence)—is, in the sense which he intends, literally correct. With certain exceptions which we will presently indicate, one may broadly say that no complete painting of children, no drawing them for their own sake and for the love of childhood, existed before Reynolds and Gainsborough revealed to art capacities which had lain dormant in her for centuries.

In these remarks, it is modern art which must be understood. Of all the period of Greek and Greco-Roman painting, from the time when subjects of common life began to be treated, we have no remains but a few damaged walls in Pompeii or the Palace of the Cæsars, a few vases, gems, and metal reliefs, saved at random from the enormous destruction which accompanied the Northern deluge. Yet this period of art, which covers long spaces during which productiveness must have been at its maximum, is one of five or six centuries—a period longer than that which separates us from Giotto. When we think of this, we see what a mere drop from the ocean has survived in the richest museums; we cannot resist the discouraging inference that it is impossible for us now to recover the history of ancient art. From our scanty fragments we may indeed conjecture that the Greeks, both in Greece itself and wherever through the whole Roman world their æsthetic influence extended, did carry art into what we should call many modern directions; but we can do no more than conjecture. It is a sad but an inevitable lesson that we learn when we turn our eyes from what survives of Hellas in books, or in works of art and architecture, to what we know once existed. Primæval man himself, during all the millennia through which we now faintly trace him, is hardly represented more barely and more sporadically than the centuries of that magnificent civilization.

With all this region, however, and what may be dimly seen of it, Mr. Colvin does not meddle. His essays begin the subject from post-Christian times:—

In what sense [he asks] were children taken; what artistic use was made of them by the old schools, and especially . . . by the divine school of Italy? It is evident that children may be taken either naturally as what they are, or artificially as types and figures of what they are not. A school may either regard and care about them in their common human relations, or refer them to other and more remote relations suggested by religion and imagination.

Starting from this point of view, the writer considers briefly the children who appear in the Holy Families of the Italian masters, and the later outburst of Cupids and ornamental amorini which accompanied the Renaissance movement. This part of the subject invites expansion. Mr. Colvin's remarks are good and true, but they demand a considerable acquaintance with Italian art from the reader. What is most striking here is the contrast or conflict in the painters' minds between the actual child they had, or should have had, before them as a model, and the high superhuman idea which they were, with more or less of the "vision and the faculty divine," endeavouring to express. On this point the primitive inexperience told severely. Where so difficult a class of models was concerned, no one could even approximately hope to unite the look of life with the look of Deity, unless he had reached considerable mastery over design and colour. Hence the Holy Children of the early religious art are for centuries much below the Mother in beauty and expression; and hence also, when once mastery was reached, they escape earliest, as it were, from the painter's idealism, and tend to become more human infants at play among the glorified group. Yet a purely "naturalistic" rendering is rarely if ever found; "the weight of prescription" has been upon the least inspired artist, or, if not, is imagined by the spectator. So again with the child-angels of religious art; and then with the amorini of the Renaissance; although here, of course, a different sentiment comes in. Mr. Colvin, although his language sometimes strikes us as too florid and complex, and his thought not always adequately rendered, has analysed this very well: tracing the immortal Aphrodité child of Greece, even during the first period of Christian art surviving in the Catacombs, to the age when "Cupid is himself again," and indeed finds from Correggio a glorification such as no existing ancient example approaches, in a certain tender and mystical beauty, united with the full play of energetic life. Then rapidly follows the decline, when figures of children, employed more and more for merely decorative effect, become one of the dominant mannerisms of Italian art. Readers will remember many a wall or canvas where the painter has put in a child, apparently because he could think of nothing else; until at last what should properly be the most fresh and natural element in art becomes precisely the most conventional and insipid. Albano and Fiammingo are leading names in this bad and empty style, which has long been the special favourite of wealthy and half-trained collectors.

From Italian art Mr. Colvin makes a long leap to English art of a hundred years since; giving a few paragraphs to the French and Dutch schools (to the last of which he is not always sufficiently generous), pointing out rather than attempting to solve the curious questions which we have stated above—why, namely, the drawing of childhood for its own sake is so recent a discovery, and why it was reserved in the main for English artists. This portion of the work is indeed one which would require a careful study of the character of the last and the preceding centuries in regard to life and literature, and would lead into many doubtful questions. Indeed we may say that a true history of the eighteenth centuries in England is now one of our greatest desiderata; we cannot expect it to be supplied as part of a special essay on art. Meanwhile we may briefly indicate the increased value which civilisation attaches to the life of the individual, and what may be roughly called the unfeudalizing influences of modern times, as among the motive causes which turned the art of Reynolds and Flaxman, emancipated from the restrictions of Italian religious and Renaissance traditions, towards the natural delineation of childhood. Here, however, we touch a point which Mr. Colvin has not handled. The first appearance of this branch of art must be traced to the portrait work of early Italy and Germany. Even in the strictly religious region some indications may be found; as in children occurring in the Florentine fourteenth-century frescoes, and in such child-angels as those whom Francia has placed at the foot of the Virgin's throne in his exquisite Bentivoglio picture at Bologna. Thenceforward, in Rubens, Rembrandt, Vandyck, Velasquez, and many more, we find renderings of childhood in which a wish to represent types of that age always increasingly grows upon the wish to represent an individual child's portrait. A little girl clinging to her father's dress, by Vandyck, in the Louvre, is an admirable illustration of this tendency. The same gallery contains another in the well-known Infanta Margarita, by the greater Velasquez. But the full and free outburst of this exquisite branch of art is of course found in our own Reynolds and Gainsborough. "By these two men," an earlier essayist in this field has remarked, "it was that the poetry of childhood was first felt, at any rate was first rendered in art" in its completeness. "They expressed this through portraiture, and have hardly attempted, like our later painters, to render the humours and graces of children; but, within the range which they selected, it is not possible to imagine a higher perfection in reaching the essential charm of their subject, a more truthful and engaging gracefulness." And we may add that, as Blake, Flaxman, and Stothard all followed Reynolds and Gainsborough, it is impossible not to consider them as artists who, with their own originality unimpeached, yet carried on and developed the course so splendidly begun. Reynolds and Gainsborough, in fact, are the creators of the "child of art," and, upon this view, no essay on the subject can be complete without a full consideration of their pictures.

In saying this we mean no disparagement to Mr. Colvin's book, which does not profess to be an exhaustive history, and which satisfactorily fulfils its professions. And we hope that the interest of what he has given us may attract attention to the subject sufficiently to render it worth while for the author and the publisher to recast the work in the form of a perfect monograph. In that case, let us add, the fading and unsatisfactory photographic illustrations (although, indeed, they are good specimens of that false fine art) should be replaced by engraving.

The three essays on Blake, Flaxman, and Stothard, which form the pièce de résistance of the book, are the most satisfactory part of it. These papers first appeared in a magazine, and here and there we find traces of the treatment natural to magazine-writing, both in the style and the matter. But on the whole they may be heartily recommended both to students and to general readers. Mr. Colvin here unites discrimination with that sympathy in the absence of which criticism deserves the shudder which it too often excites among the enthusiastic or the indolent. Besides giving a very interesting analysis of the peculiar qualities exhibited by the artists we have named in the region of child-design, he has carefully summed up their general value and position in art, and it may be specially noted to his honour as a critic that the magical attractiveness of Blake's genius, so strangely balanced between immaturity and perfection, has not seduced him from sobriety. Yet, though the illustrations to Blake's two early song-books deserve all Mr. Colvin's praises, we must own that we set Blake in this particular field higher even as poet than as painter. Rich as is the lyrical poetry of England—so rich, that it must, in our judgment, be decisively placed second to that of Greece alone amongst all Western literatures—it contains nothing in its way more perfect and more unique than some of the childless Blake's stanzas upon children. We could have wished to find room for a capital quotation from Mr. Colvin's essay on Flaxman. But we trust he will pardon us if the space be allotted to one or two of those lyrics, which, despite the excellent "Life" which we owe to the faithful care of Messrs. Gilchrist and Rossetti, are much less known than they should be.

The first is the "Nurse's Song":—

When the voices of children are heard on the green,
And laughing is heard on the hill,
My heart is at rest within my breast,
And everything else is still.
Then come home, my children, the sun is gone down,
And the dews of night arise;
Come, come, leave off play, and let us away,
Till the morning appears in the skies.
No, no, let us play, for it is yet day,
And we cannot go to sleep;
Besides, in the sky the little birds fly,
And the hills are all cover'd with sheep.
Well, well, go and play till the light fades away,
And then go home to bed,
The little ones leap'd and shouted and laugh'd,
And all the hills echoed.

INFANT JOY.

I have no name;
I am but two days old.
What shall I call thee?
I happy am:
Joy is my name,
Sweet joy befall thee!
Pretty joy!
Sweet joy, but two days old!
Sweet joy, I call thee.
Thou dost smile;
I sing the while,
Sweet joy befall thee.

If any reader, with a turn for verse, thinks this, as he naturally may at first sight, an easy style of writing, we would only say, let him just try! There is hardly a feat in literature, we believe, more difficult than that which Blake has here accomplished with an apparently effortless perfection.

CONINGTON'S MISCELLANEOUS WRITINGS.*

THE Memoir of his friend which Professor H. J. Smith has prefixed to the collected edition of John Conington's Miscellaneous Writings is, as might have been expected of a life so uneventful; a record of mental activity rather than of external incidents; yet it cannot fail to interest those who look upon the late Professor of Latin as one who may be said to have revived the due appreciation of Virgil, as well as the love of classical translation. A survey of his life and remains is sufficient to prove that this twofold and kindred aim was his métier and hobby; and that the more he discerned the existence of a field for poetic taste and achievement—secondary it may be, and not involving the highest gifts—in the reproduction of the master-poems of antiquity, the more entirely his labours took that turn, and set aside for it, to a very great extent, an earlier bias for critical and philological research. Though the volumes before us afford, in the "Epistola Critica" to Gaisford, and in the reprint from the Reinische Museum (1861) of an article on the second part of the "Fables of Babilus," sufficient proof that at all periods of Conington's life he was capable of critical efforts fit to win him a rank near our Parsons and Elmsley, and beside the best of those German professors who were fain to hear more of him on such subjects than he could find room for in the pages of the Edinburgh, it is notable that nearly two-thirds of his collected miscellanies concern, directly or indirectly, the question of translation, especially in its connexion with his favourite field, that of Augustan literature. To this a sort of stimulus is given in the first instance in the Essay on the "Poetry of Pupa," wherein the refinement of poetic style developed by Pope, and culminating with him, is paralleled with that perfection in the same line which Virgil and Horace alone represent in the Augustan age proper. To this also the Essays on "English Translations of Virgil," from the Quarterly, and on "Munro's Lucretius," from the Edinburgh, contribute in different ways; the one directly, the other by setting forth the grounds of the writer's preference for the perfect polish of Virgil to the rough, half-burnt marble of Lucretius. The same spirit animates, the same predilections underlie, the rest of the essays on Latin literature which go over earlier and later ground, as if to prove that to the Augustan development there exists nothing simile aut secundum: whilst, as if to stamp this as the chief design of the author's literary teaching, a prose version of the whole of Virgil's ascertained poetry is printed for the first time in the second volume. It is curious to inquire whence came this strong bias for a field of literary effort not generally deemed so high or worthy as that of conjectural and emendatory criticism; and the Memoir before us furnishes materials for the inquiry. We find in it that, before Conington left home for school, he had a thousand lines of Virgil in his head, and was an old hand at comparing translations of that poet with each other. His bent is discovered, whilst at Beverley School, which he left at thirteen, by his purchasing a copy of Sothby's Homer with Flaxman's illustrations, for 11. 15s.—a bargain no doubt, but a stiff price for the son of a Lincolnshire clergyman of obviously moderate means. At Rugby, to which he was removed, there were differences of opinion as to the amount of his general knowledge and his powers of thought and fancy. "The Doctor" rated these less highly than his gift of memory. His comrades gave him credit for imaginative and reasoning powers of a very high order. Possibly an imperfect sympathy between master and scholar may have had something to do with Dr. Arnold's estimate. Conington certainly seems to have been misunderstood by that great and able teacher in a matter of school police, if not of literary prowess. His one school scrape—which was, at the worst, non-interference with a mild lark of the fifth form—was visited with the loss of several places in the sixth, and with the penalty of translating the Second Book of Cicero's De Republica; a heavy penalty, it will be allowed, for a venial fault, and a piece of severity for which the Doctor should have been prescribed a course of reading in that genial satirist whose lessons of thoroughly human wisdom were the late Professor Conington's last work of translation. Readers may think variously of Arnold's subsequent intimation to Conington that he took, after a time, a less severe view of the matter. To us it seems that if Conington loved and revered the Doctor none the less to the end, a good deal of the credit is due to the admirable forgivingness and generosity of the boy-nature.

But possibly there may have been some ground for Arnold's estimate of young Conington's calibre. His early gifts certainly seem to have had memory in their front rank. A recollection of him when he first entered Oxford and read with Linwood, the great coach of University scholars and would-be classical Firsts, associates him more with powers of word-criticism and such scuteness in various readings connected with Greek chorus as would consist with an extraordinary memory, than with genius and fancy such as would be exhibited in brilliant composition. His skill and discernment in handling a vexed chorus of Æschylus seemed nearly, if not quite, on a level with his tutor's; his Latin prose and Latin verse did not then strike fellow-pupils as so conspicuously superior. Perhaps this may account for his total failure to obtain the Nowdigate for English verse, and, until after two attempts, to win the Latin verse; though it must be admitted that he got in one year the Ireland and the Hertford, in which composition, original and translated, counts of course for much. Our own theory is, that the gift which was strongest in Conington, that of interpreting a favourite epoch of classical authors, both by translation and by commentary, slumbered during the early period of his academic career, and that until his Latin Professorship fixed his aims and objects in 1854, there was an even chance of his going down to posterity as another emendator of Æschylus, born to clear the way for a few curious divers into critical depths, and not—as it happily turned out—as the interpreter to a very much wider range of readers of the distilled salt and sweetness of the great Augustan poets. Up to the turning point which we have indicated, there is as much of disappointment as of satisfaction in tracing the scholar's career—his failure in the effort to exchange the Oxford cloister for the Inns of Court, his temporary connexion with journalism, for success in which Professor Smith thinks his mind was too timid and too prone to balancing, his return to the University, and his resolve to settle down at literature. Of this period Conington gives his own interesting reminiscences in a letter, long afterwards, to Mr. Courthope:—

* Miscellaneous Writings of John Conington, late Corpus Professor of Latin in the University of Oxford. Edited by J. A. Symonds, M.A., late Fellow of Magdalen. With a Memoir by H. J. S. Smith, M.A., Fellow of Balliol, Savilian Professor of Geometry, Oxford. 2 vols. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

I was miserable till I found my métier—kept wasting myself in efforts which I could not myself approve or get others to approve, and at last, in despair, I returned to scholarship as something which I knew I could do, though as my world widened I had come to despise it as inadequate. Now I am reaping, I hope, the reward of those turbid years in a way that I had ceased to expect. I find that, though I cannot write any original verse, I can translate well enough to make it worth while continuing to do so. But this came to me, as you know, "longo post tempore."

The work of the intermediate period was, it is true, progressive and not retrograde. The edition of the Chorophora is more faultless and memorable than the Agamemnon, though the latter had an English version annexed. But Conington's happiest years of work synchronize with his Virgilian labours, and the opening of a field for them through his Corpus Professorship. The winter of his discontent became a glorious summer to last for the rest of his days, whilst, as he worked at Virgil, he grew more and more weaned from the depreciatory criticism of that great poet which had been common in his early years, and learnt to feel all that sympathy with his art and genius which breathes in his lecture on the style of Lucretius and Catullus as compared with the poets of the Augustan age. Herein, more than in his religious opinions and feelings, more too than in his sympathies with University reform, which were liberal up to a certain point, consists the interest of his life; his vocation being to advocate and illustrate "the thorough word for word scrutiny of each work of a favourite author," not merely by professorial lectures, but by commentaries and translations, realizing the fullest idea of mastery of a given ancient author. Beginning the commentary on Virgil in 1852, he lived to publish two of the three volumes, and—with Mr. Nettleship's assistance—to have got well forward with the third. Our pages have from time to time done justice to this important work of scholarship, and it is pleasant to find Mr. Conington in one of his printed letters not only expressing his sense of this, but also promising to supply—what had been hinted at as an omission—"an examination into Virgil's place in literature" at the close of the work. Pari passu with his commentary he was wooing his old love of translators and translation. Not long after the publication of his first volume of the Virgil commentary he won a large measure of critical approval by his translation of the Odes of Horace. In 1866, three years later, he published a version of the Æneid in octosyllabics, which, as Mr. Smith truly states, "conveys to English readers a just impression of the movement and life of the whole poem, and of the continued variety of its cadences, as well as some faint echo of its pathetic undertones." We accept, too, as fact, and not as the language of partial testimony, the statement in p. xlv. that "the book has been a favourite with the world at large—with the virgines and pueri—and probably has been read through by some who never did as much for any other original or translated epic."

In 1868 Professor Conington published a Spenserian version of the last twelve books of the Iliad, a task undertaken at first at the request of Mr. Philip Worsley on his death-bed, but one the charm of which so grew upon him that the labour of love became, before it was finished, in every sense a pleasure. Lastly, in 1869, the year of his death, he published a version of the "Satires, Epistles, and Ars Poetica of Horace," worthy to be read, for pleasure's sake, beside that of Mr. Theodore Martin, whilst for penetration of the deeper vein of Horace it has no equal. Mr. Smith thinks that this work has attracted comparatively little attention, and that the fault lies not in any defect of the translator's wit, or quickness to realize the flavour of the original, but in a certain arbitrariness on the part of the reading public. We have no notion what the sale-gauge might show as to the much or little appreciation of this volume, but we are certain that its merit is very high. A successful imitation of Cowper's style, with a greater infusion of colloquialisms; a system of introduction of compensatory points, the ratio of which is pointed out in pp. lxiiv.-v., and which, within due bounds, cannot but give strength and life to translation; a wise alternation of closeness and paraphrase, are the constituents of a work which, if it failed to obtain unanimity of applause at the first, is not the less sure to win and retain steady literary favour. We make no apology for quoting Mr. Smith's account of Professor Conington's method in that practice of translation whereby "he became an interpreter of the ancient world to his own generation in a larger sense than he ever could have been as a mere commentator":—

He used to learn some couple of hundred lines of his original by heart (if indeed they were not already present to his memory) and then work out his version in his head, sometimes in hours regularly set apart for the purpose, but often at odd times, as in a solitary walk, or on a railway journey, or before he rose in the morning. He used in this way to get through his work with great rapidity, sometimes not writing down each batch of verses till it was quite ready for the press.

The deeply interesting details of his religious searchings at one period of his life, and of the nature and end of his last illness, though rightly communicated by the biographer to the reader, are beyond our province; but it is simple justice to point out, what a wise selection from Professor Conington's correspondence sufficiently shows, how nobly and affectionately he created and sustained a personal influence with younger men during the whole course of his professorial life. With them he worked heartily, not in the academic routine merely, but in the intercourse of vacation and relaxation. They will know better than any outside observer what he was to his own circle of intimates. Judged by others, it is possible that he might be found wanting in the quality of fun and humour, and credited instead with a primness and formality which are not in truth inconsistent with his canons of literary composition. Capable of rising in criticism, had he chosen, to heights neighbouring those of Bentley or of Porson—capable, as he shows himself in a noble passage in his Inaugural Lecture (pp. 219-20), of realizing and describing the attitude of the true scholar—he seems to have shrunk from handling, as those great critics did, the trenchant weapon of ridicule; he held even the darts and shafts of pleasantry to be a trifle undignified. One sees this where, in his able and appreciative criticism of Munro's "Lucretius," he finds himself constrained to notice that pleasant scholar's "neglect of literary conventionalities," and maintains that modern criticism "ought to express itself after the manner of English literary precedents; and that an editor of the Classics ought to aim at a style as classical as that of the Historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, to study the critical manner of a writer like Hallam, and even at times to dress himself by the glass of Lord Macaulay" (p. 237). It is conceivable that some readers may be found to adopt this over-starched view; yet it is not the less certain that the freshness and even eccentricity of style which, caught from the elder critics, enlivens Professor Munro's notes, is no bad viaticum wherewith to journey through an ancient classic without tiring. Some allowance may be claimed for diversities of taste.

As connected with the moot question of maintaining the ascendancy of the classics in our schools and colleges, Mr. Conington's essay from the Contemporary on a "Liberal Education" deserves as careful study as his golden words on the academical study of Latin. His essays on "Early and Late Roman Epic and Tragedy" are the nucleus of that history of Roman Literature which Mr. Conington might so well have written, and which some one, sooner or later, must arise to write. Those on English Literature, on Pope, and on Shakespeare's Lear and Hamlet, bear witness to the qualities and habits of mind which a classical training specially develops and forms. The pièce de résistance of the second volume—a prose version of the Duolices, Georgics, and Æneid, which was designed for the eventual complement of the author's Virgilian labours—is memorable as a graceful and sonorous whole, in which flaws are so scarce that we have described none in the space of some dozens of test-passages. In some future notice of Virgil's coming translators we may have occasion to recur to this valuable prose version; at present we can only thank Mr. Symonds for having included it in the range of his ably fulfilled task.

DR. GLADSTONE ON FARADAY.*

THERE will scarcely, it would seem, be any likelihood of failure or stint, within the limits of the present generation at least, in the affectionate interest which flingers round the scientific services and the personal worth of Faraday. We have had the eloquent and glowing éloge of Professor Tyndall, and the more copious, if less lifelike or stirring, volumes of Dr. Bence Jones, not to speak of well nigh countless minor memoirs or notices in memoriam. Throughout the continent of Europe, and wherever in East or West science has made itself a centre and a home, witness has been borne to the gains which his rare genius has brought to the general knowledge of nature, and to the blank which his loss has made painfully felt among the cultivators of physical truth. Of the testimonials to his memory which have come to us from abroad we have had perhaps the most typical specimen in the éloge of Faraday by M. Dumas, the eminent chemist, at the Paris Academy of Sciences. Here the rivalry engendered by zeal in a common pursuit is subdued and lost in admiration for a character which, in its modesty and self-forgetfulness, had a spell against every power of jealousy or ill-will. The utter absence of self-interest, the unconscious subordination of all mercenary or ambitious motives to the advancement of truth and the benefit of society, was a feature in the moral aspect of this consummate philosopher to be best appreciated by those whose special studies led them along the same track of discovery, and to whom he was for ever holding out an ungrudging hand as fellow-traveller, counsellor, and guide. The simplicity of his heart, his candour, his ardent love of truth, his cordial interest in the successes and his ingenuous admiration of the discoveries of others, his natural modesty in regard to what he himself discovered, his noble soul, independent and bold—all these gifts combined, in the fervid language of M. Dumas, with unsurpassed powers of intellect to give an incomparable charm to the nature of the great physicist. Among foreign esavants we might point to M. A. de la Rive as one who has dwelt in the most appreciative spirit upon the methods of investigation most characteristic of Faraday's genius, together with the spirit of truthfulness which, like a talisman, seemed to ward off every danger to which his mighty gift of imagination might expose its master. An exquisite scientific tact, like a presentiment of the possible, kept him from straying into what might prove false or fantastic. Hence it was that what seemed like dangerously leaving the beaten track and giving the rein to the imaginative faculty, futile or harmful as it might be in the case of mediocre minds, frequently led to vast and valuable results in the case of Faraday.

* Michael Faraday. By J. H. Gladstone, F.R.S., F.R.E. London: Macmillan & Co. 1872.

It is the strong sense of personal relation between the writer and the subject of his biography that gives its special value to Dr. Gladstone's recent volume of reminiscences. Containing little of new matter, and far from being a model either of literary style or of philosophical thought, this short memoir would otherwise call for scarcely more notice than many an ordinary magazine article, for which lowly and transient destination it appears to have been in the first instance intended. Intimately associated however as the writer was for years with one so consummate, not only in experimental work but in the intuitive flash which his genius seemed to throw into the dark places of nature, there could hardly fail to be impressed upon the mind of his assistant and pupil something that to the outside world might speak of the master, might carry on his teaching, and reflect the glory of his intellect. To be trained under the discipline and in habitual contact with the methods pursued by the first of experimentists, seems to have been felt as a privilege, and as a plea for any amount of hero-worship. If the result of a certain veneration even for the ground trodden by his master is to throw a halo of disproportionate or exaggerated light over the pettiest details of act and speech, it may be urged on behalf of Dr. Gladstone that simplicity and the absence of stirring events were the conditions of life set by the character itself which forms his model. It is only by multiplication of slight traits and unstudied indications that a personality so averse to display, so absolutely unconscious of self, is to be realized to the eyes of the world at large. A life more baffling to the efforts of a biographer it would be difficult to conceive, owing even less to its uneventful flow than to the equable and undemonstrative temperament which pervaded it throughout. The same thing may be said of that which by common consent formed the ground of Faraday's intellectual glory—his method of working. Brilliant, never failing, almost unique, as it seemed to the eyes of the beholder, he was himself probably the least conscious of its secret, the least able to analyse and define its logic. Although Faraday was not a mathematician, we have the witness of one of the first of mathematical physicists, Sir W. Thomson, to his power of divining the results of mathematical investigation. Moreover, what has proved of infinite value to mathematicians themselves, he has given them an articulate language in which to express their thoughts. The whole language of the "magnetic field" and "lines of force" is Faraday's. The chapter in which Dr. Gladstone brings together the concurrent testimony of experts in many cognate branches of science, the most expressive and valuable portion of his book, abounds in proof of this faculty of reasoning by an implicit rather than a conscious or an avowed method. Faraday's power of appreciating an a priori argument was weak compared with his rapid and intuitive grasp of facts. "I was never able," he tells us, "to make a fact my own without seeing it, and the descriptions of the best books altogether failed to convey to my mind such a knowledge of things as to allow myself to form a judgment upon them." If Grove, or Wheatstone, or Gassiot, or any other friend, told him a new fact, and wanted his opinion either of its value or its cause, or what evidence it could give on any subject, he never could say anything until he had seen the fact. For the same reason he found himself unable to work, as some professors do most extensively, by the agency of students and pupils. All the work had to be his own. This peculiarity was in no wise due, we may be sure, to any lack of imagination, a faculty in which Faraday was supreme among men of science. It was more closely connected with what Mr. Mallet, illustrating his meaning by an anecdote personal to himself, terms an experimental instinct. It grew out of his ineradicable love of truth. Not that he looked upon a fact as a hard, isolated, or soulless thing, or that he placed himself before his apparatus without a preconceived idea of what was to be elicited from its use. It was simply that the precision which forms a main element in science had for its safeguard with him an instinctive caution which led to his verifying every step from first to last. Then, his intermediate scepticism overcome, and his conclusion made clear to his eyes, he would maintain the new truth, if need be, against the world. "The thing I am proudest of," were his words to an associated labourer, "is that I have never been found to be wrong." And though this boast is taken by his biographer to hold good only of the early part of his scientific history, there is no doubt that the rarity of his mistakes was something wholly beyond example in the records of physical discovery. M. de la Rive goes the length of questioning whether Faraday was ever caught in a mistake. Still, if not absolutely true, this eulogy does scarcely more than justice to the exquisite balance which the wariness of Faraday's judgment at all times kept with the hardihood wherewith he would enter upon the pathway of experiment.

Of the value of Faraday's discoveries, into which Dr. Gladstone enters in his closing chapters, it is impossible to form a definite estimate, whether from the point of view of strict science or of the impulse they have given to industrial and commercial interests. Time only can set bounds to the claims upon the gratitude and reverence of mankind which grow out of the discoveries freely given forth by him, without a thought of personal interest or reward. Warned by Davy that science was a mistress who paid badly, he deliberately made his choice, and never grew cold or niggard in his service. Not that he at any time, after getting fairly into work, felt the pressure of penury, or was straitened in any of the necessities of life. The modest official stipend which he pronounced adequate to his positive wants was eked out to no inconsiderable extent by private work, not to speak of the pension which was all but forced upon him in 1835. In 1830 his gains from chemical analyses and other professional engagements amounted to 1,000*l.*, and in the next year to much more. Of what Faraday might have made by turning to profit his brilliant series of discoveries, were it only that of the evolution of electricity from magnetism, or that of specific inductive capacity, the germ of electro-telegraphic enterprise, the fortune amassed by any individual inventor furnishes no adequate conception. Without claiming for himself the actual parentage of the telegraphic system, or taking a share in its practical development, he was ever ready with hints and tentative processes in aid of the new enterprise. Delighting in the name of "philosopher," as a lover of knowledge for its own sake, and familiar as perhaps no other man has ever been with the primary and ultimate forces of nature, he could leave it contentedly to others to bring down and apply to practical use those varied elements of power which lay in magnetism and electricity, heat and light, gravitation and galvanism, chemical affinity and mechanical motion. His great reward lay in every successive burst of light which made clearer his favourite thought that these various forces were the changing forms of a Proteus, which he ever sought to grasp in its unity and its individual shape. Dr. Gladstone pictures him with sparkling eyes and quickened breath dancing round his magnets when the coiled wire gave signs of an electric wave, or coronated with sparks; when he saw what had always been looked upon as permanent gases liquefy like common vapour under the constraint of pressure and cold; when his electro-static theory seemed to break down the barrier between conductors and insulators, and many other barriers besides; when he sent a ray of polarized light through a piece of heavy glass between the poles of an electric magnet, and on making contact saw that his plane of polarization rotated, or, as he said, the light was magnetized; and when he watched pieces of bismuth, or crystals of Iceland spar, or bubbles of oxygen, ranging themselves in definite form and figure in the magnetic field. In his speculations on matter and force, on the nature of atoms and imponderable agents, it was his aim in his maturer works to purify his mind more and more, in the words of Helmholtz, from everything that is theoretical and that is not the direct and simple expression of the fact. It is just in this direction that he is recognized by the same high authority as having exercised the most unmistakable influence upon the science of his day, first of all upon English physicists.

There are not many particulars that Dr. Gladstone has to add to what previous biographers of Faraday have been able to furnish of his personal history or of his preparatory training. We notice one point which is new and full of interest, as upon it may have turned the whole of his subsequent career. From some remarks made by Faraday himself to Lady Burdett Coutts, it would appear that his introduction to Davy was due to the agency of M. Masquerier, the artist and émigré, who lodged with the youth's master Ribau, and who, struck with young Faraday's intelligence and zeal for learning, had both given him lessons and found him employment. It was through this recommendation, when Davy was suffering from the injury to his eyes from an explosion of chloride of nitrogen, in October 1812, that Faraday became his amanuensis, though only, as he himself has stated, for a few days. The ice thus broken, it would be an easier step on the part of the young aspirant to science to press his suit for employment, which placed him in the post of assistant to the great chemist. From the Corporation of the Trinity House Dr. Gladstone has derived many details of the services rendered by Faraday towards the improvement of the lighthouse system, with especial reference to the electric light. The few anecdotes which he has brought together from sources not hitherto available combine to set in a more striking light than ever the strong sense of duty, the singleness of character, and the sweetness of temper which, blended with consummate powers of intellect and unswerving fidelity to truth, raise a Faraday to the foremost rank among those whom mankind have venerated and loved.

THE JAPANESE IN AMERICA.*

THE opening of Japan to the Western races suggests a number of curiously interesting questions. The peculiarities of a civilization which has grown up in such complete isolation may be expected to present many instructive points of contrast and resemblance to our own. Though we have learnt much about the Japanese, there is still a wide field of investigation for competent observers. But though we are always glad to know what any intelligent person has to say about Japan, it would perhaps be still more interesting to know what intelligent Japanese have to say about us. What do they think of our religion, our social and political customs, our newspapers, railways, manufactures, and a thousand other things which to them are entire novelties? They seem to be so inquiring and intelligent a race, and have so much originality, that their suggestions might perhaps be useful to ourselves, but might at any rate be expected to reflect a great deal of light upon the persons who make them. The book, therefore, which we are about to review is very attractive in title and in its external aspect. It consists of three parts; the first gives an account of the reception of the Japanese Embassy in the United States; the second consists of a collection of essays written by Japanese students in America; whilst the third is a kind of small blue-book upon America, prepared under the direction of the Japanese Minister at Washington and intended for circulation in Japan. Here, then, is an attractive bill of fare; and we begin to read in the hope of enjoying the rare treat of seeing ourselves—for from the Japanese point of view the differences between Englishmen and Americans vanish—as others see us, and thereby discovering how far others are capable of appreciating our many virtues and talents.

The first section of the book is from this point of view decidedly disappointing. It describes the reception of the Embassy at San Francisco, at Washington, and at various ~~places~~ <sup>cities</sup> by reading the "superb banquets" which ~~crosses~~ <sup>crosses</sup> which were made on citizens, and ~~very well~~ <sup>very well</sup>; but we feel that it does not shed much light into Japanese character. There are few less stimulating kinds of reading in the world than official reports of State ceremonials; and even when the hosts are stern Republicans and the guests representatives of a strange Empire, hidden until recently in the mists of primeval darkness, the chief remark that occurs to us is that every State ceremonial is remarkably like every other. The Chief Ambassador remarks with the utmost propriety that "commerce, following in the path of our first friendly relations, has been an active agent in drawing our respective countries nearer together in the strongest bonds of friendship"; and retails a few more platitudes as decorously as if he had been a member of one of the Royal families of Europe performing his regular duty in receiving deputations. The Vice-Ambassador afterwards takes his turn, and goes through the list of the various improvements introduced into Japan, in a series of remarks for all the world like a Queen's Speech at the opening of Parliament. And so the chapter goes on to the reception by General Grant and the House of Representatives, and the "splendid social entertainment" provided by the Hon. James Brooks. It is all very proper, and we dare say that the entertainments and receptions were not a greater bore than usual at the time when they occurred, but, to say the truth, we had rather be excused from reading about them.

We therefore turn, in the hope of better things, to the students' essays. It seems that there are at the present moment two hundred Japanese students at different colleges in the United States who are eagerly occupied in assimilating Western knowledge. Mr. Mori, the Japanese Ambassador, is naturally regarded by them as their protector, and they are in the habit of sending him essays as proofs of the progress which they have made. We are told that none of them have been studying English for more than five, and many of them for not more than one or two years, and that the essays are therefore remarkable proofs of their ability to write what the editor is pleased to call "good Anglo-Saxon." We should have been glad to receive a rather more distinct statement as to the fidelity with which these essays have been reproduced. That they are not substantially altered is indeed plain enough, but we have some suspicion that mistakes in grammar and spelling may possibly have been corrected. If not, we must admit that the Japanese students have really shown remarkable skill in acquiring a foreign language so different from their own. Though the essays are for the most part boyish enough, and make no real pretensions to literary merit, they are almost entirely free from downright blunders in language. We are the more inclined to think that the work has been faithfully reproduced, because the power of imitation is most singularly developed in other respects. The Japanese students have adopted not merely the language but the thoughts of their teachers; they write so distinctly from an American point of view that it is difficult to remember their foreign origin. Many of the essays, we strongly suspect, are little more than attempts to reproduce the lectures which the authors had been attending; and, with two or three exceptions, we are unable to detect anything that can be called exclusively Japanese. We take at random an essay written by a youth called Enoué, on the strength and weakness of Republics. He sets out with just the set of commonplaces that one might expect from nine kids out of ten at an American college. The Declaration of Independence and the French Revolution, he tells us, have upset the old doctrine of the Divine Right of Kings, and "the whole political heaven is charged with Republican electricity. The explosion will come sooner or later... despots tremble on their thrones," and so on. Then we are told how equal rights and the power of the meanest citizen to rise to the highest honours of the State are a great source of strength in Republics. This proposition is illustrated by the vigour displayed in the First Revolution by the Jacobin Government of France. The same moral is deduced from the late American war; and from the devotion excited by Washington. Turning to the other side of the question, Franklin is quoted to prove that Republican Legislatures are often selfish. Their forms again involve a want of energy in war, for which reason the Romans created the office of Dictator. Finally, demagogues do a great deal of mischief, as is proved by the case of Alcibiades. It is plain that this is a mere schoolboy essay, which it would be absurd to criticize. The odd thing is that the young Japanese has become so thoroughly imbued with Western ideas that he does not make a single remark bearing in any way upon Japan, and his illustrations are all drawn from European history. Every word might have been written by a lad in a middle-class examination in England to whom Japan was as unknown as London is to the Japanese.

The same is true of most of the other essays. In one or two, however, we catch sight of the real human being. Mr. Mori, it appears, has rather unnecessarily, as we fancy, censured the students for making sarcastic remarks about America, for fear of producing unkind feeling. Americans are touchy, as we know to our cost, but surely they could bear a sarcasm or two from a Japanese student in a college essay. However this may be, one or two of the writers have been allowed to express their feelings. An essay on "The Practical Americans" is an attack on the dollar-worship of the country, which is expressed with a good deal of vigour, and says the author, "very sensible remark. Though the Americans, send missionaries to teach the wretched heathen to be good, and at the same time send a company of practical men who show their practicability by extracting the riches in every way, and, when they could, by cheating those men whom their fellow-countrymen undertake to teach—to be what?—to be good!" Yet even in this bit of satire we must confess that there is not much originality. The Japanese student is in fact only repeating the remarks which he has read in American or English books, without giving them any special colouring. It is perhaps characteristic that the prejudice against missionaries which appears in the last passage finds expression more than once. The students speak respectfully of Christianity, and one or two of them would appear to be Christians. The others do not, for obvious reasons, admit that the Christian religion deserves to be regarded as the sole embodiment of truth, but look at it pretty much after the manner of Chunder Sen. This kind of enlightened toleration of Christianity, however, does not extend to the missionaries. Mr. Toyama addresses a very smart letter to "the gentlemen of the Missionary Societies," requesting them very emphatically to stay at home. Toyama argues, as some people have done on this side of the world, that it is absurd to talk about "free religion" on behalf of priests whose only object is to enslave people by playing upon their ignorance. This is pointed at the Jesuits, but he is careful to explain that he does not think much better of the Protestants. He sums up his remarks by saying that he objects to sending out missionaries, "because they are both the fathers of ignorance and the enemies of free religion. On this question depends the whole future of our countrymen. It depends on the issue of this question whether they are to become the Eastern Irishmen or the Eastern Yankees." Another curious essay by the same student describes a visit to a Roman Catholic church. He admires the music, but regards the sermons and ceremonies from a somewhat Voltairian point of view; and he winds up with the following paragraph, which is the most epigrammatic piece of writing in the book:—

From what I saw and heard I shall always believe Mr. Preacher when he says that his church alone has stood firm and unchanged, because it was shocking to imagine that it ever was or can ever be any worse. But, to tell the truth, it is my greatest desire that these Churches will not change, at least while I stay in this country, because henceforth, whenever I may get homesick, I will go to one of the Roman Catholic churches and feel that I am in one of the dear Buddha temples of far-off Japan.

Mr. Toyama is evidently a very clever fellow. The others may at least boast that they have learnt to write English remarkably well, and have assimilated, even too completely, the ideas of the surrounding medium. We are still, however, almost as far off as ever from obtaining any clear answer to the question, What do the Japanese think of us? We turn therefore in despair to the last lecture. Here we have a statistical account of the United States, of the political and social institutions, the rate of wages, the price of land, and a number of other interesting matters, which is indeed a very respectable compilation, and appears to be sensible and impartial enough when it ventures into expressions of opinion. It has, however, the peculiarity, which for our purpose is slightly annoying, that it tells us not what the Japanese think of America, but simply what an American thinks the Japanese would like to know about America—which is a very different thing. And thus we close the book with a sense of general disappointment. The students' essays are curious, though chiefly as illustrating the Japanese talent for mimicry; but the rest of the book, though not exactly worthless, is certainly not worth reading by any English inquirer into the Japanese mind.

* The Japanese in America. By Charles Lanman, American Secretary to the Japanese Legation in Washington. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

DEAN STANLEY ON THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.*

SCOTLAND and Religion are a conjunction which would seem in popular opinion to portend danger and disaster to whoever shall rashly come in its way. Most men would have shunned it with a lively terror; Dean Stanley has faced it manfully, and treated it neither in fear nor hatred, but in all Christian kindness and sincerity. Yet even among Scotsmen he has found praise and sympathy in many quarters, and tolerance in nearly all. In this phenomenon strangers may see that Scottish fanaticism is not the grim wild beast it is often taken for, and the opportunity is perhaps a good one for an examination of the real elements of that peculiar religious spirit which has reaped for Scotland so much homage from some and so much censure from others.

For one thing, indifference is not very ill used in Scotland. The "Laodicean Latitudinarian," as he is termed, whatever may have been his fate of old, is let alone at the present day. Strangers who have had opportunities of mixing in Edinburgh with good and scholarly society have returned with their minds enlarged by several novelties, and especially they have been put right if they had ever nourished the notion that every Scotch gentleman is a grim fanatic. The indignation of the zealous sort does not alight upon the "parens deorum cultor et infrequens," but on the worshipper of false gods. To rouse the Scotsman you must be zealous, but zealous in the wrong direction. If you are lukewarm, you are merely no participator in the blessed lot which awaits him. But if you seek that lot in another way than his, you are the wolf getting into the sheepfold, and must be manfully withstood. Among the gentry of Scotland there is much less religion than among the English of the same class. The laird is an adept in purely secular literature. He has his bookcases filled with the works of Hume, Gibbon, Voltaire, Diderot, Bayle, and other heterodox teachers. He never goes to church save for some secular purpose or etiquette, and partakes not in "sacring ordinances." His excuse is that he is Episcopalian in his leanings, and that there happens to be no church of that denomination within a reasonable distance of his mansion; but it is well known that he shows no excessive zeal in the reparation of his losses when his opportunities are improved. His gardener is also a man of knowledge in his way, knows a little Latin perhaps, and is deep both in the practice and the science of horticulture. He belongs to the United Presbyterian connexion, and of course he would give notice at once if he were asked to pluck a basket of strawberries on "the Lord's Day." Yet by him, and such as him quite independent of the laird, that laird is respected. And the odd part of the matter—and what shows the danger of dealing with such questions in mere blacks and whites—is that, if the laird joined the United Presbyterian persuasion and stood as an elder at "the brood at the kirk door" receiving the halfpence of his gardener and the other devotees of that thoroughly evangelical denomination, he would probably not be so much respected, even by its members, as he is while yet unruggerate and walking in the Valley of the Shadow of Death. His conduct would be looked on—as unconsciously felt, let us rather say—in the way in which the conduct of a gentleman is felt when he takes advantage of any cheap enjoyment, made cheap that it may be within the reach of the poor. In Aberdeen, the Northern stronghold of Episcopacy, there was a small chapel called St. Paul's, which to preserve itself from the penal laws against the nonjurors had managed to attach itself in some mysterious manner to the Establishment of England. It was a dingy temple, hiding itself from scrutiny "down a close." But it was the place of worship of the county gentry, who were Hanoverian, but not Presbyterian. It used to be noticed that on occasion of a general charitable collection this one "chapel," as it was termed, contributed more than all the other churches of the city, Established or Dissenting. It was the assembly of the rich, and they were the assemblies of the poor.

No one perhaps has so clearly brought out as Dean Stanley the peculiar antagonism, the spirit of protest and of independent action, that has pervaded all vital expressions of religious influence in Scotland. It is exemplified in this instance. The poor man had a comforting self-satisfaction in his religion, and if he could have searched his heart with impartiality he would have found that much of that satisfaction came from its being a peculiar possession of his own in which his rich neighbour did not participate. That neighbour had his wealth, his luxuries, his social position and power; but Lazarus had something better than them all in a sort of investment in the next world. Then there was in all this the gratification of the national banking after independence. How could this be more emphatically exhibited than when the landlord and the tenant, the master and the man, went off in opposite directions at those points where the most vital interests of mankind were represented?

There was wisdom in that saying of a foreigner referred to by the Dean, that the religionists of Scotland are not men but parties. The practical exemplification of this lets us see how the religionists have kept so much fiery matter within them, and yet could deal with the world outside in a calm, vigorous, and tolerant fashion. The "Secession" left the Church of Scotland early in last century, not because they had adopted a new revelation, but because, as they maintained, the Church of Scotland had departed from "the good old ways." Speedily the Secession in Scotland broke into two bodies about an oath to be administered to members of corporations, and there was "the Burgher Secession" and the "Antiburgher Secession." A transverse section divided each of these bodies into two, in such wise that there were "the New Light Burghers and the Old Light Burghers, the New Light Antiburghers and the Old Light Antiburghers." All these were too much occupied in a cross fire of anathematization among each other to trouble the rest of the world. There is a story of a parcel of schoolboys getting into a church or meeting-house belonging to a Burgher connexion. The bawler or "kirk officer," seeking to restore order, has caught a ringleader, whereupon there comes an infantine cry from a corner, "Hit him hard, hit him hard, his feyther's an Antiburgher." If it is difficult to suppose intolerance taking a more humble and paltry shape, it is also difficult to suppose it taking a more harmless one.

We do not believe that in any work, whether historical or expository, by a native Scotch ecclesiastic, the characteristic features of the religious changes and revolutions in Scotland have been so clearly and forcibly expressed as they are in this book. It is the privilege of the stranger to give the most expressive portrait of a people's aspect, but to take advantage of his opportunity he must be endowed with knowledge, acuteness, and the power of description. The effect of the Dean's clearness of description and contrast is to impress one strongly with the secularity of the causes which have always been at the root of the peculiarities of religious activity in Scotland. At the beginning of the book there is a point of separate interest, the question whether anything has recently come to light to support the story told by Bede of the relic of Roman Christianity which subsisted for a short time in Galloway under the pastoral supremacy of St. Ninian; and it will be of importance to those who hold that there is such confirmation, to read and consider the Dean's commentary on some early Christian monuments figured in Dr. Stuart's Sculptured Stones of Scotland. Of the more substantial and permanent planting of the Church through the mission of St. Columba we have the following sketch:—

A council of the Irish clergy had met and driven him forth as an excommunicated outcast. In the council—so runs the story—was one of the two mysterious Irish saints who bore the name of Brendan. Saint Brendan, when the excommunicated man appeared in the council, rose up and embraced him. The whole council burst into exclamations of horror. "You would be as I have done," said Brendan; "and you would never have excommunicated him, if you saw what I saw."

Such excommunicated men have been seen in Scotland and in England often since. They may be seen at this moment in Rome, in Paris, and in Munich. There was a freedom and justice in this old Celtic conception of true greatness, which even at this day we have hardly obtained. Columba is not the only excommunicated man who, to the eyes of the truly discerning, has had beside him angels, and before him a pillar of fire. Brendan was right in thinking, "a pillar of fire before him and the angels of heaven beside him. I dare not disdain a man predestined by God to be the guide of an entire people to eternal life."

It is a story which comes with instruction. His career remains a glorious proof how the ban of the visible Church against the moving spirits of mankind may turn out to be vanity of vanities. Whatever the shortcomings of Columba, St. Brendan was right in saying, that we cannot afford to "disdain a man predestined to be the evangelist and apostle of such a nation as Scotland."

The other recollections of Iona are of a later age. The Martyrs' Bay—the white beach opposite to Mull, which derives its name from the massacre of the natives by Danish pirates, is the spot on which the funeral processions from the surrounding islands have disembarked their mournful freight, and placed them on a rude mound at the curve of the shore. Thence they were borne, kings of Scotland, kings of Norway, lords of the Isles, to the cemetery consecrated by the neighbourhood of Columba's bones, but deriving its name from his companion of dubious fame, the indignant Oran. It is the oldest regal cemetery of Great Britain—before Dunfermline, before Holyrood, before Westminster, before Windsor. It is further the most continuously ancient cemetery of the world. In none other have the remains of the dead been laid through an unbroken track of one thousand three hundred years, beginning with Columba and his companions, ending with the shipwrecked mariners of a few years ago.

And as it is the most venerable cemetery of the Celtic race, so also is it marked by that singular characteristic of Celtic countries—the union of tenacious reverence with reckless neglect, which only within our own time the care of the present owner, worthy of the precious possession entrusted to his charge, has endeavoured to rectify and prevent. With Oran's cemetery ends the true historic connexion of Iona with Columba. The cathedral of Iona, with its Norman arches, carries us both by its style and its name to a region far removed from the first Celtic missionary. The architecture tells of its origin from the half-Norman Margaret, under whose auspices the royal funerals were transferred from Iona to Dunfermline, indicating the transfer of sanctity from these western islands to the seat of Lowland government. The name of "cathedral" tells how far the Church of Scotland had, in the fourteenth century, drifted away from the days when the abbot of Iona was supreme over the Hebrides, and when no episcopal chair had constituted any Scottish church into a cathedral. But of that long mediæval history of Iona nothing, or next to nothing, has come down to us. The last historic picture which the sacred island presents us is but within fifty years of Columba's death, when the French bishop Arculf, driven by stress of weather on his return from the Holy Land, found a refuge in the humble tenement of the Abbot Adamnan, and where Adamnan took down from his mouth the only description of Palestine that exists before the fall of the Roman Empire and the Saracenic occupation. We see, as we read the disjointed record, the traveller telling, the abbot questioning, till the whole story was at last recorded in its present rude form.

It was not till the close of the eighteenth century that the fame of Columba once again attracted to these distant shores a pilgrim from the world of letters, as illustrious as ever was drawn from regal or episcopal thrones—and that the Holy Island received a new canonization in the immortal sentence which now springs to the memory of every educated Englishman when Iona is named:—"We were now treading that illustrious island which was once the luminary of the Caledonian regions. That man is little to be envied whose patriotism will not gain force on the plains of Marathon, or whose piety will not grow warmer among the ruins of Iona."

* Lectures on the History of the Church of Scotland. Delivered at Edinburgh in 1872. By Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, D.D. London: Murray, 1872.

In the ninth century Iona was wrecked and plundered by the Norsemen, who found it on their way to Ireland, where they were establishing a principality with Dublin as its capital. From this period to the Norman Conquest of England there was little religion in Scotland. The priesthood were a selfish, luxurious, half secular class of men, called Culdees. What property the Church had got was becoming lay property, either by the lapses of these men or the aggressions of the lay aristocracy. The only prince on record as a benefactor of the Church seems to have been that exceedingly notorious miscreant Macbeth. It would be hard to find in Scotland any trace of that millenary frenzy which swept over Europe as the period of the first thousand years of Christianity was drawing to a close, though its influence was so powerfully felt in England as one of the great promoters of the Norman Conquest. By this event, to be sure, the revival spirit passed on to Scotland, but by a sort of reactionary influence, when Margaret, the sister of the English Atheling, married King Malcolm. The subsisting relics of the old English Court—the Court sanctified by the just departed Edward the Confessor—became a part of the Court of Scotland, now brought its sanctity with it. It will be seen with clearness and point in the Dean's description how the English spirit ruled and recast the Church of Scotland, until the Battle of Bannockburn set adrift everything associated with "the old enemies of England." Ever after that period, it is no bad rule in estimating the motives at the root of all political action in Scotland to attribute it to enmity with England. But there came in upon the growing hostility towards the old Church other influences equally secular and more substantial. It has been said, in words which the Dean's courtesy to his audience would not have permitted him to use had they occurred to him, that the Reformation was carried because the aristocracy wanted to take the wealth of the Church, and the Covenant was carried because they wanted to keep that wealth. At the same time the determination not to be ruled from England gave great assistance to the baser motive; the people would be Presbyterian, or anything, rather than accept the Service Book and the canons dictated to them from the head of the English Church. After the Restoration the same spirit took even a wilder and fiercer shape. Scotland was then well tired of fanatical explosions, and would have sat down in peace with any moderate religious code, provided it had been self-suggested. But again English prelacy was to be thrust on them, and this time not by threats, but by the actual thrust of the bayonet. True, it was their own factious politicians rather than Englishmen that conducted the persecution; but it was English in tone and origin, and the people were too infuriated to see it in any other light. To the spirit thus raised to fiery heat at the time of the Revolution we owe much of the fanaticism which Scotland has since nourished in her bosom; and perhaps to the abundance of secular elements in the causes of that fanaticism we may be indebted for the agreeable peculiarity that the fanaticism has not been so mischievous as other fanaticisms have been—that, to use a common Scotch expression, "its bark is waur than its bite."

The Union of 1707 in a curious manner fixed the existing conditions of that year as a perpetuity. Scotland was cooling down from the hot passions of fifteen years earlier. There was a considerable Episcopalian feeling throughout the country. Presbyterianism, however, had still the working majority. The Union could not be carried save through this majority, particularly as it represented the anti-Jacobite Lowlands. Accordingly it fixed down its conditions very firmly, and it may be said that it is owing rather to the good faith of England in keeping to its obligations than to the later conditions of religious feeling in Scotland that the Established Church is Presbyterian. We conclude with Dean Stanley's description of the externals of these conditions as a characteristic specimen of his gift of picturesque generalization. Our readers will not fail to observe how completely the rival meeting of the Free Kirk Assembly has slipped out of the picture:—

The very first declaration which the Sovereign makes—taking precedence even of the recognition of the rights and liberties of the English Church and nation, which are postponed till the day of the coronation—is that in which, on the day of the accession, the Sovereign declares that he or she will maintain inviolate and intact the Church of Scotland. That which was signed by Her Majesty may be seen in the Register House of Edinburgh, and has the peculiar interest of being the first signature of her name as Queen. There is a large blank left, in the doubt which was then not yet solved, whether one or more of her names would be used, and the single name therefore stands—alone of all her signatures—in a space too ample for the word; and immediately following comes, after the signature of the Princess of the Blood Royal, the name of the dignified and cautious Primate who then filled the see of Canterbury. In the Act of Union itself, which prescribes this declaration, the same securities are throughout exacted for the Church of Scotland as were exacted for the Church of England; and it is on record that, when that Act was passed, and some question arose amongst the Peers as to the propriety of so complete a recognition of the Presbyterian Church, the then Primate of all England, the "old rock," as he was called, Archbishop Tenison, rose, and said, with a weight which carried all objections before it, "The narrow notions of all Churches have been their ruin. I believe that the Church of Scotland, though not so perfect as ours, is as true a Protestant Church as the Church of England." No Scotsman, no Englishman can see the meeting of the General Assembly in Edinburgh without feeling that it is the chief national institution of the northern Kingdom. No other ecclesiastical assembly in the realm meets with such a solemn and distinct recognition, with such a pomp and circumstance of royalty, with such a well-ordered and well-understood tradition of rights and privileges and duties.

What is thus legally acknowledged receives a yet further confirmation in the common parlance even of unwilling witnesses. It is sometimes the custom of English Churchmen and Scottish Episcopallians to distinguish in Scotland between "the Church" and "the Kirk," meaning by the former the Episcopalian and by the latter the Presbyterian system. It is difficult to imagine a more complete testimony to the national character of the Presbyterian Church than this surrender to it of the true Scottish name of the Church itself. The "Kirk," whatever the word may mean in English, in Scotland means "the Church," as truly as Eglise in French, or Chiesa in Italian. To speak of the Presbyterian community as "the Kirk," and the Episcopalian community as "the Church," is in fact to say that the Presbyterian community is the national Church of Scotland, and the Episcopalian community an offshoot of the Church of England.

MARY HOLLIS.

THE time of Charles II. is one well fitted to furnish the scenery for an effective historical novel, though perhaps hardly for an edifying one. In the coldest, driest, most matter-of-fact account it is still full of dramatic situations and picturesque contrasts—a sort of historical fancy ball, where the old Commonwealth man and the old cavalier, the politician and the courtier, the beauty, the patriot and the fanatic, jostle each other in quaint confusion. The Puritan fervour and piety in the heart of the nation crop out strangely here and there amid the general profligacy. Great political interests, matters on which the fates of England and of Europe turn, are mixed up with the base intrigues of rakish men of fashion and languid-eyed Sir Peter Lely beauties. In short, there is material enough for a religious, a political, and a sensational novelist rolled into one.

The author of Mary Hollis has caught this idea of the many-aided character of the Restoration period, and has worked it out with great elaboration, though we cannot add with great success. The novel is a translation from the Dutch of Mr. H. J. Schimmel, and may perhaps have suffered somewhat in the process of rendering into English; for the spirit of familiar conversation will evaporate even in the best translation; but in the present case we question whether there ever was any to evaporate. The translator, however, should have known that the son of a baronet is not a "young nobleman," and that "I am informed you have been brought up in the country quite different from what you are now" is not elegant English. But the main faults are inherent in the story. Mr. Schimmel has not, indeed, succeeded ill with some of the purely political characters, especially with that of his great countryman, William Prince of Orange. The story opens in the year 1670, some months after the signing of the secret Treaty of Dover, whilst William was paying a visit to his uncle in England. The picture of the silent and uncourtly young man, whom nobody knows whether to consider merely as an unmannerly and backward lad or as a cunningly reserved politician, is the best thing in the book. The author has treated him con amore, and made him one of the very few likeable personages of a story which mainly turns on the intrigues and counter-intrigues of the Duke of Buckingham and the rival favourites Barbara Palmer and Louise de Querouville, of whose company we have a great deal more than is pleasant. Vice may be as dull as virtue; and though it is generally supposed that Buckingham relieved his bad qualities by the brilliancy of his wit, it would appear, from a perusal of the present romance, that during that period of his life in which he was brought into contact with Mary Hollis he permitted himself to be absolutely stupid. He is, however, eminently useful in setting all the puppets of the piece in motion. We first become acquainted with him as one of the traditional two horsemen of romance, benighted in the woods between York and Leeds, and finding shelter in Hallam Castle, the abode of Sir Henry Digby, a baronet of the ancient cavalier school, and his haughty and managing wife, whom Buckingham not unjustly terms a "vixen." The pair have an only child, Charles, a youth arrived at the age of twenty-three, who rebels against being set by his father to read the Book of Sports, which the author evidently conceives to be an edifying and bulky work of King James:—

For Sir Henry, the royal book was an infallible one, and he wished the contents of it to be acted upon by the Castle. He recommended the "Book of Sports" to all his family and dependants, and had again this evening handed it to Charles, his son and heir, after which he had fallen asleep.

Charles, being, as he says, "deadly tired" of the book, in a pet flings it upon the floor, exclaiming, "I will not read. D'ye hear? I will not." At the heavy fall, Lady Digby is roused from her spinning, and as her son does not obey her command to "pick it up," she "gave Charles a box on his ear with the book, and cried out most imperatively, 'You shall read; Sir Henry said you should.'" This is not the sort of usage that a baronet's only son commonly receives from his mother; and it is not wonderful that Charles, groaning under this tyranny, finds it necessary to have a confidant for his sorrows in the shape of pretty Mary Hollis, the Nonconformist preacher's daughter.

Charles Digby and Mary Hollis both become objects of great interest to the Duke of Buckingham, who secretly pities the lad when his parents order him off early to bed, and is so struck with his good looks that he murmurs to himself, "A fine fellow!"

* Mary Hollis: a Romance of the Days of Charles II. and William Prince of Orange. By H. J. Schimmel, Author of "Lady Carlisle." 3 vols. London: John Camden Hotten.

Upon my soul, Madam Carwell would not be able to resist him." Upon this idea the Duke acts. He takes the handsome young Digby to Court, in the hope that he may attract the Duchess of Portsmouth sufficiently to excite the jealousy and anger of the King—neither a pleasant idea for a story nor a dignified position for a hero. The process by which Charles Digby is placed under the patronage of the Duke is in itself as monstrously improbable as anything can be. Sir Henry detests Buckingham, though only knowing him by reputation; but his guest, the object of his aversion, who has given his name simply as "Mr. George," assures him ironically, "Nobody hates the Duke of Buckingham more than I do"; and when, still keeping his name concealed, he pledges his word that he is "a nobleman, a peer of the realm, and a member of His Majesty's Privy Council," the Digbys are easily persuaded to entrust their son and heir to this stranger. And so the Duke, having vetoed a proposal of Lady Digby's to send the chaplain with Charles, rides off to London with his new-made protégé.

As for Mary Hollis, all readers of experience can guess that when Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, is introduced in a story, his business is to form designs upon the heroine. Aided by a slender stock of religious phrases, he first attempts to pass himself off as a Puritan; and on being discovered and turned out by Jacob Hollis, revenges himself by means of Sir Henry, who in his capacity as Justice of the Peace rides gallantly out at the head of the Royal dragoons from York to scatter a prayer-meeting. Considering that dragoons, or indeed regular troops of any kind, were scarce in England during the reign of Charles II., especially before the Tangiers garrison had been brought home, the ease with which they are obtained is remarkable. As Sir Henry blames His Majesty's Ministers for not sending him a company of infantry, it is plain that he does not share the dislike and suspicion with which most country gentlemen then regarded a standing army. The luckless Jacob Hollis, who has already lost his ears in the Star Chamber, is lodged in gaol, in the same cell as a felon sentenced "to die on the wheel"—we should think it was more probably on the gallows—while his daughter, on her return from visiting him in prison, is seized by agents of the Duke of Buckingham; and thus the pair of lovers are safely conveyed to London, Charles to be pushed at Court, and Mary to be immured in one of the Duke's houses. This last feat is a dangerous one, and is considered as such even by the dne dame entrusted with its execution; for "he was well aware that a case of abduction was a flagrant transgression of a Bill lately passed, of the 'Habeas Corpus Act,' so much valued by every Briton who estimated [sic] his individual liberty." Dick Wharton's knowledge is the more remarkable, as the Act thus referred to was not passed till nine years after the date of the story; this foreknowledge, however, and his peculiar ideas as to its scope, are shared by others—by Lord Shaftesbury, and by a virtuous and patriotic ironmonger of the name of Wilkins. As for the scene between the Puritan maiden and the wicked Duke, its most striking incident is copied from the scene between Rebecca and Brian de Bois-Guilbert, with the difference that the Templar never fails to express himself with dignity, whereas Buckingham under similar circumstances can utter nothing more impressive than "Mary!—no suicide." After having made her escape, Mary is taken up by Lady Castlemaine, and introduced to the King, under the pretext of assisting her to obtain a pardon for her father, who, however, obligingly dies just as the desired favour is about to be granted. Now begin the marvels of the book. The demure Puritan dame, who, to do her justice, is at the time ignorant of the name and position of her grand patroness, is taken, in the costume of a Catalonian aldeia, to a fancy-ball, where she captivates the monarch. His repeated visits do, indeed, at first disconcert and annoy her:—

But His Majesty's respectful demeanour, the serious conversation which she had with the monarch of the United Kingdom, a conversation which he not only tolerated but provoked, caused the idea to dawn upon her that she, the humble, insignificant country-girl, that she, the martyr's daughter, might become the instrument in God's hand of converting an awful sinner.

To young Digby, who points out the dangers of her course, she replies, "You have so far forgotten the history of God's people as not even to remember what was once done by Judith," explaining, however, that instead of carrying out the parallel by killing the King, she wishes to make him live. With the great case of Gifford Gillfillan before our eyes, we doubt whether any true-bred Puritan ever appealed to the Apocrypha with so much reverence. But her success is for the moment amazing. The King leaves off his evil ways, applies himself seriously to business—especially when she reads his State papers—and, climax of wonders, sends an order to the hitherto reigning favourites to quit the Court. The courtiers whisper and sneer:—

Not anything more important had occurred in the United Kingdom since the execution of His Majesty Charles I. Every one was most impatiently looking out for the dinner-hour; but, alas! His Majesty did not appear. The King had given orders to be served alone in his closet. New hopes were fixed upon the evening reception, but once more in vain. His Majesty wished to pass the evening in quietude.

"His Majesty is becoming independent," whispered one of the courtiers, with a significant nod to his neighbour.

"Suppose we call upon Miss Hollis," replied the other, with a bitter smile. But again they were disappointed. Miss Hollis did not receive anybody.

We remember how Mr. Peggys saw "a pretty Quaker woman" holding serious discourse with the King, he "arguing the truth of his spirit against hers; she replying still with these words, 'O, King!' and thoud' all along." But Puritan country-head Mary Hollis, whom the King describes to the scoffing Buckingham as "an angel in the shape of a lovely woman, a Madonna, as gentle as a lamb, as sensible as a bishop," leaves the pretty Quakers far behind. She dwells in Whitehall, severely arrayed in black velvet, and Lord Shaftesbury and William of Orange come anxiously to seek for her co-operation. That her virtuous influence is of short duration, and gives way before the united efforts of Buckingham and the ladies she has ousted, may be easily foreseen.

As for young Digby, he obtains a commission in "the Life Guards, and develops rapidly. He gambles recklessly, drinks deep, is introduced to the highest society, including that of the Duke of Monmouth, whose name, by the way, was not John Scott, and who could not on any hypothesis have spoken of the Prince of Orange as his nephew. Justifying Buckingham's opinion of his attractions, Digby becomes the favourite of Lady Castlemaine, and the object of a tender passion on the part of the neglected Queen Katharine of Braganza. Mr. Schimmel does not err on the side of refinement. No attempt is made to veil the utter scampishness of Digby and his associates, male and female. On the contrary, the author seems to have a delight in dwelling upon what artistic feeling alone should have told him would be better only hinted at. The stupid coarseness of the young cavaliers who rally Digby upon his success with Lady Castlemaine may be lifelike, but it is neither entertaining nor improving. As triumphant in war as in love, the hero is victorious in two duels; the second, in the cause of Mary Hollis, being fought with his former patron Buckingham. This scene is intended to be very effective, the encounter taking place by moonlight and in the snow, the combatants still wearing their fancy dresses—an idea evidently suggested by the well-known picture by Gérôme. For this exploit Digby is lodged in the Tower, whence he is delivered by Mary, who later on again steps forward to save him—this time by a falsehood—from the consequences of lifting his eyes to the Queen. After this, Digby, having come off with the loss of his commission, settles down at Hallam, ard, in spite of vehement parental opposition, marries Mary Hollis, who "had gradually divested herself of her prejudices and sickly notions about God and the world in which she lived":—

Once even, when Charles, after a hard day's labour, had kissed her pure unsullied lips, she had gone so far as to confess to him what she had so often said to herself: "How good it has been for us to see life in London!"

Which, considering the nature of Digby's life in London, shows a great advance in liberality and breadth of opinion on Mary's part. As for the Duke of Buckingham and the Duchess of Cleveland, poetical justice is dealt out to them through their perfidious ally the Duchess of Portsmouth, who fools them both, and reigns thenceforth sole monarch.

Whatever may be the author's talents, they certainly do not lie in the way of sparkling conversation. The chief praise we can give to the story is that, compressed and put into verse, it might make an effective libretto for an opera. Dissipation, when represented in drinking choruses sung by cavaliers somewhat unsteady in their gait, amid the flying of champagne corks, the clinking of glasses and the rattle of dice, tells well on the stage. A long and dull fox-hunting scene, introduced apparently to show off the Prince of Orange's riding and the author's knowledge of the points of a hunter, would give an opening for a fine "Tally-ho" song accompanied with cracking of whips. Jacob Hollis, and Mary upon occasion, might be provided with religious music; the Queen, Lady Castlemaine, and Mary have all love-scenes in different styles, while the last heroine has no less than three striking and sensational situations to appear in. But, considered as a novel, we can only say that the translator has unconsciously described it in a note explanatory of the nature of the Grand Cyrus, a work to which the Duke introduces Mary, and by which she is much scandalized:—

A wearisome and long-winded romance by Mademoiselle de Soudré, very popular at this period, and which would be more likely to send any fair reader of the present day to sleep, than to offend her by its want of refinement.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday Mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsagent, on the day of publication.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 88 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Communications relating to Advertisements should likewise be addressed.

Now ready, VOLUME XXXII., bound in cloth, price 16s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also, Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

ON POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 870, JUNE 29, 1872:

The Last of the Indirect Claims. French Finance.
Mr. Disraeli at the Crystal Palace. Parties in the Venetian Assembly.
The Mass Regulation Bill. Spain. Law Officers. Bethnal Green.

Originality and Plagiarism.
Parish Constables. London as Summer Quarters.
Variety in Religion. Who Pays for It? The Pope's Last Manifesto.
Lady Lecturers. The Fiji Islands. Habitual Drunkards.
The Italian Opera.

Booe's Royal and Republican France. Orises.
The Golden Lion of Granpre. The Second Period of the Franco-Prussian War.
Children in Art. Conington's Miscellaneous Writings.
Dr. Gladstone on Faraday. The Japanese in America.
Dean Stanley on the Church of Scotland. Mary Holbe.

CONTENTS OF No. 869, JUNE 22, 1872:

State and Church in Germany and Italy. The Geneva Arbitration.—The New Ballot Bill.—France.—Parliament and Private Bill Committees.—The French Commercial Treaty.—The Scottish Educational Bill.—The Case of Milano.—The Builders' Strike.
The Tyranny of Custom.—The Alfred Milnerian Dinner.—The London Season.—The National Schoolmaster.—The Right of Veto in Papal Conclaves.—Pablo Proscutors.—Funeral Sermons.—Road and Rail.—Law of Husband and Wife.—Racing at Ascot.
Margaret Duchess of Newcastle.—Maurice's Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy.—Hutchinson's Crayon and the Carpathians.—Wine.—Fignier's Day After Death.—Minor Poets.—Bazaine's Army of the Rhine.—The Story of a Shower.—American Literature.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—NATIONAL MUSIC MEETINGS.

The First Series of these Annual Meetings, instituted to encourage Competition in Practical Music, are now in progress. Prizes of the aggregate value of £1,500 will be awarded by eleven juries of the most distinguished Musicians. A portion of the money proceeds will be allotted to the Royal Academy of Music and to the Royal Society of Musicians. The remaining Competitions and Performances will take place as follows:—
On TUESDAY, July 2, Choral Societies not exceeding 80 voices, Military Bands, and Bands of Voluntary Musicians will severally compete, commencing at One P.M. A Grand Concert, including Competitors, at Half-past Four.—Admission, 1s.; Reserved Seats (available for Competition and Concert), 2s. 6d.
On THURSDAY, July 4, Competition for the Challenge Prize, value £1,000 (Class I. above of 100 Voices). Choral Societies for Men's Voices, and Bands of Regiments of the Line will severally compete, commencing at One P.M. A Grand Concert, including Competitors, at Half-past Four.—Admission, 1s.; Reserved Seats (available for Competition and Concert), 2s. 6d.
On SATURDAY, July 6, The Ceremony of Distributing Prizes will take place at Three o'clock, to be followed by a Grand Vocal and Instrumental Concert, including the Competitors who have won Prizes; after which there will be a Grand Display of the Fountains and an Exhibition of Great Fireworks in the Evening.

By Order,
GEORGE GROVE, Secretary.

WILL CLOSE ON TUESDAY, JULY 2.

UNDERGROUND JERUSALEM.—AN EXHIBITION OF WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS BY WILLIAM SIMPSON. Illustrating the Recent Explorations.—Half-Mall Gallery, 49 Pall Mall (Mr. W. M. Thompson's). Ten to Six.—Admission, including Descriptive Catalogue, 1s.

ELIJAH WALTON'S COLLECTION OF OIL AND WATER-COLOUR PAINTINGS, now ON VIEW, at his GALLERY, 4 Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, Westminster. Admission, 1s., including Catalogue. Open Daily from Ten till Six.

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.—THE SIXTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION is now OPEN, at 4 Pall Mall East, from Nine till Seven. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

ALFRED D. FRIPP, Secretary.

DORIS GREAT PICTURE OF "CHRIST LEAVING THE TOMB." with "Triumph of Christianity," "Christian Martyrs," "Fountain of Life," "Nativity," "Transfiguration," &c., at the DORIS GALLERY, 30 New Bond Street. Admission, 1s.

INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS will shortly CLOSE their THIRTY-FOURTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.—Gallery, 35 Pall Mall, near St. James's Palace.

JAMES FANEY, Secretary.

OLD BOND STREET GALLERY, 25 Old Bond Street.—The EIGHTH EXHIBITION OF PICTURES IN OIL AND WATER-COLOURS is NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. Catalogue, 6d.

G. F. CHESTER, Hon. Sec.

MUSICAL UNION.—AUER, RENDANO, DUVERNOY, LASSERRE, &c. at the last and GRAND MATINEE, Tuesday, July 2, at Three o'clock, will play Solo and the Septets of Berlioz and Hummel. Vocalists, Legros; Accompanists, Gosses. Tickets, 10s. 6d. each; and Family Tickets, to which Three, One Guinea; to be had at the usual places and at St. James's Hall.

J. ELIA, Director.

INTERNATIONAL PRISON CONGRESS.—MAGISTRATES and other appointed REPRESENTATIVES at the CONGRESS to be held in the Crystal Palace, from the 2nd to the 10th of July, may have their TICKETS on application to Messrs. Adams Street, Adelphi, W.C.

HAMPSTEAD.—HEATH BROW SCHOOL will be carried on under the Superintendence of Mrs. CASE. Managing Master, Mr. F. W. LEVANDER (formerly for Three Years as Second Master with Mr. Case).

Classical.....Talford Ely, M.A., Lond., Fellow of University College, London, late Assistant Examiner in Classics in the University of London.
Mathematics.....John Briggs, M.A., Lond., late Assistant Examiner in Mathematics in the University of London.
Natural Philosophy.....F. S. Bury, M.A., Ch. Coll. Cambridge, Professor of Chemistry at the Royal Academy.
Chemistry.....E. W. Edwards, F.R.S.
English Literature.....M. R. Tapscott, French Master in University College School, London.
French Literature.....J. F. King, B.A., Lond., Writing Master in University College School, London.
German Literature.....Mr. W. Henry Fisk, Head Drawing Master in University College School, London.
Drawing.....Mr. A. W. Robertson.
Compositions.....
Address, Mrs. CASE, Heath Brow, Hampstead, London, N.W.

COLESHILL GRAMMAR SCHOOL.—Head-Master, Mr. F. A. HOOVER, M.A. RE-OPEN August 1. Terms for Boarders, 20s. per session.

MR. A. DAWSON CLARKE (B.A. Cambridge) and MR. A. M. LIPSCOMB (B.A. Oxon.) receive RESIDENT and NON-RESIDENT PUPILS for the various Competitive Examinations, and for the Universities. During the last three years Pupils have been prepared for the following Examinations:—Oxford (Final Schools and Mathematical); Cambridge (B.A. Exam. and Mathematical); London (School Certificate); Engineering College, and Woods and Forests; Woolwich, Direct Commission, Polytechnic Service, British Museum, Institute of Actuaries, Preliminary Law and Medicine, &c. &c. References, &c., apply to Mr. A. D. CLARKE, 22 Torrington Square, W.C., or to Mr. A. M. LIPSCOMB, 25 Bedford Street, Russell Square, W.C.

HANOVER.—PRIVATE TUITION.—The ENGLISH CHAPLAIN (a Cambridge M.A., with Mathematical Honours) undertakes the instruction and Education of POUR PUPILS. Vacancies shortly.—Address, Rev. K. G. WILKINS, 5 Kennerly Way, Hanover.

FOLKESTONE.—MR. W. J. JEAFFRESON, M.A. Oxon (Formerly Principal of the Kington High School, Hereford), will continue, with the assistance of a Cambridge Honours Man, to prepare PUPILS for the Universities, Indian Civil Service, Woolwich, and all Competitive Examinations.—Terms and References on application.

EDUCATION by the SEASIDE.—PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS OF GENTLEMEN.—French and German constantly spoken. Greatest attention paid to health and moral training of Pupils; they are carefully prepared for Public Schools. Highest references given and required. Terms, 20 to 100 Guineas.—For Prospectus apply to T. B. M., Messrs. Treasurer, Brighton; Messrs. Nichol & Co., Bournemouth, London. Term begins on September 10.

A COUNTRY VICAR, formerly Fellow of his College, and an experienced Tutor, EDUCATES his TWO SONS, now between the ages of Twelve and Sixteen. He wishes to receive into his house TWO OTHER BOYS to share their studies and advantages.—Address, D. D., Secretary A.C.S., 7 Whitehall.

A BENEFICENT CLERGYMAN, for some years Tutor to the Sons of a Nobleman of the highest rank, will RE-OPEN a GENTLEMAN preparing for Oxford or the Army.—Address, A. H., Post Office, Hanover.

LADIES' SCHOOL, Mary Street House, Taunton.—For the Daughters of Professional Men, Clergymen, and Gentlemen.

The education given is a thoroughly sound one, and the assistance of experienced masters is procured in the study of those branches of learning which are generally neglected in the education of ladies. The real work done is tested by the College of Preceptors and the Oxford Local Examinations, and by examinations carefully conducted in the school itself. Inclusive terms do not exceed fifty guineas per annum. Full particulars will be forwarded on application to the LADY PRINCIPAL. The highest References will be given.

EDUCATION for LADIES.—MISS CASSAL and Miss NELIGAN, diplômées de l'Université de France (Amiens de Paris), have made arrangements to succeed Miss HUGHES, and will RE-OPEN the SCHOOL on September 20. Prospectus on application.—3 College Villas Road, South Hampstead, N.W.

LAW.—TO INTENDING STUDENTS.—The Advertiser, who has a considerable London practice, and who holds several important Legal Offices in and out of London, has a VACANCY for an ARTICLED PUPIL. Advantages are offered for seeing Practice of a very varied character, and, if desired, residence with the Principal can be arranged for in a healthy and comfortable Home.—Apply to G., care of Mr. Street, 20 Cornhill, London, E.C.

FARM in GLOUCESTERSHIRE to LET from next Michaelmas. It comprises about 210 Acres—100 in grass, 110 arable.—For particulars apply to Mr. LIFKIN, Frodsham, Preston Brook, Cheshire.

CHAMBERS, Pall-Mall.—SUITES OF CHAMBERS to be LET in one of the largest, newest, and most conveniently situated Houses.—Apply to the HOUSEKEEPER, 41 Pall-Mall, N.W.

WANTED TO PURCHASE some OLD ARTIFICIAL TEETH.—Persons having the above to SELL, can forward them by post or otherwise, and their value will be sent per return.—Address, Mr. E. BROWNIE, Dentist, 6 Chisworth Street, Paddington, London.

HYDROPATHY.—SUDBROOK PARK, Richmond Hill.—Phonics.—Dr. EDWARD LANE, M.A., M.D. Edin. Turkish Baths on the Premises. Private entrance into Richmond Park. Prospectus on application.

OVERLAND ROUTE.—The PENINSULAR and ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY BOOK PASSENGERS and receive Cargo and Parcels by their Steamers for

	FROM SOUTHAMPTON.	FROM BRINDISI.
GIBRALTAR .....	Every Thursday, at 2 p.m.
MALTA .....
ALEXANDRIA .....	Every Thursday, at 2 p.m.	Every Monday, at 5 a.m.
ADEN .....
BOMBAY .....
COLOMBO .....
CHINA .....	Thursday, June 6, at 2 p.m., and every alternate Thursday thereafter.	Monday, June 17, at 5 a.m., and every alternate Monday thereafter.
CEYLON .....	Thursday, June 6, at 2 p.m., and every fourth Thursday thereafter.	Monday, June 17, at 5 a.m., and every fourth Monday thereafter.
NEW ZEALAND .....	(Cargo only)

And all Ports at which the British India Company's Steamers call. An abatement of 50 per cent. from the charge for the Return Voyage is made to Passengers who have paid full fare to or from Port Eastward of Suez re-embarking within Six Months of their arrival, and 10 per cent. to those re-embarking within Twelve Months. Through Tickets to Brindisi can be obtained of LAMAU & CO., 6 Billiter Street, E.C. (South Italian Railway Office). For Rates of Passage Money and Freight, which have been much reduced, and all other information, apply to the Company's Offices, 125 Leadenhall Street, London, or Oriental Place, Southampton.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The SOUTH-WESTERN HOTEL, at the Terminus of the Railway and opposite the Docks. Splendid Public Rooms, and numerous Suites of Apartments. Billiard and Smoking Room. Hot, Cold, and Shower Baths. Fixed and moderate Charges. Tickets forwarded on application to LINFORD & CATHERWOOD, Proprietors.

BRIGHTON.—BEDFORD HOTEL.—Every endeavour is made to render this Hotel equal to its long-existing reputation. Spacious Coffee Room for Ladies and Gentlemen. New Water Service in the Hotel.—Communications to THE MANAGER, Bedford Hotel Company, Limited.

THE ILFRACOMBE HOTEL stands in its own Grounds of Five Acres, extending to the Beach, and the Private Terrace affords the finest Marine Promenade attached to any Hotel in the Kingdom. 100 Apartments. Cuisine excellent. Wines choice. Table d'Hôte daily.—Address, J. BURN, Ilfracombe.

ALUMINIUM.—OPERA, RACE, and FIELD GLASSES mounted in this new metal of incredible lightness. An immense assortment at CALLOMAN, 28A New Bond Street, corner of Conduit Street, W. N.B.—Sole Agent to VOIGTSLAND, Vienna.

MARION & CO., 28 and 29 SOHO SQUARE. PHOTOGRAPHS. COLLECTIONS COMPLETED, ARRANGED, MOUNTED, TITLED, BOUND, FRAMED, OR PORTFOLIO.

RODRIGUES' MONOGRAMS, ARMS, CRESTS, and RAISED, RUSTIC, GROTTOESQUE, and ECCESTRIC MONOGRAMS artistically designed by the combination of Letters, NUMERICAL and ALPHABETICAL characters in Relief and brilliantly illuminated in Gold, Silver, and Colours, in the highest English Art. CARD-PLATE elegantly engraved, and 100 Superior Cards printed, for 2s. 6d. At HENRY RODRIGUES', 45 PICCADILLY, LONDON.

SPECIAL MACHINE-MADE JEWELLERY in 18-CARAT GOLD. ENGLISH LEVER WATCHES and CLOCKS. Quality of Gold guaranteed on the British Standard, and every article is made to order, and is guaranteed to last for ever.

MR. STREETER, 3 CONDUIT STREET, SOHO SQUARE, W.
MR. STREETER, JEWELLER and DIAMOND MERCHANT, 3 CONDUIT STREET, SOHO SQUARE, W.
BURLINGTON STREET WORKS, BAVILLE ROAD.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 871, Vol. 34.

July 6, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

FRANCE.

THE new Treaty between France and Germany, submitted to the French Assembly on Monday, is on the whole beneficial to France. The Germans do not give up much, but they give up something. Under previous arrangements no more money was to be paid until the 1st of March, 1874, and the six departments now occupied were to continue to be occupied until the same date. One hundred and twenty millions sterling with interest were to be then paid, and the Germans were forthwith to evacuate France. Under the new arrangement twenty millions sterling are to be paid within two months after the ratification of the Treaty, and two departments, comprising the finest parts of Champagne, are to be evacuated. Twenty millions sterling more are to be paid on the 1st of next February, and forty millions more on the 1st of March, 1874; and on eighty millions, or two milliards, being paid, two more departments, those of the Ardennes and the Vosges, are to be evacuated. The last forty millions sterling are to be paid, with all interest then due, on the 1st March, 1875, and then the last of the six occupied departments, those of the Meuse and the Meurthe, are to be evacuated, and Belfort is to be handed over. The main features of this new Treaty are therefore that by an immediate payment of twenty millions sterling, France can purchase the liberation of two departments, and she has a year more given her before she has to make a final settlement with Germany. Both these stipulations are beneficial to her. The French Government states that it has already at its command the funds necessary for the payment of the first half-milliard, and it is putting the money to a very good use if it can be made to procure the liberation of two departments. If the new loan is very successful, and the money subscribed for it is poured in quickly, the whole of the occupied territory may be released by the date originally fixed. The Germans are quite willing at any time to take their money and go away. But the new loan will be principally subscribed in France, and to call upon French subscribers to pay up in full by the beginning of 1874 might press very hardly on numbers of persons very ill fitted to bear the burden, and might seriously disarrange French industry. The French Government has therefore very wisely provided for the worst, and has secured a year of grace in case of need. If all the money can be got and paid over in eighteen months' time, the liberation of French territory will not be effected a day later, and may be effected earlier, than was contemplated by the Treaty of Frankfurt. If difficulties arise and a longer time is wanted to get all the money, time is given in which to get it, while only two, instead of six, departments will be occupied. The French Government tried hard to obtain a further concession. They asked that in proportion as the area of occupation was diminished the numbers of the occupying army should be diminished also. But the Germans, for military reasons, would not agree to this. They insisted on being at liberty to keep fifty thousand men in France so long as they were in France at all. The new Treaty may therefore in one respect make the position of one portion of the French people worse. During the year of grace, the departments of the Meuse and Meurthe may have the whole army of occupation quartered on them. But the risk of their suffering in this way does not seriously impair the general advantages accruing to France from the arrangement, and there is every probability that the Assembly will ratify the Treaty almost without discussion. The main thing is to raise the new loan as quickly and on as favourable terms as possible. But in order to accomplish this, the appearance of a financial deficit for the current year must be avoided, and accordingly the discussion of the Assembly this week has been given to the discussion of the new taxes which unfortunately must be voted if the income of France is to balance its expenditure.

The Assembly at the end of last week confirmed its previous vote imposing a tax on mortgages, and passed in one sitting a Bill for taxing shares and bonds. It then came to the third of the taxes which constitute the project of the Budget Committee—the tax on business transactions. This tax is estimated to produce a revenue of seventy millions of francs, and it so happens that M. THIERS calculates that the taxes on raw materials will give, on the expiration of the Treaties with England and Belgium, sixty millions. It was natural therefore to compare one set of taxes with the other, but to do so it was necessary to examine whether the taxes on raw materials would, if voted, give anything like sixty millions. A Committee of the Assembly had reported first that only fifteen millions, and subsequently that only five millions, could be obtained at once from taxing raw materials; and it was of the utmost importance to know whether M. THIERS or the Committee was right. The discussion of the tax on business transactions was therefore interrupted that M. THIERS might enlighten the Assembly as to the grounds on which he took so very favourable an estimate of the probable proceeds of the taxes he so strongly recommends, and the Assembly has been mainly occupied this week in listening to his statements on the subject, and to the criticisms which his statements have evoked. Before, however, entering on details, M. THIERS indulged in a general denunciation of the Treaties of Commerce concluded under the Empire. This attack provoked M. ROCHER to defend them, which he did with much spirit; but the mere notion that he should dare to speak at all seemed to drive a large portion of the Assembly wild. There was the most intense excitement, and a general tumult and confusion prevailed. The Assembly behaved, in fact, very badly indeed, although it is not for Englishmen, fresh from the memory of the deplorable scene of the present Session when the House of Commons lost all sense of decency and self-respect in the amusement of hooting down Mr. AUBREY HERBERT, to be severe on the failures of foreign legislative bodies. Fortunately, while this war of passion was still raging in the Assembly, the moment came when the terms of the new Treaty had to be made known by the MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, and the interest of the subject and the chilling reminder of the presence and power of the foreigner in France sobered the Assembly and brought it to its senses. The next day M. THIERS justified his calculations in a long and elaborate speech, and then, with much good sense and good temper, some of the leading members of the Committee, which had differed from him, so widely urged the reasons which had led them to support an opposite view.

The details of the discussion were very complicated and minute, but the general points at issue are not very difficult to seize. The whole difference of opinion arose from varying interpretations of the several Treaties of Commerce by which France is bound. The Committee insisted that so long as the Treaties with England and Belgium are in force—that is, for eight months longer—scarcely anything at all can be got out of taxes on raw materials; and that, the real point being to get a sufficient revenue for the current expenses of the year, it is idle to have resort to taxes which during the year would be inoperative. Even after the Treaties with England and Belgium shall have expired, the Committee thinks that the other treaties by which France is bound would make such taxes very unproductive. However the Assembly may vote, which is a political rather than a financial question, the Committee appears to have had an important victory in so far as arguments went. For example, take the instance of the proposed tax on cotton. M. THIERS said that it was perfectly open to France to tax at once Brazilian and American cotton, and this would yield a revenue of four millions and a half of francs. When the Treaty with England expires France will be able to tax Indian cotton, which will yield three and a half millions more, and a further two millions can be obtained as the pressure of other treaties is removed by negotiation or lapse of time. So he put the total proceeds of the tax at ten millions. The Committee replied that while the English Treaty subsists English manufactured cotton goods cannot be taxed, and that as English manufacturers would be buying American cotton duty free, they could make it impossible for French manufacturers paying the duty on American cotton to contend with them. During the months while the Treaty will still operate, they would deluge the French market with their goods, so that French manufacturers would not during the subsistence of the Treaty, and for some time after its cessation, be able to afford to buy taxed American cotton, and consequently no revenue would be derived from it. After the English Treaty has expired the Swiss Treaty, by which cotton thread may be introduced duty free, will remain in force, and cotton will thus find its way into France without the revenue being benefited. M. THIERS'S reply was of the most singular kind. He stated that up to this time the cotton introduced from Switzerland was of the most limited amount, and that France, although weaker than she used to be, was still powerful enough to make herself respected, and that Switzerland must be told not to introduce more cotton than she has hitherto been accustomed to introduce. The Committee observed that, in the first place, the Treaty with Switzerland distinctly provided that the Swiss might introduce into France as much cotton thread as they pleased without France being at liberty to inquire from what country it came; and that, in the next place, Germany, who certainly is not to be bullied, had established the right of being treated on the footing of the most favoured nation, and would claim all that the Swiss could claim. Hereupon M. THIERS urged that the Treaties of Commerce provide that, if a tax is imposed on raw materials, a corresponding tax may be placed on the manufactured material. The Committee replied that it was impossible, under the existing treaties, to place a tax on all kinds of each description of raw material; for many of the treaties specify that some kinds shall be imported duty free, so that the countries benefiting by the treaties would never consent that a tax should be imposed on the manufactured article when a portion of the raw material came untaxed into the hands of French manufacturers. France, for example, is bound to admit Italian silk goods duty free. M. THIERS proposes to tax China and Japan raw silk, but not raw silk made in France. Italy would have a right to complain if France put a tax on Italian silk goods, when it taxed only a portion of the raw material. M. THIERS admits this, but his views as to Italy are as singular as his views as to Switzerland. In plain language, he offers to sell the Italians the alliance of France and to acquiesce in the destruction of the Temporal Power if they will enter into new commercial arrangements with him. The Pope will learn the real value attached to his blessings by the Eldest Daughter of the Church, when he hears that she is prepared to abandon him if his enemies will let her get a possibly increased revenue of about a hundred thousand pounds a year out of duties on silk. There really is no defence for the taxes on raw materials except that every other of the taxes proposed is open to grave objection, and certainly the tax on business transactions is almost as bad as could be devised. It is a great mistake to suppose that the financial difficulties of France have been overcome. More taxes must be imposed; those already imposed do not produce nearly what was anticipated, and the limits of defensible taxation have been reached. Before long the French may have to acknowledge what a great benefit it is to them to have a year more for their final settlement with Germany.

THE GENEVA ARBITRATION.

IT is said that American journalists have the good sense to admit that their Government has exposed them to a severe rebuff at Geneva. The obnoxious claims might have been withdrawn with more dignity before they were condemned by the unanimous and unhesitating judgment of the Arbitrators. The English agents appear to be

Lord CAIRNS and of M. JOHN LEMOINE, seems nevertheless to be unsound; the supposed risk of an adverse decision was never incurred. If the Arbitrators had expressed a gratuitous opinion that the consequential claims were warranted by international law, the English agent would only have persisted in his refusal to proceed with the litigation until the claims were definitely withdrawn. The Arbitrators properly and expressly guarded themselves against the suspicion that they were proceeding to adjudicate on the terms of the Treaty and the scope of the reference. The agent of the United States might, if he had thought fit, have asked for a preliminary award on the extent of the reference, but he prudently took the offered opportunity of relieving himself from the intolerable burden of an absurd and unjust contention. The whole arrangement had probably been concerted between Mr. FISH and Mr. ADAMS; and there is no doubt that the PRESIDENT, in withdrawing the claims, was acting strictly within his constitutional powers. The Treaty which was ratified by the Senate necessarily assumed the right of the Executive Government of either country to conduct the litigation. Neither the American Case nor the future award can require or admit the ratification of the Senate. One English writer complains that the Americans have secured by their diplomatic obstinacy the Supplementary Article which happily proved abortive. There were strong objections to a document in which the abandonment of an iniquitous demand was made a subject of bargain; nor was it desirable that a new American rule of law should be foisted into the international code. If the Senate had not mistaken Lord GRANVILLE'S conciliatory policy for weakness, the American Government would have secured a more decorous retreat from its untenable position. It was far more satisfactory that the claims should be withdrawn because they were flagrantly absurd. The fear that the Indirect Claims may be hereafter revived is altogether chimerical. The American nation is thoroughly ashamed of the sharp practice which has resulted in ignominious failure; and neither Mr. SUMNER who invented the claims, nor the PRESIDENT and SECRETARY of STATE who adopted them, will be thought to have earned public gratitude. According to the American contention, which has never been definitely retracted, the Indirect Claims were covered by the Treaty. It would seem to follow that they are finally extinct, since they have been disavowed by the litigant who advanced them. It is not probable that any English Minister would even discuss the question whether the demands should be revived or submitted to arbitration. The whole controversy is finally terminated.

The patient and steady persistence of the English Government in the determination by all possible methods to render the arbitration practicable has been justified by the result. The solution has been thoroughly honourable and satisfactory; and the Ministers may boast that after the commencement of the discussion, six months ago, they have never wavered in their determination to abide by the purpose which they originally announced. It is now impossible to ascertain whether they might have succeeded at an earlier period if they had made their intentions more clearly understood. As a general rule it may be said that eagerness in making a bargain is injudicious; but in this instance there was an incidental advantage in gaining time. The Americans had perhaps never clearly understood the monstrous character of the Indirect Claims until the Case had provoked unanimous indignation in England. From that time the conviction has been rapidly spreading that the Claims were indefensible; and the opinion announced in their non-official capacity by the Arbitrators had been previously held by the great majority of educated Americans. In tolerably enlightened communities the habitual appeals of politicians to ignorance and prejudice are often not only ineffective but damaging to those by whom they are preferred. Intelligent Americans resent the assumption of their representatives that they are either foolish or extortionate. The rabble will probably impute to General GRANT and Mr. FISH unworthy weakness in their dealings with England. More competent judges of their conduct will blame them, not for retreating at the last moment, but for persisting so long in an outrageous demand. It may be hoped that their disappointment will result to the rude and offensive manner of Mr. BAINBRIDGE'S conduct. In one of his despatches Mr. FISH professed regret that the recourse to arbitration had been found necessary, but as he suggested, instead of being an amiable settlement, the litigation would rather partake of the nature of a contest. In the English pleadings there is nothing which could give offence to the most sensitive opponent; but the American Case was as much based on a demand for a concession as on an supporting his own demands.

and Lord Russell were hypocrites and conspirators, nor will they inquire whether enthusiasm for the Federal cause may not have tempted Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright into rhetorical exaggeration. The alleged motives of English statesmen, and the feelings imputed to large classes of Englishmen, are not included in the reference to arbitration of the question whether the Government was, in the case of any cruiser, guilty of such negligence as to involve pecuniary liability. It may be supposed that lawyers selected by the Government of the United States to represent the country understand their business too well to have thought that imputations of insincerity and malignity could be relevant to the issue. In their choice of topics and illustrations, as in their assertion in the Case of the Indirect Claims, they consulted the feeling which they supposed to be popular. In the words of a journal devoted to the President, they framed an indictment against England when it was their duty and the interest of their clients to confine their attention to the subject-matter of arbitration.

It will be interesting to learn whether the defeat which has been sustained by the Washington Government will affect the chances of the Presidential election. General GRANT is responsible for the miscarriage of Mr. Fish's attempt at extortion, but, on the other hand, Mr. GREELEY has since the commencement of the discussion been one of the most pugnacious advocates of the Indirect Claims. It is not yet known whether the final and compulsory withdrawal of these claims will cause greater irritation than the original blunder of preferring untenable demands. Mr. GREELEY's advice has ultimately been followed, although the previous conduct of the negotiations had not commanded his approval. The orations which were delivered yesterday in all parts of the United States will perhaps, after due allowance for the necessities of eloquence, throw some light on the general state of feeling and opinion. There has seldom been a contest in which the best class of American citizens has felt so little desire to take part with either candidate. General GRANT's great military services have alone secured a partial condonation for his acknowledged failure as an administrator and politician. Some reaction in his favour has temporarily followed the peevish extravagance of Mr. SUMNER's elaborate denunciation of the nepotism and corruption which he attributes to the President; but in America, as in Europe, enemies select for attack not the strongest, but the weakest, points in the character of an adversary. It is not denied that General GRANT has yielded to the amiable weakness of promoting an extraordinary number of persons connected with himself by blood or by marriage; and he has also been singularly unlucky in the conduct of his official kindred. Family jobs are in all countries regarded with a certain tenderness, but only on the implied condition that some attention shall be paid to character and fitness. General GRANT has also surrounded himself with the most notorious and unprincipled political managers; and even those who are most ready to excuse the President's errors of judgment hesitate to rely on the public virtue of Mr. CAMERON or Colonel FORNEY. The great majority of upright politicians of the most intelligent class would have welcomed the nomination of Mr. ADAMS at Cincinnati, in the hope that a statesman and a gentleman would use the powers of the Presidential office for the purpose of elevating the moral and political standard of government; but those who are tired of primary Assemblies and packed Conventions are utterly disappointed by the selection of Mr. GREELEY as the antagonist of General GRANT. The orthodox Republicans at Philadelphia have thought it judicious to pledge themselves to a policy of Protection; and it would evidently have been for the interest of the independent section of the party to profess sounder economic doctrine. Mr. GREELEY, though he is for the present ready to waive his opinions for the chance of election, is the most bigoted and obstinate supporter of the worst forms of Protection. His foreign policy is a blank, except that he has always shared the animosity of the American vulgar against England; and until lately he has systematically opposed the reform of the Civil Service. A President elected by lot would command as much confidence as either General GRANT or Mr. GREELEY.

THE COST OF LIVING.

THE rapid increase in the cost of labour and of many articles of consumption tends to produce great social changes. The causes of the general rise of prices, though they are difficult to ascertain or apportion, are for the most part natural, and therefore inescapable. Even when scarcity of production or lavishness of consumption results from social or social habits, it would be a waste of time to preach against idleness and luxury. The growing pressure on income may be partly attributed to the multiplication of artificial wants; but unusual strength of character is required to resist the tendency of custom. At the present time the expenditure of a family in almost any rank is one-third greater than it would have been forty years ago; but in 1832 as in 1872 the great majority conformed implicitly to the prevailing fashion. The rise of prices, which is but indirectly connected with the spread of luxury, has lately recalled the attention of economic writers to the supply of gold. Several years have passed since M. MICHEL CHEVALIER, in a pamphlet which was translated into English by Mr. COBDEN, foretold an early and enormous depreciation of the standard of value. Both writers admitted that the effect of the gold discoveries had then been comparatively trifling; but M. CHEVALIER maintained that the substitution of gold for silver in the French currency had operated as a parachute, and that, as soon as the wants of France were fully supplied, a sudden catastrophe would ensue. The prediction of a violent change has not been accomplished; but within the last two years the rate of alteration in prices has been visibly accelerated. Coincidentally with a great advance in commercial prosperity, almost every commodity has become dearer; and the increase is greatest in the prices of coal and iron, which are important elements in the cost of every branch of production. It appears from the statements of Mr. THOMSON HANKEY, confirmed by the authority of the Economist, that the coinage of gold since 1848 has been about equal to the entire stock which then existed in the world. When allowance is made for waste and recoinage, the entire amount of gold coin may probably have increased in four-and-twenty years by sixty per cent. The statistical tables published in an instructive article in the Economist show that within three years the annual rate of coinage has been reduced by one-half. It may be inferred that the previous supply had exceeded the demand; and probably the abundance of gold may in a great measure account for the recent rise of prices.

The simultaneous increase of the cost of living and of the demand for labour fully accounts for the rise of wages, whether it has been effected by voluntary concession or through the machinery of strikes. In some branches of industry, and especially in the business of coal-mining, the rise of wages, having greatly exceeded the increased price of the necessaries of life, has incidentally become the principal cause of an abnormal dearth. In many districts, including the great Scottish coal-fields, it has been found that the efficiency of labour varies inversely with the rate of wages. The collier, like the West Indian negro, has proposed to himself a certain standard of comfort, with which he is for the present contented. Instead of earning more at the higher rate of wages, he prefers to secure his former income by a diminished amount of work. The coal-owners have in consequence been in many instances unable to accept orders, or to profit to the full extent by the extraordinary activity of the iron trade; but they have consoled themselves by adding to their prices a percentage which will probably compensate for their losses and disappointments. It is asserted on doubtful authority that in some of the English coal districts the colliers have begun to keep hunters; and it would be well if the rumour were even approximately true. When a collier appears at the coverside, he will at last convert into a living reality the imaginary Conservative working-man. For the present the dignity and pleasure of labour are but imperfectly appreciated by those who practically know what labour means. The most valued right of work is the right to be idle as soon as the indispensable means of subsistence are earned. It would be unjust and arrogant to censure miners for preferring ordinary human inclinations to the fine sentiments which are frequently uttered on their behalf. Skilled artisans in their combinations against their employers aim at increase both of income and leisure, though their traditional customs and their modern theories disincline them to those habits of saving which would facilitate the transition of the successful members of their body into the middle class.

Except in cases where the improvement of mechanism provides a substitute for manual labour, the cost of production in all departments may be expected to increase. Though the excessive percentage which has since the autumn been added to the price of coal and iron may be exceptional and temporary, coal will necessarily become more costly to raise as the deeper seams are exhausted; and iron depends upon coal. The increase may be the result of the strike in the building trade, and the consequent scarcity of labour; or it may be the result of the increase in the cost of the raw materials of iron, and the consequent rise in the price of the finished product.

fail to receive a check. It is already stated that, although iron-workers of every description are now fully employed, new orders are slow in coming in, and all the signs which indicate a future collapse of commercial prosperity are offering, as on many former occasions, an unheeded warning. It is possible that America and France may at some future time learn the first principles of political economy, to the great detriment of the competitor whose rivalry they gratuitously foster; but if the industrial prosperity of England, in spite of periodical checks and reverses, on the whole continues and increases, the possessors of fixed incomes will, instead of sharing in the benefit, constantly become poorer. The gold by which their property is measured will purchase less and less, because bullion will be more abundant, because labour will be scantier, and because coal will lie deeper in the ground. Taxation, as far as it is required for the payment of interest on debt, will become lighter, and Civil Servants, although they may obtain some advance of nominal pay, will probably not find that their incomes keep pace with their expenses. Annuity-holders, fund-holders, debenture-holders, and mortgagees, or rather the poorer and more helpless of their number, will suffer, because they will be less able to transfer their investments. Tithe-owners, under the provisions of the Commutation Act, occupy an exceptional position, which is shared in some parts of the country by landowners who have granted leases on corn rents. The tithe charge is annually readjusted according to the prices, on an average of seven years, of the three kinds of grain in ordinary use. The tithe-owners are therefore unaffected by the depreciation of gold; but it happens that corn also has become cheaper in even a larger ratio than gold, and that the price is more likely to diminish than to increase, as fresh lands are brought into cultivation in America and Eastern Europe.

Customary incomes, as well as fixed incomes, though they admit of augmentation, generally lag behind the growth of industrial wealth. It is difficult for professional practitioners as a body to increase the rate of the fees by which they are paid, although a fashionable doctor or a successful advocate may prepare the way for a general advance by judiciously increasing his demands. On the whole, a depreciation of the circulating medium tends to increase the collective wealth of the community by favouring productive debtors at the expense of consuming creditors, although it tends to impoverish still further a class which can ill bear reduction of its means. The advance in the value of land may perhaps tend in the opposite direction, as far as it accrues to the benefit of the non-productive owner; but the bulk of the profit will be realized by the occupier, because rents rise slowly and at distant intervals. Although it might perhaps be inexpedient, even if it were possible, to resist the impending economic changes, any casual delay will be not unwelcome, as it may give time for society to adjust itself to altered conditions. The probable resumption of specie payments by the United States will create a large demand of gold for coinage and circulation, which may perhaps absorb the produce of the gold-fields for two or three years. On the other hand, improvements in the machinery of credit are constantly rendering coin less necessary for the conduct of trade, as when hundreds of millions are paid at the Clearing House, not only without the use of coin, but by mere entries in books. If Sir JOHN LEBBOCK's plan of crossing bank-notes is adopted and found useful, another reason will be furnished for preferring paper to gold. The depreciation of the currency operates as a tax on all accumulations which are not invested either in some material property, such as land or mines, or in reproductive undertakings. The tendency of the change would therefore seem to be favourable to capitalists and artisans, but it will cause much social discomfort and disturbance. It is highly probable that the working classes may, as their wages increase, prefer additional leisure to the mere addition to their income which they can command at their choice. Nearly all the economic changes which are impending are likely to tend to the disadvantage of the consumer.

THE BALLOT BILL IN THE COMMONS.

AS the Government had decided to treat the amendments of the Lords to the Ballot Bill in a temperate spirit, and to make as many concessions as possible, there was no excitement and little interest awakened when the Bill once more came before the Commons. It was like flogging a dead horse to revive the old question whether the country wished for the Bill; but Mr. DISRAELI rather exceeded the ordinary laxity of careless assertion when he expressed a belief that if the Government had not got into a scrape with regard to the Washington Treaty, the Bill would not have been heard of this Session. The Government stood pledged at the end of last Session to make the Ballot Bill their foremost measure for this Session; they renewed the pledge every time last autumn when opportunity offered, and they did not lose a day in bringing in the Bill this year. Mr. GLADSTONE happily and gracefully seized the occasion of this irrelevant obtrusion of the Washington Treaty to pay Mr. DISRAELI a well-deserved compliment on the prudence and reticence which he has shown with regard to the late difficulties with America at times when he might have done great harm even by legitimate criticism. Almost for the first time this Session Mr. DISRAELI spoke generally on the Ballot, and he even endeavoured to say something on behalf of the optional Ballot invented by the Lords. As, however, arguments in favour of the scheme were hopeless, he was obliged to have recourse to a transparent statistical fallacy. Out of a hundred men who marry, twenty cannot write; and Mr. DISRAELI amused himself with seeing whether he could persuade his hearers to leap to the conclusion that marriage and voting stood on the same footing, and that out of every five electors there would be one who, being unable to read, would be allowed to vote openly. Mr. GLADSTONE knew that the statement was not put forward as a serious argument, and he therefore only paused for a moment in his reply to observe that out of illiterate persons who marry very few have votes. In order to fall in as much as possible with the wishes of the Lords, the Government very wisely decided to accept the proposal to make a scrutiny possible. But they recurred to the scheme which they adopted three years ago, and which the Duke of RICHMOND had entirely spoiled while professing to ask for nothing except what the Government had themselves proposed. The safeguards by which the scheme of the Government is accompanied remove all, or almost all, the objections to which the crude and undigested proposal of the Duke of RICHMOND lay so obviously open. Not only is the number of the ballot-paper to be on its back, but the counterfoils are to be sealed up before the voting begins; the votes are to be counted without the back being displayed, and any agent striving to obtain during the counting of the votes information as to the manner in which the voter has voted, is to be liable to a personal penalty. With these precautions the machinery for a scrutiny may be established so as to prevent the voter having any fear of his vote being known. His safety does not, however, lie in the fact that it is only by order of a tribunal that the voting-papers and the counterfoils will be examined. He must have been pronounced guilty of personation before the mode in which he has voted will be inquired into, and the real voter could have nothing to fear from the scrutiny itself. The danger to which he was exposed lay in the risk of an agent who distrusted him being enabled, by abuse of the machinery designed for a scrutiny, to ascertain how he had voted. This danger as the Bill came from the Lords was a real and serious one; but so many safeguards against it have now been introduced that the voter practically will run no risk at all. It is possible he may think he will run a risk; for agents and officials, if they acted together and evaded the law, could find out how he voted; and he may be prompted by too deep a distrust of a class above him to think that if they could do a wrong they would be sure to do it. Some electors will therefore possibly not be quite as much at their ease when they vote as if a scrutiny had been rendered impossible; but the advantage of doing something to check personation largely outweighs the disadvantage of a few timid and distrustful men being prevented by imaginary fears from exercising the right of voting.

The Lords have got their wish for a scrutiny carried out, and they may be, we hope, trusted not to insist on the irrational scheme of an optional Ballot, which even in the Upper House was only carried by a small majority, and was rejected by the Commons without a division. These two main points being arranged, the other matters at issue between the Houses are of very trivial importance. The Government, indeed, offered to concede more than the House of Commons would allow them to concede. Mr. FORSTER proposed that the House should accept the amendment forbidding schools to be used as polling places; but the House by an overwhelming majority insisted on the amendment being rejected. The division was not in any sense a party one. County members are afraid of the increasing expense of county elections, and as the use of the schools would lessen the expense, they will not give up one mode of getting into Parliament as cheaply as possible. There is much to be said against the use of schools as polling places, and the principal argument in favour of using them is that elections do not come often enough to do much harm to the schools. But what may be expected to weigh with the leaders of the majority in the Lords is that to insist on these amendments would be exceedingly distasteful to a great number of their friends in the Commons, and the same may be said of the amendment providing for polling places within two instead of four miles of a given number of electors. This is another mode of adding to the cost of county elections, and as the great majority of county members are Conservatives, the Lords may be trusted to attend to their wishes for as much cheapness as is practicable. The House also refused to accept the amendment providing for the closing of the poll at different hours at different seasons of the year. The balance of argument is strongly against the proposal, and no speaker in the Commons attempted to meet the objection that elections held in the months of the short hours would never be regarded as fair by the working classes. But this was not really an amendment made by the Lords. The proposal of Lord SHAFTESBURY, extending the hours of polling to a uniform limit, was carried by a surprise against which the Conservative leaders protested, and then the Government substituted a totally different proposal of their own, which they had in vain tried to carry in the Commons, and which the Lords accepted without discussion. The Government, in accepting this amendment, was really trying to have its own way in the Commons against the wishes of the House, and the House very properly declined to be the victim of the manœuvre. Another amendment of the Lords, that which provides that declarations of incapacity to read shall be made to the presiding officer and not to a magistrate, was also rejected by the House, and the Government proposed its rejection. If the convenience of the voter was the only thing to be attended to, no doubt it would be far more convenient to him to make his declaration to a person present at the place where he had to vote, and the nuisance of going before a magistrate will be so great to poor people that many of them will prefer not to vote. But the open voting of illiterate people is liable to so much abuse, that it is perhaps necessary to make the process in some degree disagreeable and inconvenient to them.

On all these small points the Lords cannot much care to insist on their amendments, nor, if they did, would their insistence do much harm. But there is one more amendment to be noticed, as to which it is very difficult to say whether the Lords will do best by giving way or by not giving way. This is the amendment providing that the Act shall only be in force for eight years. Mr. GLADSTONE argued against the amendment, principally on the ground that the Commons had done their very best to make the Bill a good Bill, and that there was no reason to suppose that it would be anything but a waste of time for a future House of Commons to have to go over all the same ground again. But this was to miss the real point at issue. The reason for limiting the time for the operation of the Bill is not the doubt whether this Ballot Bill is a good Ballot Bill, but the doubt whether any Ballot Bill ought to be always in force. The uncertainty as to how the Bill will practically work is not perhaps a sufficient reason for making it temporary. If its machinery is bad, its machinery should be amended as experience might suggest; or if it should turn out a total failure, it should be definitely and entirely abandoned as soon as the failure became notorious. Nor can it be said that there is any precedent for making such a Bill temporary which exactly meets the case. The Corrupt Practices Act, by which the House of Commons handed its right of deciding election petitions over to the Judges, does not offer a parallel. That was confessedly an experiment operating on a very limited scale, and was never at all made a party question. And the general objection to making Acts temporary, that the limitation affixes a kind of stigma on the measure, and makes men less ready to obey and acquiesce in the law, is very strong. If the Conservative peers got into the habit of limiting the time during which measures they disliked were to be in force, they would give a stamp of feebleness and vagueness to legislation which would be very much to be regretted; and if a Parliament thinks a measure a good one, it ought not to impose on a future Parliament the task of discussing whether the measure was not after all a bad one. The existing Parliament ought to do its work, and leave future Parliaments to keep it in force or to undo it as they may think fit. But, on the other hand, it may fairly be said that the Ballot is an exceptional measure. The vast majority of the supporters of the Ballot allow that open voting is in itself the best mode of voting. Painful circumstances compel us to give up the best to take the second best. If there were no intimidation and no bribery, the Ballot Bill would be a foolish mode of disheartening, perplexing, or discouraging honest men. To make the Ballot Bill temporary might therefore be regarded as a legitimate mode of declaring that Parliament, while agreeing that the Ballot is, like conscription in time of war, a necessity for the moment, does not give up the hope that in time it may no longer be a necessity. Whichever way the Lords decide the point, the Commons may be content to accept their decision rather than run any risk of sacrificing the Bill.

MR. MIALI'S MOTION.

THE change in the form of Mr. MIALI's motion was an unintentional admission that the task which he has proposed to himself is more formidable than he at first thought. He has abandoned the idea of carrying the Established Church by assault. A politician who looks forward to a long series of annual debates is naturally anxious to give them some variety of form. Without this the tale of defeat becomes too monotonous. Every one knows on which side every one else is going to vote, and—allowance being made for accidents and the Parliamentary death-rate—the same division list reappears year after year. A difference in the immediate object of the motion ensures at all events some little speculation as to the extent to which the change will influence the result. Recruits occasionally come in from unexpected quarters, and though the gain when it is expressed in actual figures may be small, it yields in prospect a disproportionate amount of encouragement. This, it must be supposed, is the reason why Mr. MIALI has substituted a motion for inquiry into the revenues of the Established Church for a direct motion in favour of disestablishment. Inquiry is a word of so much milder import than disestablishment that he probably hoped to catch the class of men who are attracted by anything in the nature of a compromise. From any other point of view it must be held to have weakened his case. Technically, of course, inquiry may be simply a prelude to abolition; but it is so much oftener a prelude to reform and re-arrangement that the world has come insensibly to associate it with the gentler mode of treatment. Mr. MIALI was guilty, therefore, of the absurdity of asking for a stone when he wanted bread. If he had obtained the inquiry contemplated in his motion he would have been no nearer his object. Supposing that Parliament were supplied, by means of a Royal Commission, with full and accurate particulars of the origin, nature, amount, and application of any property and revenues appropriated to the use of the Church of England, how would the cause of disestablishment be the better for it? The difference of opinion between Mr. MIALI and the majority of the House of Commons would remain just where it is. Both sides would know a little more accurately than they do now what is the value of the endowments appropriated to the use of the Church of England, but this knowledge would not change their opinion of the propriety of the appropriation. When a question like disestablishment really presses for settlement, the precise magnitude of the pecuniary interests involved is one of the least important elements in the problem. It hardly formed an element at all in the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The principles which ought to govern the division of endowments into public and private, and the retention of the latter by the disestablished Church, had to be laid down; but when this was done, the remaining work was the business of Commissioners and actuaries. Indeed Mr. MIALI would not be content to stand by the result of the inquiry which he suggested. No amount of evidence that the financial arrangements of the Established Church are characterized by wisdom, purity, regularity, and economy would induce Mr. MIALI to cease from attacking them. He seems to think that he has landed the supporters of the Established Church in a dilemma when he tells them that they ought not to shrink from any information being given which would enlighten the misinformed and misguided opponents of their system. He forgets that they may turn round on him with the question, Is it a subject upon which you are open to enlightenment? If it could be proved that there were no abuses in the administration or distribution of the ecclesiastical revenues of the country, would you be any more ready than you are now to leave them in the hands of their present possessors? Mr. MIALI described himself as at a loss to conceive what the real objection to his motion could be. The answer is, that it is a motion from which no advantage could accrue to anybody. Such an inquiry as Mr. MIALI speaks of is superfluous if the Established Church is to be maintained, and equally superfluous if it is to be abolished. Considered as the first step towards disestablishment, it must be set down as a step which does not carry those who take it any further than they have already gone. Considered as a first step towards a large measure of reformation, it is open to precisely the same criticism. It could have benefited no single person except the paid officers of the Commission.

Mr. LEATHAM's speech on seconding the motion altogether threw over its supposed object. So far as appeared from his arguments, he has no wish to disestablish the Church of England; his ambition stops short at the disestablishment of the Cathedral Chapters. It is not difficult, even without ignoring all that has been done in the way of improvement, and speaking as far as possible of aggregate rather than individual incomes, to make out a case for Cathedral reform. The objections to Mr. LEATHAM's mode of reasoning are that the inquiry which he asked for has been already held, and that the exaggeration which characterized his charges is exactly calculated to prevent any use being made of the information which is already available. When the Cathedral question is described as being "as ugly and urgent as ever," attention is naturally diverted from the real changes which the Cathedral system requires to the conspicuous injustice of this mode of attacking it. It is an abuse of language to describe the "Cathedral question" as either ugly or urgent. In the sense which is usually given to these words it is neither the one nor the other. There are few or no glaring abuses to be corrected; all that is required is that the latent usefulness of the Cathedral system should be better drawn out. If Mr. LEATHAM will take the trouble to construct a plan for effecting this object, he will probably find that it is not quite so easy as he supposes to reconcile the conflicting claims of past services and present usefulness. Perhaps he would adopt the rough and ready expedient of confiscating the entire body of caputal property for the benefit of the parochial clergy, by which means, as he told the House of Commons, no less than 5,000 poor parishes might be endowed with 50*l.* a year each. A more ingenious expedient for frittering away money could hardly be devised. The endowment in each case is carefully fixed at an amount which would leave the incumbents of the parishes in question very little better off than they are now, while at the same time this scarcely appreciable increase of income is obtained by the confiscation of all the posts which there are to be given as a reward for service done to the Church. Mr. LEATHAM appears to be under the impression that canonries are, as a rule, in the gift of private patrons. If his zeal for obtaining information had allowed him to make use of information already obtained, a reference to the Clergy List would have informed him that they are virtually divided between the Crown and the bishops. Of neither of these patrons can it now be said with any truth that they "would prefer their own kindred to men of learning, young or old." Mr. LEATHAM may think that this or that appointment has been made on insufficient grounds, but he will rarely find an instance in which appointments are made on other than public grounds. In so miscellaneous a body as the Church of England there will often be great difference of opinion as to the qualifications for promotion; but neither the Crown nor the bishops are likely to set public opinion at defiance by promoting men of no qualifications at all.

Mr. MIALl may be convinced probably by this time that he has been premature in committing himself never again to let the question of disestablishment drop. No doubt there is a stage in which questions are distinctly helped forward by being insisted on in season and out of season. It was only natural perhaps after the unexpected ease with which the disestablishment of the Irish Church was effected, for Mr. MIALl to think that the disestablishment of the Church of England had advanced to this degree of prominence. It is pretty evident by this time that the number of persons who care very strongly about Mr. MIALl's motion is extremely small, and there are no signs that it is increasing. The cause of disestablishment may possibly gain an unexpected impulse from events inside the Church of England; but in the absence of some help of this kind there is no probability of its speedily losing that debating-society character which Mr. GLADSTONE rightly attributed to it. Mr. MIALl and his friends rely on some supposed sympathy between the English public and the general movement of European thought. In this respect, at all events, we believe Mr. DISRAELI to be right when he says that the English people are national rather than cosmopolitan.

SEÑOR CASTELAR ON REPUBLICANISM.

AN Essay by Señor CASTELAR on the Republican Movement in Europe, published in the current number of the Fortnightly Review, scarcely rewards the curiosity which it excites. The author is the most eloquent member of the Cortes, and he may be considered the leader of the Republican party in Spain; but like many orators, he seems scarcely to rise above mediocrity as a writer, although it would be unfair to judge of his style from a translation. A new contribution to current Republican literature is only interesting when it proceeds from a practical politician who may be supposed to represent a party. It is desirable to understand Spanish theories about universal Republicanism, so far as they illustrate the opinions and designs of Republicans in Spain. Señor CASTELAR's treatise is less ambitious than his title, as he confines himself exclusively to the modern history of France. Like other Continental writers of the same school, he has formed his opinions on a French model, and he adopts many of the commonplaces which have been invented in honour of the various revolutionary sects. Though he is not an admirer of ROBESPIERRE, he is deeply impressed with the achievements of the Convention, and he complacently adopts MICHELET's absurd division of history into the two periods before and after 1789. As might be expected, Señor CASTELAR attributes the fall of the three dynasties which have reigned in France during the present century, not to their own mistakes or to casual events, but to the extinction of the ideas or doctrines which they are respectively supposed to represent. It is useless to suggest to a modern theorist that CHARLES X.'s folly, LOUIS-PHILIPPE's unseasonable timidity, and the insane German war which was commenced by NAPOLEON III., probably changed the whole course of history. It was perfectly possible that either the legitimate Kings or the House of ORLEANS might have perpetuated their rule; and the late EMPEROR visibly and wilfully committed political suicide. The passion for abstract substantives is common to all French political writers, and to Spaniards or Italians who have derived their education and faith from France. A prudent King like LEOPOLD of Belgium, or a great Minister of the type of CAVOUR and BISMARCK, continually falsify the fine phrases which purport to prove the impossibility of their existence. It may be true or false that, as Señor CASTELAR asserts, M. THIERS is an eclectic in philosophy. It is more to the purpose that he happens to be the only celebrated man in France; and that he has consequently and wisely been selected to procure the evacuation of the conquered territory by the German army. In an interval of independent and original thought Señor CASTELAR happily illustrates the tendency of theory and rhetoric, or, as he calls it, of Utopia, to paralyse attempts to obtain liberty. The usurpation of LOUIS NAPOLEON was in his judgment rendered possible by the belief of the multitude that the members of the Assembly were not opposing the violation of law and right, but contending for their own pittance of salary.

If there is anything now still to be said about Jacobins and Girondists, or about the Commune of 1871, Señor CASTELAR has not said it. At one time he appears to be an admirer of COMTE, at another of DANTON; but the principal lesson which he deduces from a sketch of revolutionary history is that the boasted indivisibility of the French Republic has been the chief cause of its weakness. Lecturers on the so-called philosophy of history, like conjurors who make gold out of brass, necessarily in the first instance put into the crucible the conclusions which they afterwards carefully extract. As there never was a Federal Republic in France, it is obvious that French history can at the most only illustrate the proposition that, because centralization has failed, a federal organization might possibly have succeeded. The Girondists, who until the Paris rebellion of last year were the only French advocates of a kind of federalism, were the silliest and most unscrupulous of the many factions which have at different times contended for supremacy. The fanatics who lately proposed that every parish in France should be independent will not be regarded as high authority for the doctrines of Señor CASTELAR.

It is probable that while he is professedly speaking of France he thinks only of Spain. He may perhaps have written his Essay on French Republicanism solely for the purpose of obtaining a hearing on a subject with which he is more familiar. To English readers an exposition of the policy of his own party, or an inquiry into the political condition of his country, would have been infinitely more novel and more instructive than a reproduction of the well-known revolutionary formulas. It is something to learn that Señor CASTELAR sympathizes with the indignant love of provincial independence rather than with imported Jacobinism. There is reason to fear that by a section of his political allies he would be denounced as a reactionary aristocrat, because he plainly professes his desire to maintain the institution of property. He deserves credit for recognizing the truth, which is admitted by many French advocates of socialistic doctrines, that the organization of labour and the prohibition of private ownership inevitably involve absolute government. It is possible that there may be more suitable materials in Spain than in France for the federal system which Señor CASTELLAR would borrow from America, as he appears, like the majority of Continental Liberals, to be utterly unacquainted with English institutions. Whenever the Republican party attempts to possess itself of supreme power in Spain, it will necessarily for aggression and for defence concentrate all authority in the hands of a President or an Assembly. Señor CASTELLAR disapproves of Presidents because they tend to transform themselves into Kings, and of sovereign Assemblies as leading more circuitously to a state of things which he describes as a Parliamentary dictatorship. Unless he separates himself from his party, he will be compelled to waive his objection to a central Government nominated by universal suffrage.

The Republican leaders at Madrid, encouraged perhaps by the Carlist insurrection and by the manifestoes of the Duke of MONTPESSIER and of the partisans of Prince ALFONSO, have formally announced their determination never to recognize any Monarchy which may be established in Spain. If Señor CASTELLAR wishes to teach his political allies the very rudiments of freedom, he ought to inform them that England and America enjoy liberty, not because power is divided between provincial and central functionaries and assemblies, but because all parties have agreed to submit to the majority, or to the Government of the day. Nothing can be more unwise than the determination to form in perpetual succession a set of political non-jurors in default of obtaining a supremacy which would in turn be disputed by some other body of seceders. The Senators, Deputies, and Generals who have signed the paper in favour of Prince ALFONSO retain sufficient sense of decency to declare that they will not take any active steps to overthrow the existing dynasty. The Republicans openly avow, not merely their enmity to the Constitution, but their resolution to secure the triumph of their doctrine whether it is acceptable or odious to the community at large. Martyrs and implacable confessors are wholly out of place in constitutional and political struggles.

There is every reason to suspect that the Spanish Republicans are divided among themselves by differences which go far deeper than the distinction between a limited Monarchy and an orderly Republic. The members of the International would tolerate CASTELLAR as little as SAGASTA or King AMADEO if he persists in defending property, and in holding that co-operation offers the best chance of social and economic improvement to working-men. The Federal Republic would, at least in many parts of the country, offer little impediment to confiscation. Soon after the Revolution of 1868 several local Juntas celebrated the establishment of provincial independence by dividing among their members or supporters the property of the wealthier inhabitants. As the owners of personalty or of land would probably not allow themselves to be despoiled without resistance, the Federal Republic would commence in the midst of civil war, or rather of a series of civil wars. The first resort of the victims of Republican plunder would be to some vigorous soldier who would not trouble himself with theories of united or of federalized Republics. The elections have shown that the moderate parties command a large numerical majority, and it is probable that their forces would also be better organized. The tentative Republic which M. THIERS maintains in France has perhaps more prospect of vitality than the professed experiments which have been made in France, and which will sooner or later be imitated by Spain. Eclecticism and empiricism are the only philosophic tendencies to which, in the conduct of practical affairs, prudent statesmen incline.

THE MINES REGULATION BILL.

THE principle involved in the Mines Regulation Bill has been attacked from two opposite quarters. The mine-owning interest object to the Bill as unnecessary and vexatious. It assumes, they say, that they are careless about the lives of their workmen, and ready to sacrifice their own ultimate advantage rather than bear the cost of the precautions by which accidents may be averted. They say further that, taking this as its starting point, the Bill goes on to remedy an assumed want of common sense and common humanity by a series of impracticable requirements. The result of this policy will be that the virtuous and prudent mine-owner will gradually get rid of his mines and take his capital elsewhere. Mining enterprises will consequently be left in the hands of reckless adventurers who will risk fine and imprisonment in order to secure large profits. The public will pay more for their coal, the lives of the miners will be no better protected, and the law will be defied and discredited. Upon one aspect of their case the mine-owners have found an ally in Mr. FAWCETT. Besides the provisions designed to secure proper precaution against accident, and a minimum of education for miners' children, the Bill contains a clause enacting that, wherever the payments made to the men depend on the amount of material gotten, the calculation shall be made by weight, not by measure; and another clause enacting that wages shall be paid in money. Mr. FAWCETT objects to these provisions as being of the nature of an intervention on the part of the State between employers and workmen with the object of regulating wages. The ground of the men's objection to being paid by measure rather than by weight is the alleged uncertainty of the calculation, and the opportunity it gives the employer of distorting it to his own advantage. The ground of their objection to being paid in goods rather than in money is that the employer is thereby enabled to pay them a smaller sum than that to which they are nominally entitled. They agree with him for so many shillings a week, and he pays part of the sum in food or clothing which they could buy more cheaply for themselves. Both these complaints, says Mr. FAWCETT, are really equivalent to a complaint that wages are lower than they ought to be. The workman gets an amount of coal for which, if it were reckoned by weight, he would be paid twenty shillings, but because it is reckoned by measure he is paid only eighteen shillings. Or out of every twenty shillings which he receives ten are paid in goods which are really worth no more than eight shillings. Either way the real grievance is that his wages are ten per cent. lower than they ought to be. If he may come and ask Parliament to put things right for him when the deficiency is due to the mode of calculation, why may he not equally invoke the aid of Parliament when the deficiency is due to other causes? If the rate of wages is a point which must be settled between himself and his employer, why should we make an exception because the rate of wages happens to be in issue indirectly instead of directly?

As regards the charge brought against the Bill by the mine-owners, it admits of an answer from experience. No employer can have a greater interest in saving the lives of his workmen than a Railway Company has in saving the lives of its passengers. In the latter case the Company are liable in damages, and, as it usually turns out, in very heavy damages. It is to their obvious interest therefore to take every approved precaution against accidents. Yet, as all the world knows, facts do not in the least square with this reasoning. Lord CAMPBELL'S Act serves as a punishment to Railway Companies for being careless, but it has failed to make them careful. The dislike to incurring positive and immediate outlay merely to avoid a larger outlay at some uncertain and remote date leads them to run constant risks of hostile verdicts rather than insure themselves against actions by making travelling safer. But in the case of mine-owners the injury which follows upon an accident does not admit of being appreciated with equal certainty. A large loss of life among the workmen does not of necessity involve a corresponding loss of money to the employer. Whether it does so will depend upon the amount of plant or machinery destroyed, and upon the length of the period during which the mine has to be closed for repairs. This consideration is enough to justify the imposition of rules. The undue minuteness which is alleged to characterize the rules contained in the Mines Regulation Bill may be defended on another ground. The question whether the Act has been violated will be decided by a magistracy in which the mine-owners are very strongly represented, while the miners are not represented at all. It will be as though the administration of the Irish Land Act had been confided to Courts composed entirely of landlords. Under these circumstances it is important to leave as little as possible to the magistrates' discretion. There is not much fear that their decisions will be unjust, but there is more than fear that they will be prejudiced. The only way in which this tendency can be guarded against is, as far as possible, to resolve the questions submitted to them into issues of fact. When they have to pronounce whether a particular act is a violation of the law, they will probably come to a wrong conclusion; when they have only to ascertain whether a particular act has been committed, they can hardly go wrong unless they go wrong wilfully. Mr. FAWCETT's criticism is not quite so easily disposed of. There are the gravest objections to any interference with freedom of contract between master and workman which is not justified by an overwhelming necessity. No considerations of general philanthropy are sufficient here. The calamities which follow upon injudicious efforts to prescribe some other standard of wages than the higgling of the market are so formidable that it becomes a matter of great moment that Parliament should lend no show of countenance to any such delusion. But there is an appreciable difference, as it seems to us, between such an interference as Mr. FAWCETT deprecates and an interference which has for its object the regulation of the currency in which wages are to be paid. An attempt in this latter direction is of the nature of the laws which prescribe that the sovereign shall be of a certain weight and quality. Their object is not to supersede bargaining between employers and workmen; it is rather to make that bargaining more direct and intelligible. It would lead to great confusion if employers were allowed to contract with their workmen to pay them in shillings which should be worth only tenpence, and there is no difference in kind between denying them the power to do this and denying them the power to pay their workmen in goods which may be equally below their nominal value.

The mine-owners have fought hard to get the stringency of the Bill reduced, and they have not been altogether unsuccessful. It is true that Mr. STAVELEY HILL's insertion of "knowingly" may be regarded as practically got rid of, but a compromise was arrived at on Thursday which considerably reduces the responsibility of owners and managers. The owner will, if he is charged with violating the law, still have to show that he has taken all reasonable means to secure compliance with it. But he will be held to have conformed to this requirement if he has published and enforced the regulations. In the hands of an unprejudiced judge this qualification would do no harm. It is difficult to feel equally certain that in the hands of a prejudiced local magistracy "enforcing" may not be interpreted as implying very little more than "publishing," while "publishing" may in turn be reduced to mere placarding them at the mouth of the mine. A further concession on the part of the Government confines the right of instituting prosecutions to Government Inspectors. Petty and vexatious litigation is certainly not a thing to be encouraged, but if the right of putting the law into action is thus limited, the HOME SECRETARY ought to be extremely careful in his selection of Inspectors. Two other attempts to lessen the liability of owners suffered a just defeat. Mr. ELLIOT proposed that mines should only be ventilated "under ordinary circumstances" — forgetful apparently that the sudden appearance of unforeseen danger at once takes a case out of the category of ordinary circumstances, and invests it with a special character. Mr. CROSS was anxious that imprisonment should be reserved for actual workmen, while owners and managers, no matter how guilty they may be, should incur nothing worse than a fine. Fortunately the House of Commons rejected the former amendment, and showed so little sympathy for the latter that it was not pressed to a division.

GENERAL CLUSERET AND THE FENIANS.

GENERAL CLUSERET may not be a great general, or, indeed, for the matter of that, a general at all, except in the sense in which hairdressers and acrobats sometimes call themselves professors, but he would have us believe that at least he is a very candid person. He has just published the secret history of the Fenian movement as far as he had any connexion with it, and the candour of his history is as that of Mrs. CANDOUR herself. From his youth upwards, it seems, General CLUSERET has worshipped Humanity, but as the years have rolled on, the object of his worship has passed more and more into an abstract form. He still believes in Humanity in the abstract, but he appears to have a very low opinion of men in the concrete. He has more reason than M. THIERS, he says, for calling the multitude vile; the reason being, we suppose, that M. THIERS is, and he is not, President of the French Republic. M. THIERS, it is true, did not take an active part in the war against the Germans, but he exerted himself first to procure for France the assistance of other Powers, and, when this hope failed, the best terms that could be obtained from the enemy; and his countrymen are perhaps justified in believing that in this way he served them as effectually as if he had lent the weight of his stalwart person and brawny arm to the defence of his country in the field. General CLUSERET drew his sword on behalf of France, but he had no idea of fleshing it in the Germans. As far as we are aware, the services he rendered to France consisted in stirring up sedition and rioting among her own people. General CLUSERET did not join CHANZY or even GARIBALDI, but he found a more glorious, congenial, and perhaps prudent, mission in exciting domestic strife at a comfortable distance from the seat of war. He got through a good deal of violent oratory, but his sword proved to be rather a figure of speech than a weapon for actual use. We remember a little boy once asking an officer in a drawing-room whether he was a real soldier—had he ever killed anybody? And possibly General CLUSERET, though he has a good deal of bloodshed to answer for, may not have reason to be distressed by the remembrance of having personally added much to the carnage of any of the conflicts for which he is responsible. He figured mysteriously in Paris during the reign of the Commune; but he "was beaten," he tells us, "by those he defended," and he had no difficulty in making his escape in good time. It is difficult to know how much to believe of his narrative of the Fenian conspiracy, but it tends at least to confirm our impression of the remarkable personal prudence which appears to distinguish most of the General's feats. He states that he undertook to be ready to place himself at the head of an army of 10,000 Fenians, thoroughly equipped, and provided with every kind of matériel for a campaign. Oddly enough, this army was not forthcoming, and General CLUSERET did not have the opportunity of displaying his conditional heroism. It is not stated whether, during the interval when it was supposed that this army of the future was being formed, he drew pay and allowances as generalissimo; but it would appear from his own story that he never at any moment discharged any of the duties of the office, that he held himself carefully aloof from all the perils of conspiracy, and that he refused to go beyond his original bargain to command 10,000 men, when they were shown to his satisfaction to exist, not on paper, but in the field. We can only say that it strikes us that this was a very safe bargain under the circumstances. General CLUSERET intimates that he has no confidence in the Fenians, but perhaps the Fenians may think they had some reason for not having much confidence in him; and this opinion will naturally be strengthened by his present revelations.

It appears that General CLUSERET can conceive of no reason for his being in such very bad odour in France except his connexion with Fenianism, and he chooses Fraser's Magazine as a natural medium of communication with the French people on the subject. He falls into the view that the Fenian expedition which began to be planned in 1866 was one of the consequences of the Civil War in the United States. The Irish who had taken part in it were in the mood for fighting, and they thought the moment propitious for securing the assistance, either covert or open, of the American Government in an attack upon England, as a reward for their military services. There was in the first instance no difficulty in raising money for this object; but "with the military chest well filled came complications and intrigues." The subscribers had paid for a fight, and a fight they were determined to have; and it was thought advisable to do something in order to keep up the flow of money. The first Fenian expedition—a raid on Canada—collapsed at the outset. The generals and the troops were, according to CLUSERET, alike drunk, and treachery and vain-boasting had disclosed their plans before they were ready to be put in action. CLUSERET had all along sympathized with the movement, and been ready to join it. In the first place, he had had no fighting for a couple of years, and had begun to long for some; and, in the second place, the Irish cause was in his eyes the cause of Humanity itself. But it was not till he met STEPHENS in New York that he went seriously into the matter. He had seen a photograph of STEPHENS, and did not like his "feline aspect," but friends brought them together, and he was persuaded to trust him. He found STEPHENS an adept at organization, but vain, despotic, overbearing, and useless for action. Ireland had been mapped out into districts, and a large body of men enrolled, but arms and ammunition were wanting, and there were no funds to purchase them. The "general expenses" of the movement were heavy. "The apartments of STEPHENS at the Metropolitan Hotel cost a good deal; that at No. —, Thirteenth Street, though less expensive, still stood for a large figure." Then the prisoners had to be provided for, agents of all kinds were continually crossing the sea, and in one way or another all the money of the association was swallowed up. What arms the Fenians had were, along with a couple of blockade-runners, in the possession of a party of the leaders who insisted upon making America the basis of their operations, while the others wished to act in Ireland. CLUSERET joined with STEPHENS in supporting the latter policy. They discussed together the resources of England, making allowance for the forces in the colonies, and for those retained in garrison at home and abroad, and the time that would be required for troops engaged in foreign service to return to England. They also took into account the Fenians in the English army, and the disorder they might cause in the ranks. They calculated the means of transport from one port to another, and came at last to the conclusion that the English Government could not for ninety days have at its disposal in Ireland more than 30,000 effective men, and that 10,000 resolute Fenians acting in their own country with energy and rapidity, and under the shelter of popular sympathy, would be able to seize upon the most important points for landing troops and the chief communications, and to break up and crush the English forces before assistance could arrive. CLUSERET drew up a plan of the campaign, and it only remained to provide the army. Money was indispensable, but, on account of previous disappointments, money could be obtained only by promising that active hostilities should begin before the end of 1867. This engagement brought in plentiful subscriptions. As the money came in, STEPHENS seems to have cooled in his bellicose determination, but his associates insisted upon going on with the project of insurrection; one of the blockade-runners was sold at a great sacrifice to provide for the preliminary expenses of the campaign, and CLUSERET and a dozen head-centres crossed the sea to organize a rising.

In London CLUSERET found the same jealousies, rivalries, and dissensions among the Fenian leaders as in New York. He was careful not to compromise himself up with them, and stuck to the terms of his bargain. When there were 10,000 men in the field he would undertake to command them. After consultation with MAZZINI, LEDRU ROLLIN, BRADLAUGH, and many "influential members of the Reform League," he came to the conclusion that the Irish question could be settled only by English co-operation. He had a nocturnal interview with the members of the Executive Committee of the League; it is not stated whether the conspirators went muffled in long cloaks, and we are sorry there is no report of the conference. But the result appears to have been that the Reform League offered to "join hand in hand" with the Fenians, and to "make a platform which should be acceptable to both parties," and that at "the house of one of the most important members of the Committee of the Reform League" the basis of an agreement between Fenianism and the League was agreed upon. It was part of the compact that the Fenians should be ready to support the League against the police in holding its illegal demonstrations in Trafalgar Square. As soon as the Fenians attempted to put their plans into execution they fell into confusion. The attack on Chester Castle was, as CLUSERET admits, foolish and impracticable, and he would have nothing to do with it. The rising in Ireland was ruined by want of arms and ammunition, and by the drunken treachery of one of the leaders, whom CLUSERET one night found "completely drunk, and smoking expensive cigars," and who soon after stumbled into the midst of a detachment of English soldiers, was captured, and then gave up the names of his associates. When CLUSERET heard this news, "being entirely without baggage"—as, he tells us, he always takes care to be in circumstances of this kind—he lost no time in quitting England.

There is nothing new in this narrative except as to the proceedings of the writer himself, and the reckless "cosmopolitanism" of the Reform League, the rump of which Mr. MIALL lately endeavoured to enlist in an agitation against the Church of England; but it confirms what was previously known of the internal weakness of the Fenian insurrection. Perhaps the strongest proof of its weakness was that it had to depend for generalship on General CLUSERET. It is unnecessary for us to decide whether CLUSERET is the knave he is accused of being, or the fool his nonsensical talk about the fraternity and solidarity of humanity might lead one to suppose. He says that COBDEN was a communard and anti-patriot in the best sense of the word, and an honest man besides; but we should be disposed to apply these epithets to the General in their worst sense, and to say nothing of his honesty. He seems to be a characteristic example of the unscrupulous and unprincipled commis-voyageur of Revolution. He has the greatest contempt for the Fenian leaders, calls their expedition foolish and impracticable, and admits that they could not have established a government if they had succeeded. He recommends the Irish, who have no hope, he says, of the slightest help from either America or France, to drink less whiskey, to agree among themselves, and to coalesce with the English. But there is not the slightest hint in his explanation of any regret for having egged on the Fenians in their wicked and hopeless effort to upset a Government which, on his own showing, was at least much better than anything they could have substituted for it. It is perhaps a significant circumstance that General CLUSERET's chief quarrel with the Commune was, on his own confession, as to the propriety of looting the Bank of France. He was in favour of this measure, while his associates, to do them justice, were against it.

THE STUDY OF HISTORY AT CAMBRIDGE.

A dire difficulty is said of late to have severely exercised some tender consciences among the resident members of the University of Cambridge. For the first time in her annals a divine strange to the bosom of the University was summoned to fill her pulpit in the academical hours of a Sunday afternoon. The protest against his intrusion having proved futile, it remains unknown what steps are in contemplation to prevent the repeated violation of a useless tradition. It so happens that the study of history at Cambridge has not yet reached so advanced a stage as to produce an unworthy jealousy of non-Cambridge historical luminaries; and the "Rede" Lecture of the current year, which had been most judiciously committed to Mr. E. A. Freeman, was not only listened to with respect in the body of the Senate House, and applauded with enthusiasm in the galleries, but may be destined to aid in the long-desired development of a study which the lecturer must have specially at heart. It would indeed be a worthy response on the part of the University to the wise teachings of her guest were the study of history at Cambridge to be re-organized, or rather for the first time to be made a reality, on a system essentially in accordance with the views urged in his masterly address.

There can be no difficulty in deciding what is needed to place the study of history at Cambridge on a footing of adequate dignity and usefulness, if it be remembered what has hitherto been done and what has hitherto been left undone. The records of positive performance are singularly short and simple. Regius Professors of Modern History have no doubt lectured at more or less decent intervals, both before and after the French Revolution supplied them with a favourite subject for their courses. As the offices of Historiographer-Royal and Poet-Laureate were at one time combined at the English Court, so at Cambridge the Professor of Modern History has added to the arduous duties of his chair the responsibilities of poet ex officio to the University. Gray, "the celebrated poet" (by brevet of the University Calendar), indited a splendid Installation Ode in honour of the Duke of Grafton (which must have often consoled the victim of Junius), even as Mr. Kingsley at a later date celebrated the ancestral glories of the house of Cavendish. Among Gray's successors Professor Smyth is still remembered as one of the last Whigs who ever haunted a Cambridge Combination Room; and his lectures on the French Revolution are as respectable as his Latin verses. After him the late Sir James Stephen did honour to the chair, and if he did not materially add to the extent of historical knowledge or to the growth of historical criticism, yet he contributed something towards a more sympathetic treatment of more than one class of historical questions. Then ensued Mr. Kingsley's brief official honeymoon with the Muse of History, the deceitful hollowness of whose charms he has since so cynically revealed. Professor Seeley's career has as yet been too brief to admit of comment. But no past Professor has virtually attempted more than the delivery of occasional courses of lectures; nor is it pretended that the institution of the system of professorial certificates, or the more recent special examinations in history for the ordinary degree—a kind of visa to the passport which ensures the distinction of a B.A. without honours—has materially advanced the study of history. It was accordingly felt, a few years back, by a small but resolute band of believers, that something more must be done to promote the special study of a subject which the University had hitherto been contented to treat as an agreeable parergon. The example of Oxford suggested the doubtful experiment of constituting (if the mixture of metaphor be permitted) a two-legged Tripos; and "Modern History" was for a time united with Law in a marriage de convenance. Undoubtedly there are numerous points of contact between the two sciences, and the knowledge of one is irreconcilable with ignorance of the other. But there are many other sciences with which history is at least equally closely connected; and indeed she had, we believe, at one time formed one of the happy family known as the Moral Sciences Tripos. But at Cambridge as at Oxford (where it has since been dissolved) her union with Law proved more barren than had been expected; at Cambridge, at all events, the equality of conjugal rights is only nominal; the budding barrister regards the "getting-up" of certain specified periods of history as an unmitigated nuisance, interfering unwarrantably with his willing devotion to Gaius and Blackstone, while the obvious necessity of requiring only a limited knowledge of special portions of "Modern History" from all the candidates in the joint Tripos has produced a dead level of mediocrity in the historical performances of the large majority among them. A general consent of experience has accordingly recommended a divorce between a hastily assorted couple. Law will probably, as becomes a faculty of academical studies, be left to itself; and the question arises, What is to become of "Modern History"; for "Modern History" alone owns a Professor at Cambridge, "Modern History" alone has received a quasi-independent recognition in her range of studies, and "Modern History," if left to itself, may not improbably run the risk of being left to itself out in the cold.

A Syndicate has, we believe, been appointed to take this difficulty into consideration. We would fain hope that this Syndicate, upon whose recommendations the immediate future of historical study in one of our chief seats of learning must virtually depend, will be found equal to its splendid opportunity. And for once safety seems to lie in a radical reform. A death-blow should be boldly dealt to the absurd pedantry which has established as a quasi-scientific division the futile distinction between ancient and modern history. Granting that the fall of the Roman Empire of the West constitutes a broad landmark as convenient as it is unmistakable, granting that much of the unity which the revival of the Roman Empire gives to later European history is fictitious only, yet what pretence is there for the assumption that there is a bar at the boundary, and that the study of the life of the world can be cut in twain like a sheet of paper? As well might the sagacious distinction be maintained which Holmgrooke draws somewhere in his Letters on History, between the period which has to be "studied" and that which has only to be "read." But it seems unnecessary to dilate upon so obvious a truth. After the forcible remarks on this head by Mr. Freeman in his "Rede" lecture, what shadow of excuse can remain for upholding this futile protest against the "unity of history," and for forcing the veriest beginner into beginning at a half-way house with "modern history," while "ancient history" is relegated into the tangled depths of the Classical Tripos?

In other words, an Historical Tripos which shall include history at large is the one reasonable solution of the problem. Such a proposal is certain to meet with manifold objections; but these objections it will surely not be difficult to refute. With those who object to the multiplication of triposes in general it is indeed not easy to argue; for their objection amounts to one against the extension of University studies in general. They convert Leibnitz's profound apophthegm of Non nulla sed multum from a plea for thoroughness into a cry for oversidedness. The old studies will not suffer by the competition of the new, if the new are but enabled worthily to range themselves by the side of the old. And if it is feared lest the uncertainty of reward will deter undergraduates or bachelors from seeking distinction in a new Tripos, is not the remedy in the hands of the Colleges themselves? But there are others who will confine their protest to the particular Tripos proposed. It is indeed wonderful that the possibility of systematically pursuing the study of history should be denied by those who have not even taken the trouble to compare the experience of the great Continental schools where Ranke and others have trained generations of historical students as systematically and successfully as Moltke has trained staffs of military officers. A more specious objection is limine will be urged by many who hold by the principle that "examination is to the student what the target is to the rifleman." The primary object of education is, they say, to give power, and the primary object of examination is to test it. On this principle Cambridge has proceeded and has thriven: this object is fulfilled in the case of the Mathematical, and even of the Classical, and certain other Triposes; but to examine a man in history is merely to ascertain whether he has within a given time amassed a certain amount of information—in other words, to set a premium on "cram." To these arguments the answer is, that in examination, as in study, everything depends upon method. Make the examination at once comprehensive in its range, and searching in special points, and it cannot fail as a test of power. Historical power lies not only in the accumulation of materials; it includes the criticism of them, the combination of them, the reasoning from them directly and by analogy, and the artistic reproduction of them for the demands of intelligence and taste. Nor is the hope Utopian, that the promise of such results can be ensured in a general Historical Tripos. As Mr. Freeman says, no man can be "equally familiar with the tongue, the literature, the political constitutions, the civil and military events of all times and places." But

It is none the less true that the student of history or of language—and he who is a student of either must be in no small degree a student of the other—must take in all history and all language within his range. The degrees of his knowledge of various languages, of various branches of history, will vary infinitely. Of some branches he must know everything, but of every branch he must know something. Each student will have his own special range, the times and places which he chooses for his special and minute study. . . . Some branches must in every case be primary and some secondary: which are primary and which are secondary will of course differ in the case of each particular student. It is enough if each man, while thoroughly mastering the branches of his own choice, knows at least enough of the other branches to have a clear and abiding conception of their relation to his own special branches and to one another.

It is this medium of special and of general knowledge which it should be the business of a history examination to test. The present is not the time or the place to indicate the features of a scheme by which such a result might be secured. It is enough to insist that a fair knowledge of general history, and a special knowledge of a special period, to be selected, if possible, within a given range by the candidate himself, should alone be held to qualify for historical honours. And it is here that the so-called "classical" training which many undergraduates bring up to the University, and which they there augment and perfect, would serve at once as an equipment and an encouragement. The Classical Tripos is heavily enough weighted already; it is indeed, in the opinion of some, overweighted by the effect of recent changes. In it History should hold no other than an exegetical place; historical study proper, and its proper fruit, the power of historical criticism, should be cultivated in a field of their own. Nor is there any good reason to fear that the result might be, at first at all events, to drive "Modern History" into the background by associating it with "Ancient." The man who has been led by the close study of the classics to the special study of what is called ancient history is the most promising student of history in general; and it is not those who study, but those who ignore, the history of Greece and Rome who are indifferent to that of their own country and of the modern world in general. So much at least might be learnt from the examples of Macaulay, of Arnold, and of many others whose names our Universities justly boast. Nor is the feeblest of all arguments against a systematic study of history likely to derive any strength from the consideration suggested by the mention of great autodidacts of any country or age. The study of history is indeed independent in its vitality of encouragement by triposes and their rewards; but it depends upon the action of the stewards of our great academical endowments whether that study shall in future, as heretofore, be left to individual and isolated effort, or be made more general and systematic, and thus more vigorous and national, by a judiciously liberal use of such opportunities as that which Cambridge now has before her.

A ROMANTIC SPORT.

IN one of his recent volumes Mr. Froude describes a kind of sport which prevailed some three centuries ago, when Ireland was practically as far removed from us as the Western States of America are now. An English gentleman announced, for the information of his superiors, that he had had "some killing," and gave details of the success which had attended his performance. There was a touching simplicity in the phrase which could not be too highly commended. The animals killed on this occasion belonged to that peculiar race of bipeds which still abounds, thanks to its prolific tendencies, in the sister island, although by this time it is almost as numerous on the other side of the Atlantic. Certain prejudices which have been gathering strength in modern times have pretty well extinguished this particular variety of amusement. Killing, as applied to the human race, is considered to be discreditable, and indeed is a punishable offence, except when pursued under due regulations. But the phrase gives the essence of the pleasure derived from sport, and the tendency is for the attendant circumstances to become of less importance, and for the amusement to become more distinctly killing pure and simple. In former days sport was supposed to imply a considerable amount of personal adventure, of enjoyment of fresh country air, and of a kind of unconscious exposure of the sportsman's mind to all the influences of natural scenery. But now we are rapidly becoming wiser. We take our pleasure in its concentrated essence; we enjoy the infliction of death upon the brute creation without endeavouring to surround it with romantic but superfluous circumstances. It is sufficient for the modern sportsman to kill a quantity of half-tame pheasants, or to slaughter pigeons without taking any more trouble or risk than is involved in a journey to a London suburb and the discharge of a gun from a fixed standing-point. The difference, in short, between the amusement of the sportsman and the trade of the butcher or poulterer tends to become evanescent; and to all appearance the nobility and gentry will before long be able to derive sufficient amusement by hiring themselves out to prepare the daily supplies of food for the London market.

There are, however, still vast regions where the amusement may still be enjoyed under something of its old form. There are lions and rhinoceroses in Africa, tigers in India; and, we might be disposed to add, buffaloes and grizzlies in America. Have we not all pored in our childhood over the pages of Fenimore Cooper? Who does not cherish a warm affection for the admirable Natty Bumppo and his red-skinned companions? We have wondered at the marvellous precision of the backwoodsman's rifle, and the superhuman instinct by which the savage tracked his prey through the haunts of his deadliest enemies. We know of course that the social condition of the Far West has undergone a great revolution. The noble savage has dwindled into a drunken, disreputable hanger-on of civilization; the backwoodsman is being rapidly supplanted by the gentlemen whose peculiarities give an original flavour to the pages of Bret Harte. The railway is a convenient substitute for the war path of the original Indian. And yet, great and rapid as is the change, we had fancied it at the remoter parts of the American continent still included vast territories where the adventurous traveller might find a touch of romance lingering amongst the prairies or the gorges of the Rocky Mountains. Perhaps it may be so; but we have received a severe shock to our faith. Already, it seems, a vast section of the West is in process of annexation to civilization. A certain Mr. Schallen, the representative of the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, has circulated a document only too well calculated to dispel any fond illusions. A grand buffalo-hunt, he informs us, is to take place in Nebraska during the ensuing autumn; this hunt is to be "in every way suited"—not, alas! to the Western hunter or to the Red Indian—but "to the nobility and gentry of Great Britain." For the trifling sum of ninety guineas any member of those favoured classes may enjoy seven weeks' pleasure. He will cross the Atlantic, proceed in palace cars from New York to Chicago, view the burnt city, and then travel in a train, to which a dining-room car will be attached, to the home of the buffalo. During his adventurous chase he will be followed by an "efficient corps of cooks," with tents, beds, grooms, and "everything generally found in a first-class hotel." All arrangements have been made to give the party "the greatest amount of pleasure with the least possible trouble," or, in fact, to enable the nobility and gentry to fancy themselves at Hurlingham with the single difference that a buffalo presents a larger mark than a pigeon. It is supposed that some members of the party will be troubled with an inconvenient amount of conscience. To meet this possible case, waggons will be provided to carry "trophies of the chase," such as elk horns and buffalo skins. The more sensible sportsmen will probably purchase their stock of trophies in New York or Liverpool. With touching modesty Mr. Schaller concludes by saying:—"I may possibly accompany the party, as well as Mr. Dawson, but nothing will be left undone to ensure the comfort of the travellers." We can only interpret this in accordance with the rules of grammar by supposing that Mr. Schaller is delicately hinting that, even if he accompanies the party, he will not make his society obtrusive. Probably, in such an aristocratic gathering, the members of the expedition will insist upon having it understood that nobody, even if he were Chin-gach-gook himself, should speak to them without an introduction. Finally, we have to observe that ladies may be admitted to share in this refined amusement by paying ten guineas more than the price fixed for gentlemen. A few additional regulations which might be suggested are left to the natural tastes of the gallant sportsman. Nobody would of course venture to show himself without kid gloves, and every one will dress for dinner. To save unnecessary trouble and disappointment, the buffaloes will be induced to present themselves in the neighbourhood of the camp at an hour which will permit of a comfortable cigar after breakfast; and a proper interval will be allowed for luncheon. Some things of course must be a little rough on a first experiment; but in another year or two an expedition to Nebraska will be attended with no more discomfort than a journey to Ascot. It is to be hoped that game-laws may be passed providing against an excessive slaughter; and we shall then have every reason to hope that the Nebraska buffalo-hunt may become part of the recognized programme for the Parliamentary recess. Nothing—for we find ourselves unable to avoid the recognized formula—could do more to promote international amicitiae; the representatives of the two nations will acquire the habit of aiming their rifles at a common foe instead of firing at each other; and there is no greater bond of alliance than when two strong men agree to suppress a weak neighbour. Moreover, the mere sight of a British nobleman is known to produce a strong effect upon Republican nerves; and the more intimate Americans become with so admirable a type of humanity the more they will admire the institutions which have favoured his growth. Who knows but that after the fine old English gentleman has been watched by these democrats at his amusements, they may think about setting up a House of Lords?

It is not for us to find any fault with a plan so carefully organized and so admirably adapted to the taste of the British public. There is, however, one suggestion which forcibly occurs to us. The country, as we have seen, is being rapidly reduced into decent order. There are, as Mr. Schaller informs us in capital letters, no hostile Indians in Nebraska whatever; none of the sportsmen need be afraid of leaving their scalps in exchange for a buffalo skin; and doubtless there will be a general feeling of gratitude to our cousins for the completeness with which they have removed one of the greatest nuisances of the country. Perhaps their primary object in carrying out this reform was not the convenience of English sportsmen, but the result is the same so far as we are concerned. The only Indians now left are certain friendly Pawnees and others, who in character are something between gipsies and gamekeepers. And yet, though this removes one great objection to the region of the chase, we feel that the Western States are not yet up to a European standard in point of comfort. There are many little hardships which it will be impossible entirely to obviate; mosquitoes have survived the Indians, and the coons—unless they are transported bodily from New York or Paris—are likely to be distinctly inferior to those of an English club. It therefore becomes worth while to consider whether, instead of transporting the nobility and gentry, with all the paraphernalia which are necessary to their comfort, to the haunts of the game, it would not be better to bring the game to the nobility and gentry. One of the earliest successes of the immortal Barnum, if we remember rightly, was a grand buffalo-hunt in the neighbourhood of New York. It is true that on that occasion the show of buffaloes was shabby; but the means of transport have improved since his day. A herd of buffaloes brought to England and exhibited, say, on Obolham ridge or in Epping Forest, would draw such crowds from London that it would be well worth the while of the railway companies to pay the expenses of the transport. Leave to shoot them would of course be sold at a high rate. And moreover, if there were any difficulty about bringing over buffaloes enough, the herd might be satisfactorily filled up by British cattle. A few Smithfield drovers of the old stamp would soon drive them wild enough for all practical purposes, and would be in themselves quite as picturesque figures as the Red Indian of the present day. No patriot should admit that an English short-horn is inferior to an American buffalo; he is about as easy to hit, and the danger incurred in the pursuit would be about equal in the two cases. The objection to killing tame animals has almost vanished already; and if the account of the preparations made for the Nebraska buffalo-hunt are trustworthy, it would appear that the sport is not intended to include the smallest spice of adventure, or to give any opportunity for skill in anything but aiming a rifle. Why not, then, secure the additional comfort which would be easily secured by locating—an Americanism is appropriate—the hunt within these islands?

There is one reason for this which, we must confess, weighs pretty strongly with us. The true object of the expedition is to enable certain persons to kill a number of big bovine animals, which may be done as easily in England as in America. It appears, however, that there are some other creatures in America which are thrown in by way of bonus. Nothing is said of the grisly bear, and we hope that he is as unknown in Nebraska as the hostile Indian, but there are deer, beavers, wild turkeys, and other game. Turkeys are to be found in England, and probably with less trouble, and so are deer; but we have a kind of sentimental affection for the beaver. We were told so many lies about him in our nurseries that we should be sorry for his final extirpation. Very likely he is no more intelligent than a number of other creatures which have by no means his position in that charming collection of fables which we used to call natural history; but yet a kind of halo rests upon him in our imaginations of which we wish that he should have the benefit. He is a sacred animal in a small way, and is associated in our minds with all manner of excellent moral aphorisms. We connect him with the busy bee and the half-reasoning elephant, and a number of other venerable impostors; and we feel as if we should be guilty of gross ingratitude in turning in upon him a host of cockneys with just enough interest in him to take additional pleasure in killing him. The change in the fashion of hats is said to have given him a breathing-space; but when he once comes within the remorseless sway of the genuine British sportsman, he will be extirpated as calmly as though he were a human being. Nothing would apparently be more to the taste of the thoroughbred destructive than the slaughter of the last dodo or great auk, or other representative of an expiring race, for the feat would necessarily remain unique. Much as we love the beaver, however, he is merely an instance of a general principle. Raise the sluices to admit the deluge of cockneydom, and the last faint shadow of romance will disappear from the American wilderness. The pleasures of killing are so great that it is probably vain to protest. Wherever a killable animal is to be found there will the cockney be gathered together, and he will kill more than the animal. He will slay the imaginary beings that still haunt the wild regions of the earth. Before many generations are past there will not be a single eminence above the deluge where the fancy can find room whereon to perch. If it is in one sense useless to complain, it is still impossible not to utter some protest against a more than usually irritating case of annexation of the realm of old romance by the miserable dominion of the prosaic.

LEODIUM.

NO city which at any time formed part of the older Roman Empire can reasonably object to being called by its Latin name. We have often wished that we might use the name "Romi" for the metropolitan city of France, instead of having either to make a sound through our noses to which our noses feel quite unable to do justice, or else to offend polite ears by talking of "Rhemes" as our forefathers did. But with the city which plays such a part in the story of Quentin Durward our difficulties are greater still. The ancient Leodium is known in one tongue as Lüttich, in another as Liège, in a third as Luik or Leuk—we think we have seen it written both ways. But we are haunted by a suspicion, which we have but poor means of verifying, that neither Lüttich nor Liège nor Leuk is the genuine name of the place. It is easy enough to find out the true names of the places where French is the high-polite, but Flemish the genuine native speech. Not even a Parisian could persuade himself that the honest Low-Dutch speech of Flanders, English which has stayed at home, was a form of "bad French." Flemish therefore asserts its rights; all things at Antwerp are bilingual; the market is full of people to whom French is as utterly unknown as it could be in Leicester-shire. Flemish books, Flemish newspapers, greet the traveller at every step; he can easily learn that the city which Englishmen used to call Mechlin, as they still do so when speaking of lace, which in High-Dutch is Mechelen, and which in French has sunk into Malines, is in its own natural tongue Mechelen. But at Leodium we have no such help. French is of course the high-polite speech, and Flemish is certainly not the natural speech. The natural speech is Walloon, a Romance dialect which may fairly pass as a language independent of French. It may be heard by those who will look for it with its sounds distinctly Romanesque, but as distinctly not French. But in the mind of any Frenchman or French-speaking person such a tongue is a mere corruption of French of Paris, and it is not entitled even to that measure of toleration which he may be constrained to grant to forms of speech which he cannot anyhow make out to have anything to do with his own language. Walloon therefore is in the same case as the speech of oc, the speech of troubadours and Albigenes, actually is in Aquitaine and Provence; it is in the same case in which the tongues of Dante and Calderon might have come to be if only the Buonapartes had kept their Italian and Spanish thrones long enough. It is "bad French," and no notice can be taken of it. Hence at Antwerp everything is written up in Flemish as well as in French, giving the inquiring traveller a pleasant lesson in Low-Dutch. But nothing is written up in Walloon in the city of St. Lambert, and the traveller who doubts the fitness of either Liège, Lüttich, or Leuk, may be tempted to fall back on Leodium. Older Teutonic forms like Luticha and Ludike, Latin forms like Leodia, Legia, Liugas, do not help us in getting at the genuine Walloon. If we talk of Liège, we use the name in high-polite use on the spot; but we suggest the notion of the place being French. If we say Lüttich, we preserve the memory of the fact that, till the latest times, Leodium remained a Bishopric of the Empire, but we use a name which is unknown on the spot. For historical purposes Leodium is safest.

The history of the city is mainly the history of the Bishopric; during its most exciting period it is the history of the struggles of the citizens with their ecclesiastical lords. Leodium, at all events as a place of any importance, belongs to the class of cities which, like Wells and the younger Salisbury in our own land, gathered round an episcopal church. The name of the place is most likely Teutonic, and if it existed at all in Roman times, it never rose to any fame. Its real history begins under the later Merwings, or more truly under the Austrasian Mayors, the place lying among the immediate possessions of the House of Herstall. The greatness of Leodium began with a martyrdom. St. Lambert, Bishop of Tongres, in which diocese the place then stood, paid his life as the forfeit of his apostolic boldness for rebuking the vices of the ducal house. The blood of the martyr was in truth, in its own sense, the seed of the Church. The next Bishop, Hubert, translated the body of his predecessor to the scene of his death, and translated the episcopal throne along with it. The successors of St. Lambert, like the other prelates of the Empire, were endowed by the Carolingian Kings with vast estates and great temporal rights, and thus the ecclesiastical principality arose. It lasted with various fortunes till the general crash in which the world was involved by the movements of revolutionary France. Any careful map of the last century will show the Austrian Netherlands intersected by one or two narrow strips of territory coloured of the same tint as the Empire, which mark the temporal dominions of the successors of St. Lambert. Of these prelates the most famous was Notger, who reigned from 971 to 1008, and whose chief business was to bring the turbulent feudatories of the neighbourhood into submission to law in some shape or other. But the history of the bishopric is, as we have hinted, mainly made up of quarrels between the Bishops and the citizens. They were unluckily placed towards one another. The citizens never became strong enough to win complete independence, and to set up a sovereign commonwealth owning no King but Cæsar. On the other hand, they were too strong to abide in a regular and orderly state of submission, like a town which is confessedly subject. Leodium was more than a Landstadt, without rising to the dignity of a Reichstadt. The result was confusions, conspiracies, and crimes without end committed on both sides. At one time, namely in the fifteenth century, these local disputes grew into European importance on account of their connexion with the advance of the Dukes of Burgundy on the House of Valois. Without diving very deep into the local chronicles, it is easy to see that in no part of the world was there a state of things more admirably suited to promote dissension and confusion of every kind. There was the prince, there was his chapter, one of the noblest and most exclusive in the Empire, there were the nobles of the bishopric and of the city, there were the citizens with as many distinctions among themselves as were to be found in Geneva itself, and there were the other towns and districts of the neighbourhood which claimed more or less of local independence. Yet through all this the city contrived to flourish; and now, no longer either a principality or a commonwealth, but the local capital of a province of the kingdom of Belgium, the city flourishes as it never flourished before, as the great centre of the iron trade of the country.

The "noble city," as of old times it delighted to call itself, deserves its name alike from the beauty of its position and from the splendour of its buildings, and this although the great ornament of the city has perished. The church of Hubert was succeeded by the church of Notger, in which St. Bernard preached before a Pope and an Emperor, the second Innocent and the second Lothar. At the end of the eleventh century the church of Notger again perished by fire, and was succeeded by the building which lasted till the confusions of 1793, when the body which called itself La Convention Nationale Liégeoise decreed unanimously "que l'édifice gothique, ci-devant cathédrale, sera démolé." (One would be curious to know the exact meaning which the word "gothique" carried to the mind of a National Convention in the year 1793.) The work was done, but done gradually. It was however done in the end so thoroughly that not a stone is now left. The church of St. Lambert, with its two western towers, and a third tower with a lofty spire adjoining the choir, has gone, and it has left no memory of itself beyond giving its name to the empty place which marks its site. But hard by it stands the stately palace of the Prince-Bishops, now become the provincial palace of justice; a striking building, in the confused and inconsistent style of the first part of the sixteenth century, with pillars and capitals strange according to either classical or mediæval standards, the general effect of which is rich and not unpleasant. The rich cloister which surrounds the inner court has suggested to some minds a likeness to the Doge's Palace, but it is hard to see any further likeness than that which must exist among all open arcades resting on columns. At all events, the Renaissance building looks well in comparison with the modern Italian front which has supplanted it on one side.

The position of the cathedral and the palace illustrates the history of the city. Leodium is not one of the hill-fort cities like Chartres and Geneva, where the cathedral crowns the highest point, nor yet one of the island cities like Paris and Châlons, where the cathedral stands in the midst of the river. When an episcopal throne, as here and at Exeter, has been translated in comparatively late times—especially when, as here, the city derives, if not its being, at least its importance from the translation—the cathedral may stand anywhere that happens to be convenient in that particular place. Leodium stands in the valley of the Meuse, in a hollow surrounded by hills, forming one of the most picturesque sites in the only picturesque part of the kingdom of Belgium. The city, now at least, stands on both sides of the river; one of the bridges which connect the two parts figures in the French legend of Charlemagne, a part of the tale perhaps suggested by a local Leodian tradition, which claims Charles the Great as a native of the city or its neighbourhood. The main part of the city lies on the left bank of the river, filling up the narrow space between the river and the hills, and climbing up the greater part of the height of the hills themselves. Two of the most striking of the many churches, those of St. Martin and St. Cross, stand high, rising over the streets below in a way which reminds the English visitor of Lincoln itself. But the great pile of St. Lambert was satisfied with a lowlier site. The palace and the space where the cathedral once stood are just at the bottom of the rising ground. A short ascent leads from them to St. Cross, and higher up again stands St. Martin, the position of which makes it the most conspicuous object in the city, though it certainly does not of itself deserve the first place. Yet it is not a contemptible pile, and we learn from it, as from any other church in the city, that, though Leodium may be Welsh in speech, in architecture at least it did not fall away from its allegiance to the Eastern Kingdom. The aisleless apse of St. Martin, with its tall windows, is thoroughly German, and in the neighbouring and far more interesting church of St. Cross we find the most intensely German of all ecclesiastical arrangements, the double apse, eastwards and westwards, after the manner of Mainz and Worms. This church is said to owe its origin to Bishop Notger, who characteristically built it on the site of the dwelling of a robber noble whom he cajoled into submission to the law. But though one of its ends, namely the western, is Romanesque, it is Romanesque in its latest form, two hundred years later than the time of Notger. The eastern octagon and apse are there, and the transverse apses, like so many of the churches of Köln, can be traced out among later changes. These arrangements, so utterly unknown in England, will give the traveller on the banks of the Meuse a good foretaste of what lies in store for him on the banks of the Rhine. The later part of the church is no less worthy study. A good eastern apse of the German Gothic is a worthy ending to a nave whose slender pillars and three bodies of equal height may suggest the memory of Bristol, but which in the management of its outer walls contrives to unite the Bristol arrangement with the general effect of a clerestory range.

The city contains some other remarkable Romanesque buildings, though several of them, like those of Würzburg, which we spoke of last year, have fallen victims to the fact of their mechanical construction being the same as that of the revived Italian style. The pillars and round arches seem to have supplied an irresistible temptation to architects of the seventeenth century to disguise what they doubtless looked on as barbarous bareness with the plaster ornaments in use in their own time. A church thus fearfully Jesuité—to use a phrase which we have heard, and which we wish Lord Palmerston could have heard also—is that of St. Bartholomew in the eastern part of the city, a church worth seeing if only for the sake of its magnificent font of brass. The church attracts notice at a distance by two western towers finished with that peculiar capping, so rare in England, so common in Germany, the finish of Sompington in Sussex and of St. Castor at Coblenz. But the towers do not, like those at Coblenz, rise free from the ground. They simply crown a vast square mass covered with Romanesque arcading—save where Jesuits, or people of Jesuitical tastes, have laid their hands upon it—which forms the west front of the church. This way of making a west front take the form of a huge, flat, and rather shapeless wall, seems to have been the fashion of the Leodian Romanesque. This appears in an elaborate shape in the church of the Benedictine Abbey of St. James, a foundation of Bishop Baldric the Second, who sat—if sitting is a proper phrase for a prelate who fought like Odo—from 1008 to 1018, and whose effigy of far later date may be seen within the church. This large square mass is doubtless the work of the founder, or at any rate the completion of his design. On it is perched a small octagon tower of later Romanesque, which again is swallowed up by the great and famous fabric of the sixteenth century. A third front of the same class, of much ruder work without, but with a good piece of vaulting from a central pillar within, is found at St. Denis, another church whose church is hopelessly Jesuited, while its choir has given way to a lofty spire of the best German Gothic. The church of St. John again still keeps a tower whose lower portion is Romanesque, a massive structure supported by bold round turrets which local belief attributes to the famous Notger. At all events the church retains the traces of very early arrangements. To the west of the tower is a cortile reminding us of the great St. Ambruse, though in a far later style. And the church itself, though rebuilt in the last century, still preserves the plan of the Imperial Minster at Aachen. As at Aachen, the choir, the octagon, and the ancient tower, stand all together without being fused into one whole, and beyond all lies the cortile. In all this we may feel pretty sure that we have the original arrangements of Notger, though there may be little or nothing left of his actual work.

But, strictly as works of art, the two most attractive churches in the city are the Abbey of St. James, already mentioned, and the Collegiate Church of St. Paul, which was raised to cathedral rank instead of the fallen St. Lambert on the restoration of Christianity under Buonaparte. Setting aside a poor western tower, which was patched up out of fragments of St. Lambert and another destroyed church, the present cathedral is a good example of a second-class church of the German Gothic of the fourteenth century. But as such it has many fellows. More interesting in the history of art, though less pure in its actual style, is the splendid building attached to the remains of the ancient St. James. The choir and the shallow transepts show the latest style of Gothic in its richest form. In its elaborate vault, in its arches dripping with foliations in a sort of Alhambra fashion, it may be called fantastic and over-done, but it is still pure; nothing positively inconsistent with the style has thrust itself in. In the nave this is no longer the case; in the spandrels of the arches figures and ornaments of an un-Gothic character begin to show themselves, which mark the first stage of the Jesuiting process, which has otherwise spared St. James, but which has been so ruthlessly carried out in some of its neighbours. Among these last we may give one glance to the church of St. Christopher. The date assigned to the surviving original portions is 1179, but its windows look more like those of the English Gothic of the first half of the next century. Its ranges of columns, broken by a single pair of square piers, might seem to have come from a Lucchese basilica, but the capitals have a savour of Lisieux.

The history of the Walloon city is, as we have seen, the history of struggles between the prince bishops and the citizens. In the end, the citizens have triumphed. St. Lambert, the home of the sovereign prelate and his lordly chapter, has vanished from the earth. St. James, the ecclesiastical home of the commune, where the civic charters were kept, and where the burgomaster took his oath of office, still keeps its place, not first in formal rank, but first in general splendour and attractiveness among the churches of the city. We will end with a fragment, of which we do not profess to construe every word, in which a modern Walloon poet records the overthrow of St. Lambert;

Alfin totafait tom;
Eta, monuain, om,
Alfin töt deü mori:
L'antrick elok è fondow,
Li tour east abatow,
Et ses rwen ont péri!

LIVINGSTONE INTERVIEWED.

THE expedition of the New York Herald into the interior of Africa marks the beginning of a new phase in the development of the Special Correspondent. Mr. Stanley's letters, of which a summary has just been published, possess no geographical value, and there is no proof that he saw Dr. Livingstone except his own assertion, which may be taken for what it is worth. It is interesting, however, to read the adventures of a Special Correspondent who went out to Africa and got up battles in order to describe them. This is a new field of newspaper enterprise. We have often reflected with profound commiseration on the condition of a "Special" who has distinguished himself during war, when peace comes, and there is no more carnage for him to chronicle in his brilliant and tasteful way; when his convivial evenings with Moltke, his walks with Bismarck, and his talks with the dear old Kaiser suddenly come to an end, and he subsides once more from the intimate society of great warriors and princes into the obscurity of private life. This fitful greatness is hard to bear, and it is all the harder inasmuch as the "Special" cannot, when his hours of greatness are over, coil himself up like a boa constrictor after a full meal, or a bear in the winter, and sleep till there is another war and he is wanted again. Special Correspondents must live like other men, and in order to live they must get a living. We have some recollection of once reading in a French paper an account of the way in which the literary department of the Times is managed. The Editor spends a considerable part of his time in meditating on what are likely to be the great questions of the hour five or ten years hence. He then selects a number of competent writers, endows them with a handsome salary, and allotting to each a subject, instructs them to proceed with their investigations until the moment arrives when they will be called upon to put the result into writing. The consequence is that the Times is never taken by surprise. Whatever question may turn up, the Editor has always somebody within reach who has been making it the business of his life to master it in every aspect and in all its details, and who is ready to be tapped of his accumulated information whenever it is required. The French journalist to whom we were indebted for this information added that at every hour of the day and night there was always at least one Special Correspondent on duty in the office, fully equipped for a journey, with his portmanteau in a fleet Hansom waiting at the door, and ready to start for the ends of the earth at a moment's notice. Possibly the other newspapers have not yet followed the example of the Times in this respect; at least, they seem to find more constant employment for their Correspondents, who are not allowed to eat their heads off in idleness or in the preparation of great articles for publication at some distant period. The consequence is, that when there are no wars going on, the unfortunate Correspondents are expected to spin their weary yarns all the same, and to make as much as they can of a little Volunteer inspection, or a charity school tea-fight, or gudgeon fishing in the Thames, as if it were a great historical event of the first importance. Dirt, it has been said, is only matter in a wrong place, and we must confess that it has sometimes struck us that the activity of the indefatigable Correspondent might be more usefully employed than in magnifying little things into great things, and investing the most trivial incidents of every-day life with the glorified hues of his vivid and highly cultivated imagination. The revolting sensationalism of some of the letters from Sandringham during the Prince of Wales's illness has perhaps not been forgotten; and we fancy that poor Hodge, who lately found himself illuminated in a sudden and unexpected manner, simply because Parliament was up and the papers wanted padding, has no reason to be grateful to the "Specials" who did their best to excite extravagant expectations, and to make bad blood between him and his employers. The success which has attended the New York Herald's African expedition will perhaps suggest a similar expedient to some of our contemporaries. It is obvious that there is a fine field for the "Special" in Africa, and we shall be neither sorry nor surprised to hear that there has been a general rush of "Our Owns" in that direction.

Mr. Stanley, the Special Correspondent of the Herald, deserves credit for the brilliant idea of at once making and recording history. Mr. Disraeli is said to have remarked in early life that when he wanted to read a book he wrote one; and Mr. Stanley when he is at a loss for a subject for a letter sets to work to do something worth writing about. It may be said that it is an important homage to historical truth that a Correspondent of the New York Herald should think it necessary that an event should actually happen in order that he may describe it; but the process is not unknown in India. When a Hindu wants to get up an elaborate course of false swearing, he always takes care to have a rehearsal with his associates of all the circumstances which are to be alleged to have occurred. In this way an air of exactness and reality is given to the narrative which could not otherwise have occurred. It appears from the summary of Mr. Stanley's despatches which has just been published in this country, that he left Zanzibar on the 23rd of January last year, at the head of a large caravan, the numbers of which were reduced by sickness before he reached Unyanyembe. He was pushing on for Ujiji when he found that Mirambo, the King of Ujowa, had announced that no caravan should pass that way except over his body. We do not know what opportunity His Majesty may have had of studying British melodrama, but his language is exactly that of villains or heroes on the stage. Mr. Stanley, no doubt seeing his way to a thrilling letter on the subject, at once accepted the challenge, and resolved to conduct his caravan over Mirambo's body. In forming this resolution prudence was mingled with valour. The Arabs had declared war against Mirambo, and "as they appeared to be confident of victory, and determined to fight well, Mr. Stanley judged that the better course was for him to combine with them in attacking the King of Ujowa." Accordingly he joined forces with them, and the first day all went well for the allies, who succeeded in surprising three of Mirambo's villages, and captured, killed, and drove away the inhabitants. Next day Mr. Stanley caught a fever, and was carried back to Unyanyembe, and the Arabs, in a rash attack on Mirambo, were drawn into an ambush, and routed with great slaughter. On the fourth day the Arabs scattered in all directions, and Mr. Stanley's own bodyguard joined in the sauve qui peut. Having somewhat recovered from the fever, and hearing that Mirambo meditated an aggressive movement, the courageous Correspondent collected all the fugitives he could find, to the number of one hundred and fifty, barricaded the town, hoisted the American flag, and awaited events. But nothing happened. Mirambo took another road, and left Unyanyembe unmolested, under the protection of the stars and stripes. It now occurred to the Correspondent that he had better leave the Arabs to fight their own battles, and try to reach Ujiji by a more northerly route—in fact, to dodge Mirambo instead of going over the despot's body. To this the Arabs demurred, "doubtless from selfish motives," and as they could not intimidate Mr. Stanley, they tried the effect of "extraordinary tales" on his followers. Of these the Correspondent has no doubt made a collection for the benefit of his readers in New York, but at present all we know of them is that the tales produced a strong effect on those who heard them, and

Mr. Stanley, deserted by his only European companion, an Englishman, who was perhaps a rival Correspondent in disguise and anxious to be first home with the "extraordinary tales," had great difficulty in obtaining bearers for his luggage or an escort. After a long and perilous journey through an unknown desert, where he was seriously threatened by the rapacious chiefs of hostile tribes, he at length reached Ujiji in the beginning of November. He was anxious, he says, to enter the African town with as much clat as possible, and he therefore disposed his little band in such a manner as to form "a somewhat imposing procession." At the head was borne the American flag; next came the armed escort, firing their muskets as rapidly as possible; then the baggage men, horses, and asses; and last, not least, the great Correspondent himself. The discharge of firearms naturally aroused the inhabitants, and it is perhaps a wonder that they did not fall into some misapprehension as to the object of a visit heralded in this warlike manner. As it happened, they took it all in good part, "filling the air with deafening shouts, and beating violently on their rude musical instruments."

We now approach the most affecting and impressive incident in the narrative—the meeting of the Correspondent and Livingstone. Mr. Stanley's bearing on this occasion proves the high conception he had formed of his duty as the representative, not only of the New York Herald, but of Western civilization. As the procession entered the town he observed among a group of Arabs "a pale-looking, grey-bearded, white man, clad in a red woollen jacket, with a naval cap with a faded gilt band round it." He recognized Livingstone at once, and his first impulse was to rush forward and fling himself into the arms of the great traveller. But he checked himself with the reflection that the Arabs, being accustomed to conceal their feelings, would think meanly of a man who showed he had any. So he resolved to exhibit no symptom of rejoicing or excitement. Slowly advancing towards the Doctor, he bowed and said, "Dr. Livingstone, I presume?" To this the Doctor, "fully equal to the occasion," simply smiled and replied "Yes." After this no one can say that the heroism of what is called the Anglo-Saxon race is extinct. Nothing can be finer than this spectacle of two great men saluting each other in the heart of Africa with the elegant composure and cautious civility of the best circles at home. It is said that a well-known general who lived for some years in the backwoods of Canada used to make a point of dressing every day for dinner in his log-hut lest he should cease to appreciate the refinements of civilization. It does not appear that Dr. Livingstone invariably dines in a white tie and dress-coat, but it is satisfactory to know that in his meeting with Mr. Stanley he was "fully equal to the occasion." Here is indeed a bond of international brotherhood between the two great nations which speak a common tongue, and all the rest of it, and we may expect that some of our gushing journalists will not fail to do justice to the event, and to suggest that after this all differences between the United States and Great Britain should be buried in oblivion. Mr. Stanley reports that Livingstone looked strong and well, and has satisfied himself that the Chambezi (not to be confounded with the Portuguese Zambesi) is the head-quarters of the Nile, but there is a gap of some hundred and eighty miles between the point on the Chambezi at which, on account of a mutiny among his men and want of stores, he had to suspend his exploration of that river, and the part of the Nile already traced. Until he has completed this exploration, which may take from sixteen to eighteen months, but Mr. Stanley thinks more, he does not mean to quit Africa.

There seems to be a general disposition to accept Mr. Stanley's story as true; but it will be prudent to wait until Dr. Livingstone's own letters, which are said to be on the way, arrive, before placing implicit confidence in this remarkable narrative. It is possible Mr. Stanley may have seen Livingstone; but it is odd that he should have found it so easy to get to and from Ujiji and to send on letters, and that Livingstone himself should have found no means of communicating with his friends for several years. If he actually saw Livingstone, it would appear that Livingstone had no confidence in him, and told him as little as possible, and did not allow him to read the letters with which he entrusted him. It will be observed that the greater part of his account of Livingstone's adventures in the interior is only a confused and blundering reproduction of the Doctor's own despatches to the Geographical Society before he disappeared. Mr. Stanley's geographical information is a hopeless muddle, which it would be a waste of time to analyse. For our own part, we see no reason at present either to believe or disbelieve the story. There is nothing improbable in the meeting between Mr. Stanley and Dr. Livingstone; but unless Mr. Stanley is very different from the general man of Correspondents for the Herald, it is quite conceivable that he may have made up the whole thing out of his own head. It is unfortunate that the Herald should have acquired such a reputation for itself, but it is its own fault.

COUNT MONTALEMBERT ON THE JESUITS.

IT has been sedulously reported of late in Ultramontane circles that Count Montalembert before his death signified his intention of submitting to the decisions of the Vatican Synod, whatever they might be. The report is one which, to say the least, requires confirmation, when we remember the latest recorded utterances of the veteran leader of Liberal Catholicism in France.

Montalembert died in March 1870, when the Council had been sitting for more than three months, and there was no longer any reason for doubt that the question of Papal infallibility would be forced on its notice; indeed the Schœma de Primatu was already in the hands of the assembled Fathers. It was therefore with the subject definitely before his mind that he wrote what he did write during the last fortnight of his life. And our readers may recollect—for we referred to his words at the time—that he spoke in the strongest terms of his detestation of the Ultramontane policy, and his warm sympathy for the noble band of priests and bishops who were struggling against it at Rome; expressing his deep regret that failing health prevented his being able himself to enter into the arena, and adding that the real discussion would begin when the debate in Council was over, and the decrees so urgently desired by the dominant party were carried. He even spoke of "the idol erected at the Vatican," and said that the idol might remain but the shrine would be deserted. So clearly did Pius IX. appreciate the force of his sentiments that he seized an opportunity, before the body of the departed statesman was yet in the grave, to pronounce what may be called an elaborate malediction on his memory, and went so far as to forbid the ordinary funeral rites, which are not refused to the worst criminal who dies in communion with the Church, being solemnized at Rome. After all this, it is rather surprising to be told that the Count died a prospective infallibilist, and we naturally ask for some proof of so startling an assertion. None, however, has been produced beyond the ipse dixit of those who make it. Nor is this all. Montalembert left what may be called his ecclesiastical testament in the shape of two essays—on the Roman Jesuits, and on the "palinodies effrontées" of Rome—which were sent to the Correspondant, then the professed organ of the French Liberal Catholics, and refused admission by the editor. The papers were therefore left in the hands of his executors, who have carefully refrained from publishing them, while asserting on their own authority that he changed his opinions before his death. The Abbé Michaud, who was an intimate friend of Montalembert's, has openly charged them with falsehood, and challenged them to publish the documents left in their hands; but the challenge remains unanswered. Meanwhile, extracts from one of these papers, on the Jesuits, have come to light, and have just been published—of course without the sanction of the executors—in the Allgemeine Zeitung.

There was an obvious motive for such a publication in Germany at the present moment in connexion with the recent law against the Jesuits. For Montalembert's criticism has a direct bearing on the political action of the Society, and it may be remembered that the President of the Imperial Chancery, Herr Dulbrück, on recapitulating in the Reichstag the grounds of the Government for proposing the measure, insisted on this point. He emphatically disclaimed in the name of the German Governments the notion of identifying the Society with the Catholic Church, which he described as "an arbitrary perversion of notorious facts, the more to be deplored as it might serve to deprive the measure in circles outside this assembly of its true character, and impress on it another which it does not possess." He proceeded to argue that the Empire was menaced, and felt this measure to be indispensable for its security, dwelling especially on the necessity of guarding the newly established Constitution from internal as well as foreign enemies; and "among these internal enemies an Order is to be reckoned which, while furnished with great intellectual and material means, and endowed with a rare organization, steadily pursues a fixed inimical aim." The charge will of course be scouted by the whole Ultramontane party as a mere hypocritical subterfuge or a fresh illustration of Protestant fanaticism. It is interesting therefore to see what light may be thrown on it incidentally by the impartial testimony of a distinguished French Catholic, proud alike of his loyalty to his country and to his Church. Montalembert had always zealously vindicated the rights of the Jesuits, especially in matters of education, on the broad principle of religious liberty, and this gives the greater force to his protest. He is dealing especially with the Roman Jesuits, the conductors of the Civiltà Cattolica, which is the approved organ of the Papal Court; and he says that, after being engaged through life in pleading the cause of the Order, which had been persecuted in France and in Spain, he must make a reserve as to the Roman Jesuits, who, in defending the Church and the Holy See, "are daily outraging reason, justice, and honour." The "monstrous articles of the Civiltà" will no longer allow him to keep silence. If the principles thus manifested are to prevail, "the Church cannot co-exist with any modern liberty," and Renan was perfectly right in saying that a Liberal Catholic or a Catholic Liberal must be either a hypocrite or a fool, and that those who vindicated for the Jesuits liberty of education in France, on the ground of religious toleration, were not acting in good faith, and were legitimate objects of ridicule equally to consistent Catholics and consistent Liberals. According to the Civiltà there is no better way of serving the cause of Catholicism in the present day than to reproduce and justify, by the authority of Popes and Saints, all the worst examples of persecution in former ages, such as Pius V.'s instructions to his nuncio in Spain to deprive Philip II.'s mildness and leniency in the temporal punishment of heretics. It must be loudly and openly proclaimed that all modern liberties are false, pernicious, and "deadly in their effects"; that liberty is—not in its excess, but in its own nature—a spiritual pest and madness; that all liberty of the press, of conscience, and of worship is per se essentially evil; and that this is also true of all the liberties, charters, and emancipations of modern society.

On these doctrines Montalembert observes that when he and his friends claimed for the Church and for the Jesuits, in the French Chamber, liberty of association and of teaching, it was precisely in the name of these modern liberties and by virtue of them that they did so. And he appeals to the words of the good and pious Father Ravignan, who was a barrier before he became a Jesuit:—"As a Frenchman I have believed in the liberty of my country; I count on the liberty of conscience assured us by the law and the solemn promise of the Charter, and I maintain that it is a reality here, as it is in England, Belgium, and the United States." When the Jesuit colleges were reopened in France in 1850, it was by insisting before the Assembly on the text of the Republican Constitution, which guarantees to all citizens equal protection in the exercise of their worship and freedom of association and teaching; that he and his colleagues won the victory. Clearly they were all wrong then, and M. Renan was right in asserting that Catholicism and the Jesuits are incompatible with liberty. But it is a pity that those who have been profiting by the general principle successfully urged in their favour for the last twenty years had not apparently discovered at the time the radical mistake which their advocates were committing. The writer adds that now, when he is long past the age of passionate emotion, "à la lecture de ces palinodes affrontées, j'en ai rougi jusqu'au blanc des yeux et frémis jusqu'au bout des ongles." He considers the tone now adopted by the Jesuits in particular towards the champions and the contests to which they owe their present position unworthy of religious or honourable men. It may be theological orthodoxy, but it is certainly bad faith. And a very little common sense might have sufficed to remind them of the extreme unwisdom of the line they are taking. Had a single Jesuit taught in 1848 or 1850 what the Civiltà teaches now, they may be very sure that no Jesuit college would have been allowed to be opened in France, nor a single French soldier sent to Rome to restore the Temporal Power. And as to the future, without any pretensions to prophecy, one may safely affirm that many a Jesuit on both sides of the Atlantic will have ample cause to deplore the doctrines now maintained in the official organ of the Company. Montalembert, indeed, would be no party to the policy of applying their own principles to themselves, but they could not justly complain if Liberal Governments were to take them at their word and suppress them. For himself, he would concede liberty to its adversaries as much as to its friends, and "inflict it on those who deny and exterminate it, as their only fitting penalty." Liberty is for one's opponents, especially if they are weak, and on both accounts should be conceded to the Jesuits. Liberty for all is a dear and holy principle, "and if I pass for an old fool and dotard, and what is worse, for a triple heretic, that shall be to my last sigh the cry of my conscience and my heart." He adds that the principles of these Jesuit enemies are inhuman, pitiless, and detestable, but that happily they have no power of applying them, and he does not believe they would do so if they could. But their way of serving the Church is remarkable. They treat it as wild beasts are treated in a menagerie, where they are exhibited in iron cages, but we are bidden to inspect their claws and teeth, and to remember that, if ever they got out, they would make free use of them.

It is clear from the last paragraph that Montalembert, if he were still alive, would not have approved Prince Bismarck's policy, but it is also clear that he would have told the Jesuits they had only themselves to thank for it. He has in fact almost predicted the fate they have now drawn on themselves. Whether the proposed expulsion, supposing it to be justifiable, will be effective, and whether, if strictly enforced, it may not do more to enhance their moral than to cripple their material resources, by investing them in the eyes of the vulgar with a seeming halo of martyrdom, are questions which need not be entered upon here. No doubt if the successor of Pius IX. could be induced to repeat the policy of Clement XIV., both the Church and the world would be gainers. But expulsion from Germany or Italy by the civil power is a different thing from the formal and final suppression of the Order.

DILKE'S DOMESTIC BOOK

WE do not know whether the Comic Blackstone included the law of real property, but if it did not, Sir Charles Dilke is fully qualified to compose a supplement which might maintain the grotesque character of that work. Besides his earlier titles to distinction he will henceforth be remembered as the author of the most absurd Bill that was ever brought into the House of Commons. His proposal sounds like a dreary joke. There is to be an overseer appointed who is to take charge of what the Bill calls "public lands." The definition given in the Bill would include three contiguous estates which belong respectively to the Foundling Hospital and to Rugby and Tunbridge Schools. The preamble of the Bill recites that "the concurrent management" of such contiguous estates would afford means for effecting great public improvement, and much of the labour required for the same might be advantageously undertaken by co-operative associations of workmen if reasonable facilities were given them. We have heard much of the benefits conferred on the nation by public schools, but this is the first time that it has been, to our knowledge, suggested that their estates ought to be managed for the encouragement of co-operative societies. The "public improvement" which the Bill contemplates has apparently nothing to do with learning, or morals, or manners, but rather with the opening of new streets or the building of splendid edifices which may or may not yield a return upon the outlay. An overseer of large mind and cultivated taste might easily absorb the revenues of Rugby or Tunbridge School for many years to come. The overseer is to be "qualified by experience," and he is to fulfil the duties of "registrar, steward, surveyor, receiver, and general agent and manager" for the bodies of trustees or governors of the Schools. It is a pity that when Parliament took such trouble a few years ago to pass an Act regulating Public Schools, Sir Charles Dilke did not come forward with his comprehensive scheme of management. There would have been perhaps this objection to his plan, that while the Governing Bodies were arranging for the disposal of the income of the schools, an overseer would, by magnificent undertakings for the encouragement of co-operative societies, have improved their incomes quite away. These useful functionaries are to be elected in the first instance by the "administering bodies" of "public lands"—that is, by the trustees or governors of schools, colleges, or hospitals; but vacancies are to be filled by the appointment of persons whose qualifications are tested by previous examination. It might happen that a clever head-boy might by success in an examination suddenly find himself elected to a post immeasurably greater than that of the head-master of the school from which he came, since he would hold the purse out of which the head-master would be paid. It is expressly provided by the Bill that the overseer should manage the property of endowed schools, so that while Lord Lyttelton's Commission is settling how these schools shall spend their money, Sir Charles Dilke's overseers will arrange that there shall be none to spend. The Bill, however, exempts the buildings in which the school is actually carried on, and also glebe lands attached to any benefice if the incumbent shall signify, as he probably would, that he elects to retain it in his own management.

The next provision of the Bill is even more astounding than those on which we have already commented. Landlords are to choose tenants on the principle of the more the merrier. When, on putting up land to let, tenders shall be equal, preference is to be given to that tender from the acceptance whereof the greatest number of persons will be likely to become interested in the tenancy. Thus a co-operative or industrial association is to be preferred to an individual offering the same rent, and this without regard to the question which is likely to pay most regularly. If the overseer should be of opinion that, "having regard to the public and general benefit aforesaid," any tender ought to be accepted, and if the administering body would very much rather not, the matter is to be referred to the Local Government Board, who may appoint an arbitrator, and his decision is to be binding. Apparently the question of the solvency of the proposed tenants would be put aside as irrelevant. Subdivision, which has been denounced as mischievous in Ireland, is to be carried in England to an extent before undreamed of. An Irish landlord permitted, or at least did not entirely resist, the sub-letting of land held under him, which was usually not inconsistent with his getting the rent paid by somebody, but in England "administering bodies" are to be compelled to adopt subdivision as beneficial to the nation, and are forbidden to consider its pecuniary effect upon themselves. The overseer is to pay over to the "administering bodies" the rents and profits of their lands, retaining a percentage for his services. The respectable persons whose functions and profits would be usurped by the overseer, were probably not seriously alarmed by the introduction of Sir Charles Dilke's Bill. It is evident to us that he has been born before his time, and he produces Bills which are even more premature, and, if we may say so, half-baked than himself. There are to be maps with descriptive reports of all "public lands," and copies are to be supplied to elementary schools "in aid of economical, historical, or technical instruction." The overseer is to report annually on the condition of all "public lands," and is to enter into various considerations, among which the interest of the landlords, or those for whom they are trustees, is conspicuously absent. New communications, roads or streets, irrigation, or drainage works, and opportunities for promoting the public benefit, are all to be considered, apparently without regard to that question, which is usually the first of all questions—namely, whether the proposed works will pay.

Another portion of this wonderful Bill relates to commons, which are also to be placed under the supervision of the "overseer." But we rather think that he would find this department of his work too much for him. He is to ascertain from the best evidence he can gather the situation, extent, and boundaries of commons, together with the rights, usages, and customs relating thereto, and he is also to inquire "in what manner the several rights in such commons may be most profitably exercised." He might, for example, report that several geese or another pig might be fed upon a particular common. This at least is what the Bill appears to mean. The commoner is to be instructed how he ought to exercise his right of common. If any "public interest" in any public land or common is likely to be endangered by non-assertion or exclusion, the overseer shall cause notice to be put up of the public right thereto; and if necessary he shall certify the particulars thereof to the Attorney-General, who shall thereupon take such proceedings as he may deem necessary. It is not stated whether the landowner will be at liberty to take down the notices which the overseer has put up. The Attorney-General would be at liberty to institute any proceedings against a landowner which he thought fit, and the costs would be paid either by the landowner if he failed in resisting the proceedings, or by the county rate to which the landowner contributes if he succeeded. The overseer would have, with respect to public lands and commons, all the powers of inquiry and examination of witnesses and documents that ever were conferred on any Parliamentary Commission, so that in case of litigation with a landowner the first step would be to look into his title-deeds. If any land in the overseer's district be offered for sale, and he thinks the purchase would be for the public advantage, he may buy it, and it may be paid for by the sale of any Government securities held under the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853; although there may not be any connexion whatever between the district to be benefited and the charities which are to be plundered for that purpose. The Bill might just as well provide that the purchase-money for these desirable lands should be supplied by the sale of Consols belonging to private holders, to be determined by lot. The administering body of any charity may adopt the land purchased with their money as an investment—that is, we suppose, if they please; but if they do not please, it is by no means clear what will happen. It is, however, only too clear that their stock will have been sold out, and that land which is thought to be of public advantage will have been bought with it.

The first and most important duty of the overseer would be to prepare "a new Domesday Book," as Sir Charles Dilke calls it, of all the estates in his district. He would then prepare a map and "disseminate the information thus obtained." Children in elementary schools are to have the opportunity of acquiring this most dry and dreary of all that is called useful knowledge. An ordinary school-book of geography would be pleasant reading compared with the compilations of overseers, which would resemble the least readable parts of the blue-books of the Charity and Endowed Schools Commissioners. The promoters of the Bill hold that it is desirable that as large a number of persons as possible should have an interest in the soil, "and the measure would afford various facilities for that purpose without coming into collision with the principles of political economy." It is probably immaterial, in the view of Sir Charles Dilke, that it would come into collision with the rights or privileges of individuals or communities who have hitherto enjoyed the advantages of schools, colleges, and hospitals established in their neighbourhoods. Another speaker in support of the Bill said, that one of its objects was to enable working-men co-operating together to meet the prejudices of a social kind which existed against them in trying to acquire land. We do not know whether it is a prejudice of a social kind to hold that a working-man who desires to acquire land ought to pay for it, but that at any rate is our opinion; and we hold further that landowners, whether Corporations or individuals, ought not, except under very special circumstances, to be forced to sell even at a good price. The House of Commons being invited to pass this Bill by way of "meeting communism half way," responded in effect that it had no desire to meet communism at all. When Sir Charles Dilke has abolished monarchy and proprietary rights, it will be time enough to begin the compilation of a Domesday Book. By that time perhaps the New Forest will have been brought under the plough or spade, and Sir Charles Dilke will be so far a conqueror that he will have made England very like a desert.

PERILS OF LIFE ASSURANCE.

GOOD sometimes comes of evil, and when a great disaster has happened and cannot be remedied, the most philosophical course, after every thing has been done to relieve the sufferers, is to consider what amount of compensation can be extracted from it in the way of warning or instruction for the future. The collapse of the Albert and European Life Assurance Companies, with a deficiency in the one case of nearly, and in the other of more than, a million, is about as ugly and venomous-looking a toad as can well be imagined; yet it is possible that it may be found to wear a precious jewel in its head. Should it prove to be the means of making people reflect seriously on the meaning and conditions of life assurance, and of enabling them to understand the limits within which certainty can reasonably be expected and safety secured, there will be an important public gain to set off against private losses. For the present, the result of the failure of those Companies has been not only to impoverish and ruin a great many unfortunate persons under circumstances of peculiar hardship and cruelty, but also to bring life assurance in general into some discredit. It is estimated that there has lately been a falling off of something like ten per cent. in the amount of business annually transacted by the Life Assurance Offices; and it is natural that successive disasters of great magnitude should produce a feeling of uneasiness and distrust. It is hard that the sound offices, of which there are many, should thus be made to suffer for the rotten ones; but if there were nothing more in question than the profits of Assurance Companies, the matter might be left to right itself in the course of time. It must be borne in mind, however, that so much less done in life assurance means so much less provision for the future on the part of the community. It does not follow that money is wasted when it is withdrawn or withheld from this particular mode of investment, but in any case a deduction of ten per cent. from the assurances of a year represents a serious deduction from the providence of the country. It will be admitted that it is a good thing that this kind of providence should be encouraged as far as possible; that, if there is any unreasonable distrust, it should be removed; and that, if the distrust is well founded, the grounds of it should be clearly exhibited so that people may learn to judge for themselves, and to discriminate between good offices and bad. So far, it may be assumed, there will be general agreement. The only question is as to the means by which this result may best be promoted. It has been suggested that a post-mortem examination of the defunct Companies might perhaps be instructive; and Mr. Cave, first by a Bill, then by a motion, in the House of Commons, withdrawing each in turn, proposed that this examination should be entrusted to a body of special Commissioners. The Chancellor of the Exchequer thought that it would be more conveniently and satisfactorily performed by a Committee of the House. The real point of difference between Mr. Cave and the Government did not, however, come very distinctly to the surface in the course of the debate. There can be no doubt, from the tone of Mr. Cave's speech, that he is anxious to bring to justice the persons who are responsible for the gross misrepresentations and misappropriations which are alleged to have caused the ruin of the Albert and European Companies. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the other hand, felt that the appointment of a Commission to do the work of a court of law might establish an awkward precedent. The question, he said, arose with regard to the acts of a body of persons who were alleged to have grossly misconducted themselves. If they had brought themselves within the law, the law should see to it. If they had kept on the safe side of the law, it would be in the highest degree dangerous to supersede the ordinary machinery for prosecuting offences, and to appoint a special tribunal, armed with power to inquire into the matter and to search it to the bottom. We must say that on this point we are disposed to agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It is not desirable that Parliament should take upon itself to supersede the ordinary tribunals by special Courts appointed either by itself or by the Government, for a temporary and limited purpose, and armed with exceptional and arbitrary powers. It is true that Commissions of this kind have more than once been appointed. The Commission to inquire into the Trade Union outrages at Sheffield is a case in point; but these were outrages of a peculiarly monstrous character which were continually occurring, and which had baffled all inquiries conducted in an ordinary manner. And, in the next place, the Commission was authorised to offer immunity to witnesses who confessed their crimes.

The Government, while objecting to the appointment of a quasi-judicial Commission for the purpose of seeking out and bringing to punishment the persons who were responsible for the disasters of the Albert and European Companies, have undertaken to institute a general inquiry into the causes of these failures; and it remains to be seen in what form the inquiry will be conducted. The broad facts of the history of the two Offices are pretty well established. Their funds were squandered in ruinous amalgamations; as their responsibilities increased, their means of meeting them diminished; and it is now known that for some time before they finally collapsed they were utterly and hopelessly insolvent. In the case of Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited), it was held that the directors, although they committed a serious indiscretion in concealing the embarrassed condition of the business transferred to them, did not intend to defraud the public; they had faith in the speculation, and believed that, with the aid of fresh capital, it could be made highly profitable. The officials and directors of the Albert and European Companies would no doubt justify their conduct by a similar plea. It may be said that the business of a Life Assurance Office is very different from the business of a discount bank; that the latter is a speculative business, whereas the former is, or professes to be, a matter of fixed and certain calculation. Undoubtedly there ought to be nothing speculative in a well-conducted Assurance Office, but it has not yet been determined that bond fide speculation on the part of an Assurance Office is a criminal act. If it could be shown that in any case the officials of an Assurance Company knowingly and deliberately, and for their own personal profit, purchased on behalf of their Company a worthless or insolvent business, with heavy liabilities attaching to it, the natural course would be to bring such a case under the notice of the law officers of the Crown; and if the evidence was strong, they would be bound, we think, to prosecute the accused persons. But it would obviously be very difficult to bring home such a charge, especially as actuaries appear to be very like other experts, and the opinion of one can always be got on any side of any question to answer the opinion of another. Mr. Cave mentioned that five weeks before the failure of the European a surplus of 95,000*l.* was reported upon the accounts down to the end of 1869 by the Government Actuary. It is one of the great difficulties of life assurance that there is hardly a question upon which actuaries are agreed. They differ as to the proper rate of interest, as to the tables of mortality, as to the amount of "loading," and on almost every other point. Under cover of these discrepancies and contradictions there is room for the wildest speculations. At the same time, there is no doubt a point at which all competent persons must agree that an Assurance Office is hopelessly insolvent, and that is, when the money which is required to meet future liabilities is being rapidly absorbed to pay current claims. It cannot be denied that the persons who were induced to insure their lives in the Albert or European during the later years of its existence were grossly and shamefully deceived, and, in a sense, swindled, inasmuch as the money which was taken from them was applied not, as it ought to have been, to making provision for meeting their policies when they fell in, but to other purposes. A general inquiry into the working of these Companies will not perhaps throw much new light on life assurance problems; but it will be a good thing in itself to get at the secret history of the amalgamations, and the names of the gentlemen who negotiated them for a handsome consideration. After this they would either have to stop their game, which they are said to be renewing, or to carry it on under other names. Sir J. Lubbock promptly exposed Mr. Sheridan's absurd theory that Assurance Offices can be brought down by "wrecking." It is impossible to get up a run on an Assurance Office as on a bank. People are not likely to indulge their malevolence to the extent of dying in order to injure the office in which their lives are assured, and Mr. Sheridan can hardly mean to suggest that the wreckers go to work like Thugs and kill off policy-holders. If policy-holders cease to pay their annual premiums, it is rather a gain than a loss to the Company; and the terms on which policies are surrendered are also supposed to be remunerative.

Mr. Lowe once threw out a hint that he was favourable to a comprehensive scheme of Government assurances; and Mr. Cave has urged him to consider whether he could not make a beginning in this way for the benefit of the army and navy. There are some obvious objections to the intervention of the State in matters of this kind, and the powerful interests which are certain to be arrayed against such a project render it highly improbable that the Government will commit themselves to it in a hurry. It is impossible not to see, however, that the perils, vicissitudes, and disasters of life assurance as at present conducted tend to bring the system into discredit and to discourage providence. A Committee of the House of Commons which investigated the subject in 1852 reported that new Companies were constantly being "brought into existence with no reasonable prospect of, or guarantee for, success, and frequently without any bona fide intention of transacting business." And if another Committee were now to resume the inquiry, its report would hardly be more satisfactory. It would appear that more than half of the Assurance Companies that are brought out are mere speculative ventures which are started for the sake of a little plunder in the shape of "promotion expenses," and on the chance of an amalgamation profitable to the officials and wire-pullers. Of those Companies which get something like a footing in the world only a small proportion survive more than a few years. The Friendly or Benefit Societies of the working classes, which are to them what Assurance Offices are to the middle classes, are in a still worse condition. The Royal Commission which is inquiring into this subject has just published another batch of evidence which is anything but cheerful. One of the officers of the Order of Foresters admits that there are hundreds of branches connected with the association which are insolvent, but which still continue to take in new members and to receive subscriptions, and to hold out the hope of future benefits which they have no means of providing. Mr. F. G. Neison, the actuary, confirms this statement. He will not go so far as Lord Lyttelton in saying that there are not twenty Friendly Societies in a sound condition in the country. But he asserts that undoubtedly a large majority of them are insolvent, and must sooner or later collapse. It would seem that the calculations on which the Friendly Societies are based are in most cases erroneous, that they are managed in a loose, reckless way, and that they lead a sort of hand to mouth existence, which is liable at any moment to be abruptly terminated by want of funds. The Post Office annuities and assurances hardly meet the wants of the working classes, who find it necessary to provide for themselves during sickness as well as for their families after death. The Post Office system might perhaps be popularized and expanded in some respects; but it is difficult to see how the Government, or any public body, could undertake to administer relief in sickness. In a private Society, the members act in some degree as a check on each other, and there is a chance of imposition being detected, but a public body would have no such protection. The whole question is a most important one, and deserves serious consideration. As far as the Assurance Companies are concerned, Mr. Cave's Act for compelling them to register their accounts in an authentic and detailed form will doubtless have a good effect. The managers of Companies will be afraid to expose themselves to the consequences of sending in fictitious or imperfect returns, and they will be aware that the statements in their rose-coloured prospectuses and Reports can be compared with the black and white figures at the Board of Trade. On the other hand, the registered accounts will do mischief if too much reliance is placed on them, and if it is assumed that a Company must necessarily be in a good condition because it can show certain large balances. As Mr. Lowe remarked, the great danger of life assurance is, that at first money is pouring in abundantly and that the liabilities are postponed; there is a large fund in hand, and whenever there is a fund there is temptation. While receipts are flowing in, future obligations are apt to be ignored. In order to judge of the soundness of a Company, it is necessary to ascertain that the tables of mortality are trustworthy, that a proper rate of interest is allowed, that the "loading" is sufficient, and that the reserve fund is safely invested and bears an adequate proportion to the liabilities of the Company. No amount of registration, however, will be a security against the admission of bad lives; only this is of less consequence in a large Company than in a small one. The two points upon which policy-holders should especially fasten their attention are the amount and mode of investment of the reserve fund, and the terms on which policies can be surrendered. The surrender price is a fair test of the soundness of an Office, if it is backed by a sufficient sum in consols or some other very safe security to make it tolerably certain that the price will be at once forthcoming if called for. A well-devised system of surrender assimilates an Assurance Office as nearly as possible to a bank, where money is left on deposit, and can be drawn out on notice being given. It can hardly be doubted that in regard to life assurance the public is best protected, not by being lulled into a false confidence, but by being encouraged to defend itself by jealous scrutiny and unceasing watchfulness.

COMBATIVE SOBRIETY.

A MEETING held at Manchester to protest against closing public-houses before midnight has ended in a fight. We infer that the imposition of restrictions on the habits of large masses of the people is likely to produce disorder, and that the balance of advantage is in favour of letting things alone. This seems to us to be the lesson that ought to be drawn from such proceedings as took place on Saturday last at Manchester. "The meeting ended," says one of the local journals, "in a fight, and its warring elements were dispersed by the police." The originators of the meeting professed to proceed in the interest of Trade and Friendly Societies, whose business is necessarily, or at least usually, transacted at public-houses. It was alleged by the opponents of the meeting that many members of these societies did not sanction the demand preferred on their behalf for keeping open public-houses till midnight. We will assume that this is true; but nevertheless there may be societies in which a majority of members desire this accommodation, and there appears no sufficient reason for depriving them of that which they have hitherto enjoyed. The objections which are urged against holding these meetings at public-houses would be entitled to attention if there were any other place in which they could meet; but usually there is not. "It is alleged that it is impossible to accomplish the work necessary to the flourishing existence of these associations in Manchester between the hours when work ceases and 11 P.M., at which hour, by the proposed law, the further sale of drink would be forbidden."

We are told that several recognized leaders of organizations of working-men had been enlisted on the side of the promoters of the meeting, and on the other side advertisements had been published calling upon working-men "who had respect for themselves and their little ones, and desired to see their country sober, prosperous, and free," to attend and support amendments in favour of closing public-houses earlier than under the existing law. It is one of the special trials of the journalist that he cannot discuss this question without having thrust upon his notice this subject and about the necessity of protecting the working-man against himself. In the middle or upper class of life it would be ridiculous for a father to get up and say that he respected himself and his children, but he really could not help taking a second bottle of wine after dinner. This limp and nerveless morality seems to be a special product of Manchester and other large towns, and is perhaps to be ascribed to crowded dwellings and an unwholesome atmosphere. If we could really believe that it prevailed to the extent that is sometimes pretended, the inference would be inevitable that the country is going rapidly to decay. Neither wealth nor intellectual refinement is worth anything unless accompanied by moral strength. "Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control," are necessary to both individual and national greatness, and we are asked to believe that one of these qualities is wanting in large numbers of the most respectable working-men. Neither their own sense of right nor the opinion of their fellows can enable them to contend against temptation to sensual indulgence. They can sing collectively "Throw down the bottle," which individually they take up directly afterwards. The wonder is that such very poor creatures as these working-men represent themselves should be capable of the belligerent spirit which showed itself at the Pomona Gardens at Manchester on Saturday. "Discordant noises were mingled with yells, and the chaotic multitude assembled in front of the platform, and extending far back into the hall, swayed to and fro in almost frantic excitement." If these things are done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? If people can display this vigour in depriving themselves of drink, what is likely to be the energy of those who vindicate their right to it? The strife at the Pomona Gardens would be intensified in every town in which an attempt was made to impose a considerable measure of restriction.

The Chairman explained that an attempt had been made to establish a Trades' Hall in Manchester, which had failed, and there was therefore no alternative but to hold meetings of societies in public-houses, which ought to be kept open during convenient hours for that purpose. It seems to us that this is common sense, and we are the more inclined to think so because at this moment the speaker was interrupted "by disturbance and fighting in the meeting, which ended in a portion of the crowd being hustled from the centre to the outskirts amid great uproar." The Chairman complained that the teetotallers would not allow to working-men an opportunity for the free expression of their opinion. However, a resolution of a moderate character was proposed, and some proceedings of a very immoderate character thereupon ensued. Towards the close of the speech of the mover of the resolution several attempts were made to eject from the crowd persons whose presence was specially obnoxious to their neighbours. "In one of these rallies two strong fellows said to be prizefighters were conspicuous by their particular activity." A gentleman of the teetotal persuasion clambered on the platform and proclaimed that one of those powerful and particularly active persons was a well-known prizefighter. We fear that even our spirited contemporary Bell's Life has abandoned the idea of resuscitating the faded glories of the ring, and certainly we shall not attempt a task which more able and instructed hands decline. But certainly in the way of glorification of athletics it would be difficult to say anything more forcible than this—that in an assembly of two or three thousand men, or perhaps men and women, the presence of two supposed prizefighters appears to have had as much effect as that of a small force of disciplined troops among a barbarian host. It is possible that the ring might revive if its members would turn teetotalers, but we see little chance of that; and in the meantime agitators will do well to remember that wherever there is a meeting at which restriction is advocated, there are likely to appear amongst its opponents two or three strong fellows, supposed to be prizefighters, who will move through a clamorous crowd like Achilles among the common herd of Trojans. The tide of battle raged between the two parties in Pomona Gardens with alternate success. The gentleman who had denounced the presence at the meeting of prizefighters was seized upon the platform, and nearly thrust among the crowd, but he escaped from hostile hands and took his stand upon a reporter's note-book. Having been moved on from this position, he was next seen lying at the Chairman's feet, and obtaining "a modified protection." All this time attempts were being made to second the resolution, while its opponents, led by the gentleman who had lodged himself on the platform, sang "Rule Britannia," varied by a teetotalers' chorus. However, this resolution and another were declared, perhaps by some effort of imagination, to be carried unanimously, and the Chairman declared the meeting dissolved, whereupon both parties ceased to have any interest in maintaining order. The enterprising gentleman before mentioned and his friends were proceeding to carry adverse resolutions, but "several powerful fellows" interposed, and the "long form" of an eminent teetotaler was in danger of being doubled up by a hit in what is vulgarly called the bread-basket. It is remarkable, by the way, that all the physical as well as moral strength seems to be on the side of the publicans, while long bodies capable of being doubled up, and feeble souls which cannot resist ordinary temptation, are enlisted in favour of restriction. Supposing the Permissive Bill to be passed, and an attempt to be made to put it in force in a large town, we fear that the promoters of restriction would get roughly handled in the disturbances which would inevitably ensue. A few "powerful fellows," insisting upon an unrestrained supply of beer, would be under sore temptation to double up the tall forms of zealous restrictionists imperfectly acquainted with the noble art of self-defence. If this agitation is seriously going on, we would recommend its leaders to take a few lessons in pugilism and wrestling from some of the gentlemen who advertise in Bell's Life. The fight on the platform at Pomona Gardens was not of long duration. A slight effusion of blood from the noses of actual combatants sufficed to mitigate the ferocity of those who were only going to begin fighting. A body of policemen restored order, and the adjacent public-houses doubtless did a good trade during the remainder of the evening. Such an affair may be tolerated occasionally, but frequent repetition would oblige the police to interfere at the beginning instead of at the end.

The shortening of the hours of business in public-houses at Manchester as compared with London may be regarded as an injury or benefit to the former according to the speaker's point of view. A scene somewhat similar to that of Pomona Gardens has been exhibited at St. James's Hall, where Mr. Buckstone appeared to protest against the inconvenience to the theatrical profession of shortening the hours during which public-houses are now permitted to be open. The popular comedian obtained a hearing which at these meetings has become almost unattainable by ordinary speakers, and he proposed a resolution to the effect that the existing arrangement as to closing is satisfactory, and does not interfere with anybody's rights. This, however, is nothing to the fanatics. The "sober working-man" of Manchester must have these houses closed for fear he should be tempted to enter one of them and lose that sobriety of which he boasts. The resolution proposed by Mr. Buckstone was carried, and others followed it, and "then there was a free fight," according to what is becoming the usual programme at these meetings. A large meeting held at Sheffield passed, without disturbance, a resolution against further restriction, which complains of the injustice of giving to the Metropolitan districts a privilege over the provinces by allowing them longer hours. If this really is the view of the majority of the inhabitants of Sheffield or other large towns, the occupation of the agitators is gone. As regards London, it appears to us that the speech of Mr. Buckstone is unanswerable, and we welcome the assistance of comedy in contending against cant.

THE HERTFORD COLLECTION AT BETHNAL GREEN.

THE famed Hertford Collection about which so much has been heard and so little known is now for the first time made public. Over a period of more than a quarter of a century the late Marquis amassed ancient and modern pictures, drawings, miniatures, bronzes, snuff-boxes, furniture, Sevres and other porcelain. These works, now on loan in the Bethnal Green Museum, are of the worth and magnitude of a national rather than of a private collection; their money value is to be estimated not by thousands but by hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling; their art merit finds a parallel only in the palaces of foreign princes or in the museums and cabinets of the art capitals of Europe. And these treasures attract attention all the more because for many years they have been hid away; the "Hertford Gallery" in the Manchester Exhibition comprised only forty-four of the seven hundred and nine oil pictures now exhibited. A large part indeed of the collection remained in France; priceless possessions now safe within British territory have been subject to the perils of war and revolution; and only within the last three months has their present owner, Sir Richard Wallace, brought them to England. We have good reason therefore to give a national welcome to the arrival and exhibition of these treasures.

The collection is strongest in Dutch and in modern French pictures. The masters of Holland and of Flanders are present in the following numerical proportions—Cuypp is represented by eight pictures, Hobbema by five, Maes by four, Metzsu by six, Mieris by nine, Netscher by four, Steen by four, Teniers by five, Vanderneer by six, A. Vandervelde by three, W. Vandervelde by eight, Wouvermans by five, Rubens by eleven, Rembrandt by eleven, Vandyck by six. The average merit is unusually high; the number of doubtful or inferior works is small. Rare in quality are the following:—"The Sportsman Asleep" (234), by Metzsu (in Dresden an analogous picture is assigned to Mieris); "Soldiers Gambling" (240), by Teniers; "An Interior with a woman peeling apples" (105), by De Hooghe; "Skating Scene" (106), by Aart Vandeneer; "Interior with Peasants" (128), by Ostade; "A Dance in a Tavern" (225), by Steen; "The Smithy, Shoeing Pack Mules" (194), by Du Jardin; "Noonday Slumber" (216), by Adrian Vandervelde; "Cattle" (213), by Van Stry; "River Scene with Shipping" (154), by Cuypp; "Cattle" (213), by Paul Potter; "The Water Mill" (141), by Hobbema. Specially worthy of note are a couple of "Skating Scenes" (98 and 106), by Aart Vandeneer, a painter identified with winter and moonlight; observe how the flaky snow floats in the gusty air, how heavily laden are the black storm-clouds, how the wind is in the sky and on the earth, buffeting the thickly-clad skaters and walkers. The artist's management of colour also is remarkable; snow-clad winter is usually deemed colourless, but the painter throws warmth into the sky and russet browns on the foreground. He evidently does not fear discord; probably because he had observed that in murky Northern climes lights come by fitful surprise, and colours intrude themselves violently amid shadow and darkness. "A Landscape" (199), by Rembrandt, is shadowy; the painter saw nature clad in a mantle of grey. On the contrary, the renowned "Rainbow Landscape" (79), by Rubens, is golden; people cavilled at the picture when it was exhibited a few months since in Burlington House, but a great work of art may be as conspicuous for faults as an illustrious character in history, and this landscape has errors which, though inexcusable in mediocrity, are welcome as signs of lawless genius. Thus lawless is Salvator Rosa's grand, wild "Landscape with Apollo and the Sibyl" (269). But the Italians were accustomed to look at nature through the light of imagination, while Dutchmen, of whom Ruysdael and Hobbema are the express type, trusted to the cold, shrewd intellect. Of the usual transcripts of waterfalls, mills, and woods made by these literal students of nature there are several choice examples. We may specially name "The Water Mill" (141), by Hobbema. This gem, from the collection of the King of Holland, is unsurpassed for detail and quality. The painter has produced many larger works, but never a study more true to nature or more perfect in the materialism and mechanism of art. From these purely Dutch products it may be instructive to pass to scenes painted under Italian influences, such as an "Italian Landscape" (90), by Jan Both. Cuypp, sometimes called the Dutch Claude, occupies an intermediate position between the generic styles of Italy and of Holland; his subjects are Dutch, his sunshine is Italian. A lovely picture of its kind is a "River Scene, with Shipping" (154), charming for play of sparkling lights on quiet greys; no artist ever understood better than Cuypp the romance possible to flat lands and low horizons. The English have the credit of giving to this poetic yet phlegmatic painter his rightful rank and his due commercial value; Cuypp was long neglected in his native land, and it is believed that nine-tenths of his works have found their way to England.

Rembrandt, Rubens, and Vandyck are sufficiently prominent in a total of twenty-eight pictures. Among eleven examples, all more or less characteristic of Rembrandt, attention may be specially directed to a fine portrait of the painter himself (134), also to "The Unmerciful Servant" (101), wherein is seen one of those grand heads, Rabbi-like, turbaned, and bearded, which may be accounted the common property of the school; the same model seems to have been used by Bol in a master-work in Dresden. Eleven pictures add little to the amusement which Rubens usually brings upon the spectator; yet "The Rainbow Landscape" (79) has no parallel save in the Chateau of Rubens in the National Gallery; in like manner "The Cavalry Fight at a Broken Bridge" (220) is only equalled or surpassed by the brilliant onslaught of Amazons on a bridge now in the Gallery of Munich. Vandyck's position as a portrait-painter is sufficiently asserted by "Philip le Roy" (63), and "Wife of Philip le Roy" (59), works which for their noble style arrested attention when recently lent by Sir Richard Wallace to the Royal Academy.

The Italian school is scanty; the early masters are absent; and here the Hertford Collection compares unfavourably with the Ward Gallery. Yet two pictures of the "Virgin and Child" (258, 262) are not unimportant examples of Da Vinci and Luini. The lovely composition from the Pourtales Collection, assigned, apparently on good ground, to Da Vinci, will be at once recognized from engravings as an old acquaintance; the type of the Madonna's head, the form and action of the hands, are thoroughly in the Milanese manner—a manner which, though often pushed to mannerism, has never been surpassed for tenderness, sensitiveness, and superabundant beauty. The work next in importance is "The Virgin and Infant Saviour with Children" (255), a full and pleasing composition which Andrea del Sarto was accustomed to paint with variations. Another familiar motive often seen in replica is here present in duplicate; "The Virgin and Child" (259, 289) is a popular arrangement by Sassoferrato. Equally pretty and attractive will be accounted a fancy piece, "Sacred Studies" (254), by Carlo Dolce. Works bearing the names of Giorgione and of Titian scarcely enjoy European reputations. A single figure, simple, severe, and statuesque, "St. Katherine of Alexandria" (265), shows to advantage that rare master untainted by the Renaissance, Cima da Conegliano. There remains one point which the student of Italian art can nowhere else work out more decisively than in this Exhibition. The comparison was never so close and complete between Canaletto the master and Guardi the pupil; the one represented by seventeen works, the other by ten; in this total of twenty-seven pictures there are masterpieces which these painters never surpassed. By Canaletto we have specially marked "Venice" (256), a large and imposing panorama taken from a commanding point on the Giudecca. "The Doge's Palace" (284), and the "Piazzetta of San Marco" (288), by the same master, though smaller in size, are equally consummate in execution. In the presence of these faithful, unflinching transcripts, it is hard to accept the verdict of Mr. Ruskin, who pronounces Canaletto "a little and a bad painter" who continued "everywhere multiplying and magnifying mistakes and adding apathy to error." Guardi, more rich in colour, more luminous in atmosphere, possibly possessed the soul which Mr. Ruskin finds wanting in Canaletto. But even the best of the ten works here hung, such as, Venice, "Church of the Madonna della Salute" (278), "Mouth of the Grand Canal" (281), and "Church of S. Giorgio Maggiore and the Lido" (282), are inferior to those of his rival in accuracy of architectural detail, in drawing of the figure, and in sharpness and precision of execution. Guardi thought to make amends for his deficiencies by pleasing effects which might arrest the public eye.

The Spanish pictures, though few in number, and confined to the two masters best known in England, Murillo and Velasquez, are not unimportant. The best by Murillo is a well-accredited work, "Joseph and his Brethren" (298); also about on a par in style and period is the "Charity of St. Thomas de Villanueva" (305), one of six pictures sent to England in 1805 from the Capuchin Convent, Genoa. This master-work was bought by its former possessor, Mr. Wells, for 1,000*l.*; it were rash to conjecture what its value would be now. "The Adoration of the Shepherds" (294), a vigorous, naturalistic, and apparently early work, was purchased from the Saltmarsh Collection by the late Marquis of Hertford for 3,084 s. An inferior picture, "The Annunciation" (295), came from the gallery of the Marquis Aguado at the cost of 2,000*l.* The eleven examples here exhibited mostly belong to Murillo's early naturalistic and vigorous period; they thus contrast with the late "vaporoso" style conspicuous in the grand composition in the National Gallery. Velasquez, the proud master of Castile, is scarcely less prominent than Murillo, the pride of Andalusia. Three versions are here presented of the Infant Don Balthazar Carlos, whom Velasquez painted no less than a dozen times; one (291), wherein the little fellow is standing, came from the collection of Mr. Wells; another, "An Equestrian Portrait" (307), formerly belonged to Samuel Rogers; a like work, slightly varied, is in the Grosvenor Gallery. "The Spanish Lady" (321) in a black dress, recently seen in Burlington House, we believe to have come from the collection of the King of Holland. The equestrian portrait of the "Duke of Olivarez" (324) we know on a larger scale in Madrid; we also remember there a replica of the landscape "Sketch" (322), which is again repeated in the background of the "Boar Hunt" in our National Gallery. It would seem probable from this threefold repetition that the landscape was a study made on the spot of some actual scene. The gallery in Madrid proves Velasquez to have been given to landscape-painting; but this small "Sketch" is vague in indication, and yet far from the grand generalization of Titian. Velasquez, however, was hardly beneath Titian in portraiture, as may be judged even from the examples before us. The general style of the grand Spaniard is almost too well known to need designation; the works here hung are at once sketchy and complete, offhand and masterly, individual, broad, and generic, subtle in colour, yet lustrous in the deepest shade.

The English school is strong only in Reynolds and Bonington; how strong may be judged when we say that Bonington, a master of whom no one has ever seen as much as he desires, is represented by not fewer than eighteen works, and that Reynolds, who, though ever seen, is never exhausted, is present in such rare examples as "Nelly O'Brien" (8), "The Strawberry Girl" (20), and "Love me, Love my Dog" (7). Three superb portraits hung in a row show that Reynolds could, when he liked, assume the florid manner of Romney; two of the three are fittingly found in the Hertford Gallery—"Lady Elizabeth Seymour-Conway" (28) and "Frances Countess of Lincoln" (31) are daughters of the first Marquis of Hertford. The finest examples of Bonington which it has ever been our fortune to meet with are also here brought together. Bonington painted in Paris, the late Marquis resided in Paris; and evidently rare opportunities occurred of elucidating by choice and characteristic examples the known but undefined reciprocity of influence existing between Bonington and the French painters of his time. Constable made himself felt in the landscape-painting of the Continent, but Bonington's power was at once more potent and prolonged. Sir Edmund Head, nearly twenty years ago, wrote, "It is singular that whilst the French despise our art with all their souls, the influence of a countryman of our own should have contributed largely to create or restore among them a genuine feeling for picturesque effect. The residence of Bonington in Paris, the cleverness of his colour and chiaroscuro, worked upon the French school, and has in fact produced a new element in their pictures which is now becoming strongly visible." Yet, though this be true, it is equally clear, on the evidence here patent, that Bonington borrowed largely and boldly; it might indeed be said of him, as of the late William Müller, that he was always in transition; he passed from master to master, yet, like Müller, he never merged his personality. The eighteen works here exhibited indicate styles the most opposite; the painter at one period surrenders himself to the romance of Venice, he joins company with Veronese, he is a fellow-worker with Leopold Robert, he breathes and lives in the atmosphere of Turner. Suddenly a change comes over him; he is shadowy as Rembrandt, literal and realistic as Teniers or Torburg, grey as Vandervelde or Constable. Looking at these works, we find the subjects ranging from "Henry III. King of France receiving the English Ambassador" (50) to "Anne Page and Slender" (53) and "A Child at Prayer" (52); and again from "Landscape with Timber Waggon" (49) to "Sunset—Pays de Caux" (698) and "The Doge's Palace" (702). Here, as ever, Bonington is supreme in treatment, triumphant in point of art; he places the mark of genius on incidents and details the most trivial and subordinate. Bonington is soon as an unvoiced phenomenon in English art, as a meteor in a dark sky, as a fire which burns for a short space and then is quenched in night; he died ere he had reached his eight-and-twentieth year. We shall pass in our next and concluding paper to the marvellous manifestation given in the Hertford Gallery of the French school—that school which would fondly have claimed Bonington as its own.

SCULPTURE IN THE ACADEMY.

IN this section of the Exhibition, for some reason or other, we do not find the falling-off which the general public voice appears to discover in most other regions of the Academy. There is indeed no inventive work so important as the "Vergilia" of last year; on the other hand, we have several clever things by artists hitherto little seen; whilst, if there is nothing by Messrs. Foley and Bell, yet two or three of the worst and most familiar practitioners rejoice us by their entire or comparative absence.

The vestibule contains some specimens of sculpture meant for architectural purposes, in a style which, considering what liberal sums are now yearly spent upon this branch of the art, has much interest, and should, we think, be much more freely represented. Of the three or four large designs, we prefer Mr. Crittenden's relief representing Our Saviour anointing the blind man's eyes (1536). The latter figure is rather too set in action. Mr. Ruddle's "Glory" is a fair piece of work as architectural decoration, if true sculpturesque style be not asked. Mr. Forsyth's, like other pieces we remember by the same hand, is quite poor and unsatisfactory; his "Christus Consolator" at once suggests Ary Scheffer's—a design which, with some true merit in feeling, is certainly not strong enough to bear dilution. A little marble group by M. Vanlinden (1541) is pretty; and we have here also Mr. C. Marshall's "Ruth."

In the Central Hall, with its diffused light which takes the life and sharpness out of good work, following the numbers, we note Mr. Lawlor's "Itinerant," a girl reclining with a guitar, a piece which shows true sculptural sense, though a certain stiffness. Much pains have been taken with "Gyneth" (so spelled), but the attitude is, to our eyes, one wholly unfit for sculpture, from the feeling of unness which it conveys. M. Dalou—we believe a new exhibitor in London—has a life-size group of a mother and baby in terra cotta. This material has a great attractiveness, coupled with a fatal facility for showy effect. We readily accept M. Dalou's management of it as far superior to Mr. Boehm's, whose yearly specimens show no capacity for advancing beyond the misuse of clay; yet the group before us (and still more M. Dalou's statuette of a girl, No. 1461) is not free from unwise tendencies. The naked surfaces of the figure are poorly handled, the flesh having but little distinction above the draperies; the draperies have a "studio" and painter-like arrangement, showing neither the accidental grace of nature nor the choiceness and severity proper to sculpture. The type of features has been also singularly and inexplicably infelicitous. On the other hand, there is here true feeling for beauty of line and arrangement; and although in an art which supplies so many precedents it is difficult to predicate originality from one specimen, yet we are disposed to expect this quality from M. Dalou, and to look hopefully on his career. He seems to be just at the critical point which makes either an artist in the strict sense or a clever manufacturer; he is at the parting of the ways; it probably lies very much with himself and his own conscientiousness in art whether it be the road upwards which he elects, or that other "flowery path" to which the premature flattery of friends so often invites an artist.

Mr. Durham's "Siren" (like his "Bathers" in the next room) shows the insipidity beyond which the artist's care seems incapable of raising his work. Laboriously planned, and commendably free from mere trick, it is lifeless. The "Off the Book" possesses Mr. C. Marshall's accustomed grace; and there are cleverness and painstaking in M. d'Epina's "Calypso," although much of the trickiness which marked his "David" of last year reappears in this figure, and lowers it to work of the ornamental order. We should think that the artist was strong enough to dispense with these facile attractions, if he would break with the bad traditions of the recent French school. "La Sera," by P. Guarnerio, "Olytie," by M. Rinehart—names new to us—are worth notice; and the "Phryne" of M. Barzaghi, true to her reputation, compels it by her demonstrative beauty. The lower limbs here are somewhat inelegant, and betray the model; but there is much talent, and, if not exactly life, at least vivacity. Though by no means a great rendering of "Phryne," M. Barzaghi's work rises much above the undisguised meretriciousness to which the subject invites. Mr. Williamson's child figures—two in this room and a baby in the next—do not support the promise which we thought was in his last year's work. The attitude and drapery of the "Caught" are awkward; the companion is rather happier; but Mr. Williamson's modelling of the form is empty, and his treatment of the features crude and blunt. "Nelusko" and "Selika," by M. Pagani, are clever, but to our eyes wholly inartistic and unsatisfactory combinations of marble and metal.

Mr. Woolner's "Guinevere" (1503) continues the illustration of the Idyls of the King which he began with "Elaine." As that figure personified modest grace, so this presents an ideal of stately beauty; we see the Queen of that noble epic in her mood of triumph, animated perhaps by the irresistible passion for Lancelot, yet unconscious of her guilt. The proud sway of the head, the sweep and movement of the garments, are admirably rendered in this figure, which, though of statuette size, has yet the look of largeness and "presence" which belong exclusively to the great style of art. In the furthest room, to which we now move, Mr. Woolner exhibits a metal relief for a fountain, full of incident and motive, and a small model of a portrait-monument to a child, which, so far as its position enables us to judge, has true beauty in expression and ability in the modelling of the naked form—that final test of power in "inventive" sculpture, because it is the quality upon which rests the appearance of life.

One of the best pieces in the Gallery is the "Trotting Bull" (1409), a bronze statuette from the hands of Mr. H. W. Davis. This figure is full of energy and able modelling, and is further remarkable as the only successful specimen of sculpture which a painter has achieved within our recollection, many as have been the attempts at this inviting union of arts, so near and yet so widely divergent. A sitting youth, by Mr. Thurlow (1401), is clever; and there is to our mind more than cleverness, some hopeful promise, in Mr. Lawes's "Girl at the Stream" (1448); if the artist be "not so old but he may learn" the difference between promise and fulfilment, and if he be indomitable enough to work on till he masters the enormous difficulties of genuine sculpture. Here also we have a model by another painter of merit, Mr. J. R. Stanhope's "Andromeda." This little relief, which is too unpretentious to fall within the scope of the remark above made, shows real grace and beauty.

If there is not much of first-rate quality amongst the works which we have now briefly noticed, it will be seen that the Exhibition has a fair number of works worth attention, and some promise of a richer crop in future years. The portrait section, falling mainly into the hands of established practitioners, exhibits of course less of the latter quality. We have here a few admirable pieces by men of proved ability, more than balanced by the copious display of more or less pretentious ineffectiveness. But on this side of the art we need not linger. Sitters and promoters of portrait-busts who can find what to admire in the "military" style of Mr. G. G. Adams, whose mastery over uniforms must by this time be complete, or in the coarsely slurred modelling of Messrs. Weekes, Noble, and Adams-Aetou, may be legitimately held secure from all the lessons of criticism. There is hardly anything to analyse in busts of this order; we have never found any one to whom they gave pleasure or caused interest; yet they continue to be yearly manufactured on behalf of that immense majority who do not see, and never will see, that a monument or a likeness is worse than worthless unless it be thoroughly well executed.

The patrons of Mr. Boehm would, we presume, decline altogether to rank with the above-mentioned majority. Yet we cannot presume to except them from it. Most bad sculpture in England falls from ineffective smoothness or from crude emptiness. Mr. Boehm has assiduously fringed his general style upon that coarse sketchiness for which the admirers of Baron Marochetti waged at one time so strenuous and so wholly vain a warfare. As with him also, Mr. Boehm's works seem to find favour with precisely that class who, educated enough to see the weak side of ordinary sculpture, are not educated enough, or have too strong a bias towards mere ornamentalism, to see that the result falls equally short of true art. There is an air of cleverness and vivacity in Mr. Boehm's manner as a modeller which might be praised if sculpture were first thoughts instead of finished thoughts. But his work ceases at the beginning; the completed marble varying between mere rough hewing (as in No. 1414) and smooth affectation (as in No. 1535); closing with the bronze statuette of the Prince of Wales (1515), which has all the air of a group designed for a clock-case. The terra cotta bust of the great painter M. Legros, the material verging in itself towards sketchiness, is better than this, although here the best part of the sitter's expression has been omitted. Worst of all, we regret to observe, is the model for the bust of the third Marquis Lansdowne, destined for the Abbey. Here the features have only reached the stage of crude preparation, although presumably the model is meant, like other models, to represent the intended marble; whilst below the head depends an ungainly appendage, like a cloak hung from a peg, and a Gothic shield (possibly in recognition of the architecture of the Abbey) is inserted in order to carry the inscription. Bad taste could hardly go further.

Several small busts by M. d'Epina exhibit much elegance and tenderness; there should be the making of an artist here. M. Wagnmüller has a head (1433), rather clever and lifelike, though unrefined in style. His "Professor Owen" strikes us as inferior. Somewhat similar in manner is Mr. Armstead's "Dean of Lichfield." If a recumbent figure destined for a cathedral be entitled to a more "architectural" treatment than any other sculpture, this is a fair specimen. We must own, however, to be unable to make this allowance, and fail to see why a harsh and angular handling of lines and surfaces should be considered admissible in monumental work of this order. Still Mr. Armstead's figure has some merit in its way, and we cannot but believe that he also has it in his power, if he chooses, to rise to much better things.

There is a look of character in the colossal figure of Mr. Chadwick (1529). That of Lord Farnham (1506) is heavy and overweighted with decorations. The only marble statue of this class is the figure of Sir B. Frere (1513), executed for the Town Hall of Bombay. The features here have the appearance of great lifelikeness; the high-bred and high-minded air which has happily marked many of the Englishmen who have been our proconsuls in India has been perfectly seized. Mr. Woolner has, as usual, faced the difficult problem of modern dress, and managed it with uncommon ability, keeping himself free alike from the vulgar idea of "materialism" or photographic literality, and the idea, hardly less vulgar, of empty conventionalism. But no ability, after all, can give our European clothing the positive beauty belonging to the robes of Greece of old, or the East of today. The beauty which there is in truth must be here our compensation.

The vestibule, badly lighted as it is, contains the most interesting busts of the year. Mr. Woolner's "Charles Dickens" is, we believe, accepted by those who knew Dickens as rendering completely the look most characteristic of his genius. It is certainly the only likeness which, to those who did not know him, conveys an idea adequate to the impression given by his writings. There is the keenness, the mobile temperament, the sometimes overwrought sensibility. In this bust and the other (Mrs. Milnes Gaskell), by the same artist, the great difficulties inherent in creating a posthumous likeness have had to be encountered. The lady's head is very pure and graceful; so far as one specimen enables us to judge, we infer that Mr. Woolner would meet with a success in this range of subjects not less decided than that which he has attained in heads of the forcible or strongly-accented order. Mr. Butler's female head—also posthumous—(1554) may be fairly classed with the last work in graceful elegance and beautiful treatment of the surfaces. If any reader cares to compare the mere general effect and colour (if we may use the word) of these two busts with those around them, he will, we think, at once feel the presence of that expressive delicacy which divides good work in marble from ordinary work, and will find that the difference which the critic labours to express by analysis is, in fact, one founded on the broad facts of nature, and perceptible by any careful and unprejudiced observer.

REVIEWS.

IMMANUEL KANT.*

IN the history of German philosophy the name of Leibnitz is followed by that of Kant after an interval occupied by greater and less celebrities, some of whom are forced into the intellectual pedigree, and none of whom bear a very striking resemblance to the sage of Leipzig, unless we except Christian Wolf and his school; and these taught the doctrines of Leibnitz in form by which their spirit was not only weakened but perverted. Leibnitz died in 1716; Kant, as the teacher of Kantism, died begin his career till more than half a century afterwards, and the interval being, as we have said, unsatisfactorily filled up, it would seem at a first glance as if the influence of the one had left off long before that of the other began. We may agree with Dr. Fischer, that Lessing was more completely fitted by the mantle of Leibniz than any other thinker of the last century; but this means that the poly-historic, truly liberal character of the one was inherited by the other rather than that the two were connected as Spinoza with Descartes, as Kant with Hume, or as Schleier with Kant. It is not among philosophical books which any one now writes, or even reads, that the monuments of the Leibniz-Wolfian influences are to be sought, but in the recorded fact that the philosophical chairs of the German Protestant Universities were for the most part in the hands of the adherents of this school, which maintained a deadly-lively existence not unlike that of the old scholastic teaching just before the renaissance. Kant himself, who came to put an extinguisher on this truly "dry light," was a Leibniz-Wolfian for nearly as many years as he was a Kantian; and hence it is that the philosophical student should somewhat acclimatize himself to the atmosphere in which Kant primarily moved, if he would rightly understand that the giants against which the innovator fights are not merely windmills.

* Geschichte der neuen Philosophie. Von Ernst Fischer. Dritte Auflage. Mannheim: Bassermann, 1860.

In spite, then, of the long gap which apparently separates Leibniz from Kant, the latter virtually follows close upon the former, and thus the wondrous contrast between the lives of the two men is presented with singular sharpness. Save in the only particular that they both died bachelors, which was also the case with Descartes and Spinoza, they had not one point in common. When (Saturday Review, October 14, 1871) we briefly recorded the multifarious events that chequered the career of Leibniz, we seemed to state that there once existed a man who solved this remarkable problem:—Given twenty-four hours in every day occupied by totally unmetaphysical pursuits, required the propagation of a new metaphysical system in the time remaining. How he did it remains a mystery to the present day; but that he did it somehow or other is a matter of fact. Kant, on the other hand, was the very perfection of what in modern slang is termed a "slow coach." At the age when Leibniz was teaching himself classical Latin by means of some pictures in an old Livy, and alarming his friends by the ease with which he wrote elegies, Kant was simply known as a dull, shamefaced boy, with a bad memory and a weak constitution. His father was a saddler at Königsberg of Scotch descent, the family name really being "Cant," which was changed into "Kant" by Immanuel himself, who, knowing that the initial "C" always looks foreign to Teutonic eyes, much dreaded lest, in process of time, he should be called "Zant." Born in 1724, he was sent in his tenth year to the Collegium Fredericianum, where the principles of his pietistic mother were carried out by Dr. Schultz, a pietistical rector greatly patronized by old Frederick William. Here he remained about seven years (terminating in 1740), and as he went on he distinguished himself so much as a Latin scholar that his first intention was to devote himself to classical philology, like his schoolfellow the celebrated Ruhnken. The pietistical discipline does not seem to have been much relished by either of the rising stars, but they owned in after-life that it did them much good. Kant always spoke in affectionate terms of Dr. Schultz, and when they had both passed the middle age Ruhnken wrote to his old school-fellow, "Anni triginta sunt lapsi, cum uterque tetrica illa quidem, sed utili nec pœnitenda fanaticorum disciplina continebatur." At the University of Königsberg, which Kant entered after quitting the College, the faculty of theology had been selected for him; but he found it little to his taste, and chiefly applied himself to mathematics, which had been indifferently taught at the College, but which at the University were well represented by Martin Knutzen, a young mathematician who initiated Kant into the mysteries of Newton. His means, further straitened by the death of his father in 1746, compelled him to become a private tutor, and in this capacity he lived successively with three families during a period which extended to 1775, having first written his earliest work, a treatise on the "Living Powers of Nature," in which not a trace is to be found of the system of philosophy taught by him in after-life. In 1775 he took his degree and attained the rank of private teacher (Privat-docent) at the University, which he held for fifteen years.

The contest which had arisen between Prussia and Russia stood in the way of his promotion. In 1758 Prussia Proper was occupied by the enemy, and academic offices and honours were in the hands of the Russian general, to whom on the occasion of a vacancy Kant applied in vain. The accession of Peter III. to the throne of the Czars in 1762 brought with it peace indeed, and Königsberg was once more under Prussian rule, but no immediate benefit was afforded to the growing philosopher. The first vacancy that offered itself was the Professorship of Poetry, the duties attached to which comprised the composition of birthday odes and such like articles, and which Kant very naturally declined to accept. Encouraged by the authorities to wait for a more favourable opportunity, he was in 1766 appointed Under-librarian of the Royal Library, an office not connected with the University at all, with the munificent salary of sixty-two dollars per annum. However, the good time came at last. Just as he was about to leave his beloved Königsberg for Erlangen, whither he had been invited as a professor in ordinary, the Professorship of Logic and Metaphysics, which the Russian general had refused him twelve years before, became vacant, and in 1770 Kant was appointed to fill it.

The theses which he publicly defended on his entrance into office were comprised in a Latin treatise, De Mundi Sensibilibus atque intelligibilibus forma et principiis. With this treatise, published when Kant was about forty-six years of age, the history of the so-called "Critical Philosophy" really begins, the germs appearing here of the doctrines afterwards taught at length in his larger works. He had written several treatises between his early dissertation of 1755 and this inaugural display, but they all belonged to what may be called the pre-critical period. Brought up in the Leibniz-Wolfian school, Kant had studied David Hume until his old convictions on the subject of the causal nexus were shaken, and he now came forward with a system which not only surprised his countrymen, but which in due time awakened a sort of contemptuous astonishment in the land whence he had derived his first incentives to original thought. Perhaps the history of literature can show nothing worse than the manner in which Kant, né Cant, taking his start from Hume, was treated by Scotch writers who fondly believed that they were capable of discussing metaphysical questions. Cultivated men of the present day may well be astonished when they learn that there was a time when the Kritik der reinen Vernunft was considered mystical, and the very useful and innocent words "subjective" and "objective" were pronounced to be jargon. One may amuse oneself with conjecturing what Hume himself would have said if he had lived to study the three Critiques of Kant; also whether Kant would have more disliked the vituperations of Dugald Stewart or the admiration of Coleridge. We are concerned here, however, rather with the biography than with the philosophy of Kant. His appointment in 1770 had fairly floated him on academical waters, and two years afterwards he joyfully gave up his post at the library, with all the splendid emoluments thereto attached. Ten years, which he occupied in maturing his philosophical system, elapsed before he became a member of the Senate. In 1786 he was Rector of the University for the first time, and in 1788 for the second.

It must not be supposed that during the pre-critical period Kant was an obscure figure. On the contrary, in 1755, when he had just been appointed a "Privatdocent" and delivered lectures at the house of a professor, he attracted a crowd which, like a London evening party, occupied not only the room but the staircase, and soon he became the most popular of teachers. His discourses, we learn, were de omnibus rebus, &c., comprising Mathematics, Physics, Logic, and Metaphysics for the benefit of less aspiring hearers, with the addition of Natural Law, Ethics, Natural Theology, Physical Geography, and Anthropology for the more ambitious. Strange to say, though he never in his life travelled many miles from Königsberg, he particularly shone in his descriptions of foreign countries; and on one occasion he gave such a minute account of Westminster Bridge that an Englishman among his audience concluded, not only that he had lived long in London, but that he had been a practical architect; and he was equally successful with a description of Italy. He had, too, a taste for poetry, though he did not feel himself equal to the task of celebrating royal birth-days, and the spice of Haller and Pope, his favourite poets, with which he seasoned his instructions, afforded the highest gratification. Indeed Herder, who was afterwards one of his most determined opponents, was so pleased with one of these early lectures that he turned it into verse and sent it on the following morning to the lecturer, who, delighted in turn, read the version to his assembled auditors.

The theory first propounded in the inaugural treatise of 1770 was not to be matured into the shape which is given to it in the three Critiques without much expenditure of time. Early in 1772 Kant wrote to a friend stating that his whole system would probably be before the world in a few months; but the months slipped away without sign being given, and in 1777 the prediction of the coming marvel was renewed with the comforting assurance that the whole work would not fill many sheets. Not till 1781 did the "Critique of Pure Reason" actually make its appearance; not till after seven years was it followed by the "Critique of Practical Reason"; and in 1790 the "Critique of the Judgment," by which the series is completed, first saw light. Presently slight persecutions had to be endured. Frederick the Great, who notoriously encouraged free inquiry, died in 1786; he was succeeded by Frederick William II., whose tendencies were in a precisely opposite direction; the liberal Ministry of Zedlitz came to a close in 1788, and the reactionary Wöllner and Bischofswerder rose into power. Those were evil days for philosophical theology. Crowned heads were frightened by manifestations in France, and Jacobinism and dubious orthodoxy were held to be natural, if not necessary, concomitants of each other. Kant's later work, Religion within the Limits of Mere Reason, brought upon him in 1794 a royal mandate, signed by Wöllner, warning him "not to do it again," and he thought his best course was to keep silent on topics likely to give offence in high places. He therefore answered the King, promising that as a loyal subject he would refrain from all discourse upon religion, natural or revealed. On the death of Frederick William II., in 1797, the age of toleration returned, and Kant, who considered that his promise was made to the King personally, wrote his important work, Der Streit der Facultäten. But age and hard work had proved more powerful than any edict, and in the same year Kant retired from his professorial chair. In 1798, though naturally fond of social intercourse, he ceased to accept invitations, and, fairly worn out, he died on February 12, 1804. Had he lived one year more, he might have celebrated his jubilee as a teacher at the University of Königsberg.

As to the general habits of Kant there is abundant information. His life was of the simplest; his great object being to keep himself in good condition, and to remain as free as possible from all disquietude. Personal independence was not on any account to be sacrificed; and it was therefore a leading principle with him never to be in debt, and never to incur an obligation. In youth he must have been extremely poor; but by rigid economy he became sufficiently rich to live in decided comfort, and contribute to the maintenance of less fortunate relatives; and when he died he left behind him a capital which in his day was deemed considerable. The natural delicacy of his constitution led him to become his own doctor, and his uninterrupted health, obtained by rules based on his own experience, was a carefully executed work of art. On the subject of noise his sentiments were precisely those of the tetchy gentleman in Ben Jonson's Epicæne. To his friend Hippel the novelist, who was Burgomaster of Königsberg, he wrote a letter begging him to use his influence to hinder the prisoners in the town gaol from singing too loud. If there had been any music that could not be heard, like that mentioned by the clown in Othello, Kant would possibly have admired it; but music as it is he regarded as an "intrusive art" (zudringliche Kunst) which enabled a man to disturb his studious neighbours. A cock which crowed in his vicinity, and was not to be purchased at any price, caused him to change his residence. Nor were visible changes less offensive to his eye than noises to his ear. It was his custom when absorbed in deep reflection to fix his glance on some particular object, and a tower which stood opposite to the window of his study became so indispensable to his comfort that when some intrusive poplars in an intervening garden grew tall enough to hide it, he was so intensely afflicted that their owner good-humouredly shortened their dimensions. An old servant named Lampe, who had waited on him for forty years, proved so utter a scoundrel that he was forced to dismiss him; but the loss seemed to him irreparable, and he could only master his sorrow by writing down on a slip of paper "Lampe must be forgotten." Indeed, a forced forgetfulness was with him a panacea for every irremediable calamity. When his friend Hippel lay mortally sick, he was indefatigable in his inquiries; but when, on the day after Hippel's death, people began to talk about him at a dinner-table, Kant interrupted the discourse by declaring that the dead should be left with the dead to rest in peace. Here the philosopher strangely reminds us of two very different persons, King David and Goethe. In spite of this apparent want of feeling, Kant was a warm and even a self-sacrificing friend, and in the choice of intimate acquaintance he was not in the least influenced by his position at the University. High among them stood Mr. Green, an English merchant, who learned to like him through a violent dispute about the American war, in which Kant strongly took the part of the insurgents, while Green was on the side of his countrymen. Pained as Kant was for punctuality, he was exceeded in this respect by Green, as appears by a whimsical anecdote. One evening he had promised to take a drive with Green at eight on the following morning, and a quarter of an hour before the appointed time Green stood waiting for him with his watch in his hand. Five minutes having elapsed, Green put on his hat, and after five minutes more took his stick. At the first stroke of eight the carriage started; and though Kant, who arrived two minutes after the hour, came towards it, Green, from stern principle, would not stop to admit him. At the house of this friend Kant passed his afternoons for several years in precisely the same manner. Entering the sitting-room, he found Green asleep in an arm-chair, took his seat beside him, and went to sleep likewise. Then Ruffmann, a bank director, who also belonged to the clique, entered, and followed the example before him, and all remained sleeping till the arrival, at the appointed time, of Motherby, another friend, whose business it was to wake them. Conversation now began, and continued till seven o'clock, when the party broke up. So rigidly was this rule observed, that Kant was to the inhabitants of the street what merry larks are to the ploughman, and the remark was often heard, "It can't be seven o'clock yet; Professor Kant has not gone by." When we read that Kant did not write a single line of the "Critique of Pure Reason" without submitting it to the approval of Green, we may infer that the Englishman had other qualities besides that of punctuality.

The only source of sensual enjoyment to Kant was his one o'clock dinner. He generally sat at table for at least three hours, and was so exquisite a judge of cuisine that, according to a saying of Hippel's, he could have written as good a critique of cookery as of pure reason. Cookery, indeed, seems to have furnished the only link that connected him with the fair sex. He never married, nor seriously thought of marrying, but he loved to converse with good housewives on the mysteries of the kitchen.

Kant was blessed with three Boswells—Borowski, one of his early pupils, whose meagre narrative extends to 1792; Jachmann, his amanuensis during his most brilliant period, who published letters reaching from 1784 to 1794; and Wasianski, an intimate friend who managed his affairs when age had rendered him incapable, and who described the last years of his life. It need scarcely be stated that these sources are turned to admirable account by Dr. Kuno Fischer, one of the most amusing, chatty, and vigorous of biographers, as he is one of the acutest critics of metaphysical theories.

LONG'S DECLINE OF THE ROMAN REPUBLIC.*

THE fourth volume of Mr. George Long's Decline of the Roman Republic brings his narrative down to the time when it had become imperative on Cæsar either by resigning the proconsulship of the Gauls to give himself up to his political enemies, in which case his ruin was certain, or to retain it in defiance of them and the laws. So far as the subjects of Rome were concerned, nothing could be more desirable for them than the latter of these alternatives, and as respected the constitution, such as it then was, hardly any change could be for the worse. Neither barbaric invasion, often a cleanser of foul political atmospheres, nor domestic tyranny, was ever more corrupt and oppressive than the senatorial rule which closed the last eighty years of the Commonwealth. A few great families managed the affairs of an empire which, with slight breaks of continuity, stretched from the Euphrates to the Atlantic. At home, seldom did an election—tribunician, prætorian, or consular—pass over without destruction of property and life. Abroad, the subjects and allies of Rome were either pillaged, harassed, or left unprotected by their rulers. Things had come to such a pass that either the vanquished must rise against the victors, or the victors would turn into a desert the poorest no less than the richest provinces.

The period surveyed in this volume comprises Cæsar's ten years' proconsulate, the intrigues of parties at Rome, the banishment and recall of Cicero, the tribunate of Clodius, alike disastrous while he lived and in its results after his murder, the defeat and death of Crassus, and the final estrangement of Pompeius from Cæsar. This stormy period possesses an advantage denied to most of the other portions of Roman annals, Republican or Imperial. To a certain extent we are able to view it through the contemporary light of Cæsar's "Commentaries," and the books on the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish wars which accompany them, and, above all, through the light of Cicero's Letters, often disclosing to the reader the political or forensic lies he told in his speeches. Sallust's Bellum Catilinarium is too much of a party pamphlet for credence; in his "Jugurthine War," as well as in his "History," he treats of an age before his birth, and even in these with the tone of a partisan. The history of Volleius, which Mr. Long in some respects perhaps underrates—for the flatterer of Augustus and Tiberius is a sincere admirer of the hardy virtues of the Fabii and Catos—is too manifestly one-sided to be a safe guide, and the last decades of Livy may have been rhetorical, rather than properly historical, since even from the epitomes of his later books it is plain that as he grew in years, he grew also in prolixity. Such abbreviators as Florus, the Victors, and Eutropius tell but little, and that little is not often to be relied on. To Dion Cassius, again, the Republican times were almost as indistinct as they are to ourselves, though, as Niebuhr observes, he held often sound views of the early constitution. As a military historian the great Julius stands without a rival. Void of the pettish vanity and ungenerous temper of the First Napoleon, he relates his own deeds without boasting and with fairness and modesty. He awards to all who served him well their due meed of praise; he is lenient to those who, by mistaking or disobeying his orders, increased his difficulties, or even endangered his position in the Gaulish campaigns. The view taken by him of home politics cannot be expected to be impartial, yet, compared with the opinions of Cicero and Sallust, it may be termed candid. The study of Cicero's Letters, in spite of the information they give, is a painful one. With many personal and domestic, he had few, if any, political virtues. The wag who pointed out to him that there were two vacant seats in the pit of the theatre, and that he was fond of sitting on two stools, knew him well. Shifting his seat indeed may almost be said to have been the employment of his life. He assailed the oligarchy until they made him, for their own purposes, Consul; he opposed every popular measure as soon as he had reached that proud eminence; he hated and fawned on Pompeius; he feared and he admired Cæsar. The brightest passage in his busy life was his proconsular government, yet he was always imploring and intriguing to be released from his province. That, as an advocate, he was indifferent to truth is perhaps a professional failing. His extravagant praise or blame of those whom he defended or attacked does not exceed that of Burke; his inconsistency as a public man does not surpass that of Brongham. With him, as with them, the friend of yesterday is the foe of to-day. By the side of that sincere and unswerving patriot, Demosthenes, Marcus Tullius appears nearly as unprincipled in politics as John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough, or Talleyrand, Prince-bishop of Autun.

The wars of Republican Rome, in semblance aggressive, were often, as Livy says, really defensive, nor is Cæsar's invasion of Gaul any exception to this statement. In this respect, as in some others, the aggrandizement of Rome is a counterpart of that of our Indian Empire. The Romans, like ourselves, were often compelled to absorb or conquer a new province in order to retain an old one. And the possession of Gaul had become almost a necessity for the Commonwealth. Nearly all its great perils and reverses, from the days of Camillus to those of Marius, proceeded from that quarter. The announcement of a Gaulish war was always the signal for a levy in mass; even a special word—immoles—was applied to such occasions. Since the victories of Marius, indeed, the dread of the Transalpines had diminished, but not quite passed away.

* The Decline of the Roman Republic. By George Long. Vol. IV. London: Bell & Daldy. 1872.

Again the populous North might pour from her frozen loins her barbarous sons, and come

Like a deluge on the South, and spread Beneath Gibraltar to the Libyan sands, and the wines and corn-land of Italy draw from their forests and marshes the grandsons of the Teutons and Cimbrians who had fallen on the Raudian plains. Caesar doubtless had a personal object in undertaking the subjugation of Gaul; but he had also a political one. Were time allowed him, he might be able to raise from the humbled clans an army devoted to himself alone; with such an army he would have the means of effecting what long before he must have perceived to be an inevitable revolution. Virtually the Commonwealth was dead; practically it was incapable of answering to the demands of a mighty empire. Pompeius, a good soldier, was a sorry statesman; he had thrown away his opportunity; he let "I dare not wait upon I would, like the poor cat in the adage"; Caesar, as even his opponents knew, was equal to the occasion; Caesar, on his part, knew it as well. How completely he succeeded in both of his designs, it is needless to say. Gaul was at last vanquished; within a generation or two after Caesar's death it was thoroughly Romanized. His personal influence is displayed in the fact of so many Gaulish families bearing the pre-nomen of Julius down to the time of the Antonines.

The Gaulish wars might easily be treated of apart from the history of Rome. They demand too much space for a mere episode in her annals, although for their military and geographical importance they well deserve all the pains which Mr. Long has taken with them. To the world, so far it was affected by the conquests of Caesar, they are instructive and important only in having been the means of civilizing so large a portion of Europe as that now represented by France, Belgium, and the Rhenish provinces, and as the lever by which the great Proconsul could carry into act his plans for reorganizing the Commonwealth. His yearly visits to Luca, where he conferred with and conciliated by his winning manners or his substantial gold the more influential senators and knights, were, in their results, as important as the repulse of Ariovistus, the storming of Alesia, or the capture of Vercingetorix. Gaul in fact was the anvil on which he welded the sword that achieved the victories of Pharsalia, of Thapsus, and Munda; Luca was the loom on which the web of the Empire and the shroud of the Republic were woven.

It is scarcely necessary to tell the readers of Mr. Long's former volumes what they are to expect from the present one. He possesses all the cardinal virtues of historians—incorrupta fides, nudaque veritas, indefatigable research, impartiality worthy a stoic of the strictest sort, and learning abundant and accurate. Mr. Long himself would not take it as a compliment if we commended his narrative for any pictorial graces; among writers of history he is what Phocion in his time was among orators.

It is with evident reluctance that Mr. Long ever turns away from Caesar's campaigns in Gaul to the intrigues and enormities that were simultaneously going on at Rome; "from the plain, unadorned, and veracious 'Commentaries' of the Roman proconsul to blundering compilers and the dubious testimony of Cicero's Letters and Orations." What would have been thought of such reluctance at the time when readers put faith in Conyers Middleton, and derived their acquaintance with the decline of the Roman Republic from such authorities as Hooke, Rollin, and Ferguson? There are few more signal changes in opinion than that which within half a century has taken place in the general estimate of Caesar and Cicero, of "Brutus's godlike stroke," or the sublime virtue of the men who made the Ides of March memorable for ever. Then Cicero was accounted, on the warranty of his own assertions and in the teeth of evidence to the contrary, the purest of patriots, and almost on a level with a Christian saint. Then Sir William Jones was scarcely singular in refusing to call Augustus by any other name than Octavius, because of his signing the orator's death-warrant. Now, in the hands of Mommsen, and even in those of the more lenient Dr. Merivale, the worship of Saint Marcus Tullius has been superseded, in the one case by direct hostility, in the other by pity verging on contempt for him as a political leader. We do not attach the same importance to the view taken of him by Drumann, full and animated as his volume on Cicero is, because he is almost as implacable to Cicero as if Marcus Antonius had guided his pen. Mr. Long, although no Ciceronian, justly condemns the last-mentioned writer's unfairness to one who at least possessed the domestic virtues, and who on many occasions battled bravely with his foes.

Mr. Long, always instructive, is never more so than when he deals with Roman law, or with geography as an important auxiliary to history. In this respect he is a worthy successor to Dr. Arnold. The commendation bestowed by him on the second volume of the Histoire de César is due, in full measure and running over, to Mr. Long's own narrative of the Gallic wars. The chapters devoted to them are the best illustrations at present written of Caesar's military memoirs. Not content with consulting every book worth reading on the subject, he has studied with his own eyes many of the scenes where the Cæsarian legions were victorious or defeated or encamped. He canvasses, he supplements, he confirms or denies, but always in a fair spirit, the statements of the Imperial author and his scientific associates. Perhaps Mr. Long may rank among the sufferers by the fall of the Napoleonic dynasty. Had the Emperor been still at the Tuilleries, there can be little doubt that he would have received some more distinguished tribute to his work than the cross of the Legion of Honour.

The least satisfactory portion of Caesar's military journal is that in which he treats of Britain. Indeed it was perhaps among the few mistakes made by him that he ever crossed the British Channel. The acquisitions made by the Republic were already too vast for the weak and miserable central Government, and the invasion of our island was probably suggested by his own interest at the moment rather than by any expectation of making a permanent or profitable addition to the Roman world. No one knew so well as Caesar that consolidation and not extension was the great need of Rome. But at the juncture of his landing on our South-eastern coast, it happened to be expedient for himself to astonish and flatter his capricious fellow-citizens with some brilliant feat of arms; and what feat would be more agreeable to them than one which planted the Roman eagles in the soil of "Ultima Thule"? To the fickle and idle Quirites the protracted war beyond the Alps was becoming a tedious story. They had amply avenged themselves for the loss of consular armies and the ransom paid of yore to Brennus. Pleasant would it be for them to set their feet upon the neck of Parthian kings, but experience showed that to pass the Euphrates was nearly equivalent to exposing their armies to an enemy who fought flying and eluded their grasp. Even Pompeius, who had humbled the Armenian, and the great Mithridates, had never hazarded a conflict with the Parthian King. But to send couriers, "bloody with spurring, fiery red with speed," to the Senate to tell the fathers that an island believed to be larger than Sicily, and far more fertile than Sardinia, an island of which former proconsuls had merely heard, an island which the traders in tin and hides and the pearl-divers represented as rich in minerals, in pasture and plough-land, had submitted to the Proconsular fasces—this was a feat comparable to the discovery of a new world: it was one more proof that the Roman was irresistible, and that the children of Itha and the War God were chosen by fate to be lords of the habitable world. That Caesar did little more than land in Britain, and depart from it, was not taken into account. He had crossed a perilous strait, exacted hostages from an unknown race, imposed a tribute on kings with strange names and unknown realms—a nominal tribute perhaps, yet nevertheless a symbol of homage, even if never paid.

When Mr. Long turns Romeward the interest of his narrative flags. He disdains or is unable to describe with any degree of animation the restoration of Cicero, the riots and death of Clodius, the scene at Milo's trial—a rehearsal of the second Triumvirate—or the luckless expedition of Cassius. But there is so much of rare and sterling worth in the present volume and its predecessors that we heartily recommend them to every student of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Republic."

THREE TO ONE.*

THREE to One differs in many respects from the Annals of an Eventful Life. Yet, had it appeared anonymously, like its predecessor, it would have been impossible to read many pages of it without recognizing the author's hand. There is the same freshness of thought and style; the same quaintness, rather perhaps in the manner of thinking than in the thought itself. Three to One is eminently a novel of society, yet how different it is from the fashionable social novel generally! All through it is pervaded by a happy tone of persiflage, marked, we should say, by a strong individuality, yet lending itself flexibly to the different characters of the story. Sometimes we are inclined to fear that the lightness is likely to become laboured; or, if not, that it must degenerate into something approaching the childish. But it is like the slightly and coquettishly affected lip of a pretty and piquante woman. Regulated by her tact it is always seductive, and has little but its fascination in common with the lip of infancy. While Dr. Daunt's playfulness rarely, if ever, degenerates as you had feared, every here and there comes something that assures you unobtrusively of his strength and manhood—something in the shrewdly humorous turn of a sentence, in a touch of scholarship that goes wide of the beaten paths, in the hints of a matured experience. We should emphatically characterize Three to One as sparkling, and so the novel should be considering its scope and its subject. The dialogue, the descriptions, the very presentations of the characters, the comments of the author as he plays chorus to his piece, all go dancing along, the bubbles flashing up to the surface; there may sometimes be froth, but there is always sparkle. That there is some originality in the design, too, that the story "travels," may be gathered from the fact that for two of the three volumes the scenes lie in the compass of a five days' visit to a country house; while the whole novel does not cover very many weeks. It may be added that the story generally, and the love-making especially, have one characteristic in common with the Annals of an Eventful Life. They steer wide of the sensational, and stick closely to the commonplace. Dr. Daunt pauses from time to time to indicate pathetically the temptations he is resisting, and to demonstrate with how light a strain on the imagination he might have indulged us with melodrama to our heart's content. Then he turns quietly back to write as a man of the world about ordinary people of the world. It must not be supposed, however, that there is any dearth in his book of love, sentiment, or pathos. Love may be made to cause sufficient suffering and anxiety for artistic and dramatic purposes, even if it does not rise to absolute passion, or stimulate to atrocious crime. There are fresh young hearts in Belgravia and May Fair, and affection held in suspense may try most sorely those who have hitherto been the spoiled darlings of fortune. From the very first chapter of Three to One we find ourselves in an atmosphere of love-making. There is a plurality of heroines—a quartet of them—and all are highly attractive in their several ways. There is a pair of marriageable heroes, a Damon and Pythias, and thus it is obvious at once that only two of the ladies can be duly and happily disposed of. Hence the interest. But as it is plain from the first that one of the gentlemen is to pair off placidly with the object of his attachment, the interest of doubt centres upon his friend. By an admirable stage arrangement, the early chapters not only present us to all the personages who are to play the prominent parts, but make us know them as well as if we had been acquaintances of long standing. There is one marked exception, indeed, and, to our mind, that is the blot in the book. Dr. Dasent, as it often strikes us, has an artistic gift amounting to an instinct, which constantly finds illustration in minor points; but sometimes it fails him signally in his general design, just when it would have gone furthest to assure success. The Annals of an Eventful Life dragged in some places, and in others became unduly episodic. The author, having lingered occasionally till he only saved himself from the imputation of tediousness by his brilliance and originality, came at last with a rush, and hustled his hero along to his destiny. He made the death of Halfacre's aunt the theme for the deepest pathos of the story, and, however sincere may be a man's affection for that particular relative, somehow in fiction it rather lends itself to the sense of the ridiculous. Here, in Three to One, the one of the three goddesses who wins at last the prize of love and beauty has been made an abstraction to us through the best part of the story. Our sympathies have been enlisted elsewhere before she dawns upon us, and we decidedly grudge her the happiness which she wins at the expense of our earlier friend. Surprise is only effective when we are compelled to confess that the author's ingenuity has had a legitimate and most unlooked-for triumph. Of course it is in the power of any one to plan a dénouement that shall have no merit but that of being utterly unexpected. In this case we see that the third young lady is very good and pretty and meritorious, and we are told that the gentleman is falling in love with her. With our eyes wide open, we ask whether it is possible that the pair can ever marry. Impossible, is the unhesitating answer; he has gone much too far elsewhere to do anything of the sort, without offending our sense of romantic justice and estranging all our sympathies. But he does marry her, after a rapid courtship precipitated by circumstances. Well, all we can say is that Mr. Dasent and his hero have deceived us in our double capacity of man and critic, and we consider it very little to their credit.

* Three to One; or some Passages out of the Life of Amelia, Lady Westsopple. By George Webb Daunt, D.C.L., Author of "Annals of an Eventful Life." London: Chapman & Hall. 1872.

The plot is simple enough. Sir Thomas Carlton, a great magnate of finance, but a thorough gentleman, his charming wife, and the two fascinating co-heiresses, their daughters, are talking over the invitations to a party at their delightful Surrey seat of High Beech. High Beech is a model house, and the Carltons are model hosts. Consequently all the invited guests jump at the invitation, and come down by the same train. Among the rest are two heroes, Henry Fortescue and Edward Vernon. Each of these gentlemen has a competence under 1,000*l.* a-year; both affect to be barristers; they have the same rooms in the Temple, they share their apartments at Pimlico, and belong to the same Club. Both are good-looking, agreeable, and popular. As happens oftener than most novelists are ready to admit, the two Misses Carlton are in love with the inseparables before acknowledging it either to themselves or each other, and before the young gentlemen have decided to "reciprocate." Between Alice and Vernon it is plain sailing. They glide smoothly into love with each other, and the course of their passion runs pleasantly all along. But poor Florry has a very agitated time of it. She has a rival and a most dangerous one. There is a certain siren young widow, one Lady Sweetapple, who has been richly dowered by a wealthy husband. Lady Sweetapple is resolved to marry Fortescue, and makes little secret of her resolution. Neither indeed does Florry make much secret of her quite identical intentions. As she gets more excited and more unhappy, more and more she betrays her feelings. Indeed, in our idea, Mr. Dasent carries originality of conception somewhat far in his free development of female character under the excitement of unrequited passion. Widows, we know, have a certain proscriptive license, and Lady Sweetapple asserted great independence of manner. Still Lady Sweetapple abuses the widow's license; she plays her game even under the eyes of her friends, male and female, with scarcely an attempt at concealment, while, when she begins to fear that it is almost desperate, she actually couches her proposals in words more direct than most bashful men would venture on. Florry Carlton, too, is continually making almost spoken love to her hesitating swain. That indeed is the best excuse we can make for Fortescue's subsequent behaviour. Florry was an exceedingly nice girl, and there was very great excuse, we admit, for her weakness; for with Lady Sweetapple in the house, and the spectacle of her sister's happiness always before her eyes, her position was a very trying one. But she showed herself forward, all allowances made, and perhaps her forwardness offended Fortescue's fastidious taste, though he neither owns as much to himself nor to us. But if this be a fault in Dr. Dasent, as we think it is, still it is a fault on the right side. He makes his women creatures of flesh and blood and passion, not prudish abstractions with minds formed on the teachings of an excellent governess, and manners regulated by printed canons of etiquette. So, to return from our digression, the struggle between Florry and Lady Sweetapple goes on, until both become jealous of a mysterious Miss Price whom they chance to have heard of, although they have never seen her. As it turns out, their feminine presentiments had not played them false, and while our verdict as to Lady Sweetapple is "served her right," we confess we are grieved for Florry Carlton. Condemning such a bright, impulsive, affectionate nature to perpetual celibacy or a subsequent marriage of convenience and consolation is a dénouement almost as unsatisfactory as that in the Bride of Lammermoor.

We have written of Dr. Dasent's personages as if they were living realities to us, and that he manages to make them so is the distinctive charm of his book. Without attempting more than flying sketches, without pretending to anything like subtle delineation of characters presented as very simple ones, he gives you the assurance that you might find their counterparts in the circle of your own acquaintance. Yet we are not sure that it is not his own lightness and brightness, rather than any extraordinary fidelity to nature, that does it all. We cannot help yielding ourselves and our objections to the illusion exercised by so very agreeable a writer, who writes as somehow having authority, although with an utter absence of assumption. We have already pointed out that Florry Carlton and Lady Sweetapple seem to us in some of their ways more or less lifelike. And we do not often meet in society mothers like Lady Carlton, or in finance fathers like Sir Thomas, ready to bestow their wealthy, lovely, and accomplished daughters on the first pair of fascinating good-for-nothings who present themselves. Nor is Colonel Barker an everyday type, who still makes affectionate love to the Indian garrison belle whom he married in the days of his early youth; nor Lord Pennyroyal, with his extravagant contrasts of benevolence and parsimony, the millionaire peer who refused his respectable son a decent allowance on principle, and sent 20,000*l.* as a wedding gift to a pair of comparative strangers; nor Mrs. Marjoram, who, from being the most irritating and offensive of shrews, changes, as by magic, to the most loving of wives. The more credit to Mr. Dasent, that while we can pick all these faults in detail, the general effect of his writing is so extremely realistic. He is a novelist who holds his fortune in his own hands. If he would but construct his entire story as artistically as he does its episodes and incidents, if he would make the originality of his creations a trifle less eccentric, we are convinced that he would do himself more justice than he has done as yet. Even if he gave proof of much less power and talent than he does, it would be impossible to part from him except on the pleasantest terms. For, while showing himself the man of the world and the man of society in every page of his book, he treats everything and everybody so genially that he puts us on happier terms with human nature and ourselves. There must be fools and knaves, adventurers and adventures, but it is the moral of Mr. Dasent's novels that the worst and most foolish have their redeeming qualities, and that goodness and kindness are far more common than it is the fashion to believe them.

REEVE'S ROYAL AND REPUBLICAN FRANCE.*

(Second Notice.)

WE now come to the matter of Mr. Reeve's collected Essays.

We confess that we do not see that close connexion of purpose which, according to Mr. Reeve himself, we ought to find in them. The earlier ones, the first of which was published as long ago as 1844, are studies on various points of modern French history from Louis the Fourteenth onward, several of which might have been written at any time, and with no special object beyond ordinary historical illustration of the times with which they deal. When Mr. Reeve writes about Louis the Fourteenth and the Duke of St. Simon, or again about Beugnot and Mollin in the time of the first Buonaparte, there is really not much to say about him. He is neither particularly good nor particularly bad; the essays are such as might have been written by almost any one who had some practice in periodical writing, and who had the books before him on which the articles are founded. We see of course at every step that we are not dealing with a scholar or with a man of any wide grasp of history; but men who do not rise to that rank have their use in many walks of life, just as Horace, when he despises mediocrity in poets, declares it to be useful and respectable in lawyers. In these essays Mr. Reeve, though he shows no originality, shows some natural acuteness, and he is altogether far more tolerable than when he has lashed himself up to the fine frenzy of his later pieces. That he has but vague notions about the history of Flanders or about the history of the Empire is nothing very wonderful; he is therein simply on a level with the "general reader," to whom he characteristically dedicates his labours in his very first page. For us, who have been long trying to find out what kind of a being the general reader is, it may be as well to remember on so high an authority as that of Mr. Reeve, that he is a person whom "prolixity and redundancy almost invariably repel from a collection of the materials for history." We have not all the books at hand which Mr. Reeve reviews, but we should greatly like to see the original of the passage which in his version speaks of "the Spanish possessions in Flanders, including Burgundy and Franch Comté." And when Mr. Reeve speaks of "the pedantic Court of Vienna, where two succeeding centuries seemed scarcely to do more than change the name of the reigning sovereign," we should like to know of what two centuries Mr. Reeve is speaking. The remark belongs to the year 1668, and we should have thought that at all events the two centuries before that time had done a good deal more than change the name of the reigning sovereign. To be sure, the first Leopold, with whom alone Mr. Reeve is immediately concerned, reigned a long time, and Mr. Reeve may perhaps have somehow managed to spread him over the whole of the two centuries. It is of more consequence when Mr. Reeve (i. 150), translating St. Simon, not only talks of "effrenate persecution"—whatever that may be in either English or French—goes on to say—

* Royal and Republican France. A Series of Essays reprinted from the "Edinburgh," "Quarterly," and "British and Foreign Reviews." By Henry Reeve. 2 vols. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

To understand what I have to say of an affair which so principally occupied all the rest of the reign of Louis XIV., the minority of Louis XV., and all the reign, latent under the Duke, open since his fall, of Cardinal Fleury, many things which are scattered in these Memoirs must be recalled to mind.

After the words "the Duke" Mr. Reeve adds, in brackets, "of Orleans." We fancy that, if Mr. Reeve will turn to any history of France, he will find that the Duke of Orleans and "M. le Duc" were two quite different persons.

On these essays then there is really no great reason to dwell. They were all well enough as articles in the several Reviews in which they appeared; only we doubt whether, at all events in their unrevised form, stuffed with extracts and full of the little tricks of periodical writing, they had any claim to appear in the form of a book. We will only add that we hope that, if people in the next world know anything of what is said of them in this, the shade of the Grand Monarque will not be unduly puffed up on learning that Mr. Reeve has "already expressed a high opinion of his industry and talents."

The articles which refer to later times are of more importance. Mr. Reeve now gets on his high horse, and his prancings are often somewhat of the mightiest. From that height he looks down on the rest of the world, and deals out praise and blame in an imperial fashion. But there is one name before which he is always bowed down. Mr. Reeve, lifted on high in comparison of other people, seems to stand in a kind of Boswell-like relation to Alexis de Tocqueville. And we must do him the justice to say that he has not unsuccessfully imitated some of the weaker points of his model. Mr. Reeve in truth has a knack of doing this. We do not see that he has learned much from any of the great essays of Lord Macaulay, though they appeared in the same Review, and some of them dealt with nearly the same subjects, as his own. But Lord Macaulay in an unguarded moment let fall a remark towards the end of the second volume of his History, in which he casually put together the dangerous classes, as they are called, of modern European society, and those founders of the existing nations of Europe whom people of Mr. Reeve's stamp are fond of speaking of as the "barbarians." Lord Macaulay let drop this saying much as he let drop the saying about the New Zealander. And as other people have used the New Zealander over and over again, so Mr. Reeve uses the "barbarians." The comparison in itself is about as much to the purpose as the fashion of calling dirty little boys "street Arabs"; but what Lord Macaulay said once casually and perhaps carelessly, Mr. Reeve says over and over again in various forms and with evident delight. In the like sort he deals with his model Tocqueville. We need not say that Mr. Reeve's one object of veneration is at least well chosen. To be sure in his famous translation he dealt with his idol much as the Arcadians are said to have dealt with Pan, but in both cases we have no doubt that the form of reverence, however strange in our eyes, was the fruit of sincere devotion on the part of those who offered it. Mr. Reeve has found in Tocqueville the "exemplar vitiis imitabile." Tocqueville was a man of keen insight and political sagacity, but he was not a scholar, and it is only his later work, that on the Ancien Régime, which shows any signs of research into the past as distinguished from observation of the present. In studying the Federal Constitution of the United States it does not seem to have occurred to him to compare it with Federal Constitutions in other times and places, not even with that Achaian Constitution of which it was so close a reproduction, a reproduction all the more precious because it was most certainly undesigned. Tocqueville moreover wrote in French; he was a Norman, and we therefore claim him as something better than a Frenchman; but he wrote in the language one of whose characteristics is an apparent accuracy as distinguished from that real accuracy which belongs alike to old Greek and to modern German—Mr. Reeve's Macedonian—whenever modern German does justice to itself. The temptation of French writing is to affect point at any price. Now, had M. de Tocqueville taken a good dose of Thucydides, Aristotle, and Polybios, he would have learned that "democracy" is the name of a form of government, and that it has nothing to do with the social condition of the country in which it prevails. That absolute political equality of every citizen, which is the real meaning of the word "democracy," is perfectly consistent, as ancient Athens shows, with widely marked social distinctions and with a powerful practical influence of birth and wealth. But Tocqueville unluckily used the words "democracy," "democratic," and the like to express a certain social state, as distinguished from a certain form of government. Now Mr. Reeve is doubtless quite right in holding that the social condition of a country is of at least as much consequence as the form of its political government; but that is no reason for speaking in a way which confuses the social condition with the form of government. Mr. Reeve constantly uses the word "democracy" in a way which answers to the kindred vulgarity by which some people call certain particular classes "the aristocracy." For the misuse of the word aristocracy there is at least thus much of excuse, that a word is sometimes wanted for an idea which, in England at least, the word "nobility" does not express; and of course "aristocracy," or anything else, is not quite so bad as talking about the "upper ten thousand." But for Mr. Reeve's vulgarity at the other end there is nothing to be said whatever; it simply confounds all history and all political science, and it gives him an excuse for talking as if he meant something specially wise, when in truth his words have no meaning at all. "It [the late despotism] was the chosen Government of democratic France, and especially of that portion of the French democracy, the peasantry, which, though narrow-minded, ignorant, and easily duped, is incomparably more honest and attached to the cause of peace and order than the democracy of the large towns." So again, "the democracy of the provinces is conservative. The democracy of the towns is destructive." And again, "the democracy of France would probably be surprised if they knew that we laid to their charge the same vice of exclusiveness which they attributed to the old aristocracy and the nobles." In the former two or three passages Mr. Reeve by democracy evidently means, not a form of government, not even a political party, but simply the poor, the lower orders, the mass of the people, whatever we choose to call them. In the third passage, it is not very clear to us, nor probably to Mr. Reeve either, whether he really means a social class, or whether the ideas of a social class and a political party have got confounded together. Moreover we get the grotesque idea of the democracy of France, whatever it may be, troubling itself about vices which are laid to its charge by Mr. Reeve. But it is more important to ask what Mr. Reeve means by democracy in such passages as the following:—

It is a melancholy reflection that but little has been done by modern democracy to dignify and exalt mankind.

Democracy, it may be, bears with it the destiny or the doom of civilization, but nowhere as yet has it been favourable to greatness.

To all institutions of this permanent nature the spirit of democracy is opposed. It views with a jealous and hostile eye everything that it cannot control. It resists permanent and collective obligations as an encroachment on the unlimited personal freedom of the individual.

Democratic power is an essential and useful check to the abuses of authority; but it is a feeble or violent instrument of government, and the collective strength of a nation may be sensibly diminished by it.

Even the sentiment of patriotism . . . is weakened by democracy, and may eventually be destroyed.

Now in all these passages, what does Mr. Reeve mean by democracy? He means something which exists in France; he means something which he also tells us exists in the United States. He does not tell us whether what he calls democracy exists or has existed anywhere else. Now, if there is democracy in France, and if there is democracy in the United States, it is plain that democracy must mean two very different things. The characteristic of French history since 1789 is that nothing has lasted, that no Government has been permanent, that law has been over and over again overthrown by violence, that democracy has twice at least been turned into despotism. Nothing of the kind has been the result of democracy in the United States; there has been a great civil war, and, as a civil war cannot be carried on strictly according to the terms of an Act of Parliament, some irregular and illegal acts have accompanied and followed the war. But the general course of the history of the Union has been one of eminent regard for law, and of almost superstitious veneration for a Constitution which came into force in the very year when the long disturbances of France began. But we might go on to ask whether Mr. Reeve ever heard of that other democratic commonwealth where the votes of hundreds of thousands, given in a free and true plebiscite, have determined on the not revolutionary course of keeping their Constitution as it is. If we were not dealing with a writer who thinks either that there was only one King at a time in Sparta or else that there are two at a time in Prussia, we would ask if Mr. Reeve ever heard the names of Athens and Florence? Mr. Reeve's talk about democracy—in any sense of the word which history can recognize—being opposed to permanent institutions, and even to patriotism, reaches the name sublime of ignorance which was reached by Lord Palmerston when he said that Gothic architecture was fit only for a Jesuit's college. Here is a phenomenon; here is a man whose writings find their way into a periodical which was once enriched by some of the great masterpieces of the English tongue, who not only cannot write a sentence free from vulgarity, conceit, and affectation, but to whom all history is a blank. Mr. Reeve is already in the state to which Mr. Lowe would have us all come. To him Marathon and Morgarten, the return of Thrasyboulos and the last long endurance of Florence against Pope and Caesar, are as though they had never been. We know not whether Mr. Reeve ever stood on the field of Marathon; if he did, he has successfully realized that hypothetical character whom Johnson did not envy, and in whom he hardly believed. We know not whether he ever risked his neck among peaks, passes, and glaciers; it is quite certain that, if he did, he never stooped to cast a glance at the democratic, and yet somehow patriotic, commonwealths which lie beneath them.

As Mr. Reeve would say, we have not space to point out all the queer but, in their way, instructive things which are to be found in this course of his essays. But it is both amusing and instructive to look at the way in which he deals with early French history when he comes across it. The mind of the "general reader," so far as we can fathom so deep a mystery, seems to have a dim notion that all that is now France always was France, and yet was not always France. That the boundaries and divisions of France were once different from what they are now is a fact which he is constantly coming across, but which he always comes across with surprise. It is with a sort of stately condescension that he stoops to look at any part of France out of Paris; perhaps he would be equally grand towards any part of England out of London. "There is too, it must be acknowledged, a picturesque charm in those rural districts which modern improvement has not squared and levelled and embellished." This is perhaps as much as poor rustics have any right to look for from a Registrar of the Privy Council. But we wish we had space to copy at length, like Mr. Reeve himself, his speculations about French provinces and cities. "The old names of Normandy, Brittany, Burgundy, Flanders, and Provence insensibly recur when we have to speak of the rural life and native character of these regions; for these divisions are indelibly rooted in the soil." And so on for pages together, apologizing and explaining for calling things by their natural names. "Flanders," Mr. Reeve kindly explains, "had in fact nothing in common with France, to which it had been comparatively recently annexed." It would take a page to explain the exact balance of truth and error in this passage, but anyhow the simplicity of the remark is charming. Mr. Reeve, however, is greatest when he comes down from his very highest place, from the Olympus whence he hurls his thunders against the Communists, to talk about the old municipal institutions of France and other parts of Gaul. It is a witness such as we seldom get to the value of historical, and even of local, research that, in the midst of "an awful prelude to the most tremendous catastrophe in the history of man," when "the lurid glare of another conflagration was lighting up the ruins of the ravaged city," when "these myrmidons"—why is that particular division of the Achaian host so often in the mouths of writers of Mr. Reeve's class?—"were trampling on the Cross and casting down the Column" (the union of the two capital Cs might suggest that in Mr. Reeve's creed there is some mysterious sanctity about the Vendôme pillar), at such a moment as this, Mr. Reeve, though "for himself" he was free to confess that an hour of ocular observation frequently teaches more than a century of books and written records, can turn to review several books on communal antiquities, and can even stop to point out that some cities of Eastern France had belonged to what he is pleased to call the Germanic Empire. Mr. Reeve seems to have been just then in a patronizing humour. He pronounces Dr. Brady's (the M.D., not the B.D. and pianist) Essay on English Boroughs to be the best authority on the subject—a point on which the Early English Text Society would perhaps not agree with him—and he does honour to the "prodigious erudition and searching discrimination" of Augustin Thierry. He quotes "M. Michelet" and "the monk of St. Denis" side by side, as co-ordinate authorities, and he even makes a reference to Portz, about which we are not a little curious to know whether it was made at first hand. All this comes cheerily among talk about "secular tumults" and "sicarian [sic] bands." A "secular tumult," not unmutually, seems to be one in which people "plundered abbeyes." Mr. Reeve gives an amusing list of towns, French, Aquitaine, and Burgundian, all jumbled together, and adds that "the earliest act of homage of the citizens of Périgueux to the Kings of France took place in 1204." We have made no researches to verify or to disprove the fact; but, if it was so, did it ever enter into Mr. Reeve's head to think why it was in that particular year that it happened?

Mr. Reeve might, we think, have spared some personal remarks on M. Louis Blanc, who, whatever we think of his opinions, has at least suffered for them. But in the eyes of the prosperous ill success is very fittingly the greatest of crimes. Wishing however to part on good terms with Mr. Reeve, we will end with one extract more:—

There may be freedom under a monarchy; there may be oppression under a republic; and at certain epochs of the history of a nation a republic may be accepted as the safer and stronger form of power.

In these words, if there is somewhat of stateliness, there is no lack of truth. There is not to be sure much of novelty in them, but to ask Mr. Reeve to be at once true and now would be laying too heavy a burden on him.

PEAKS IN PEN AND PENCIL.*

THIS is another in the series of books by which Mr. Walton, the well-known painter of mountain scenery, is endeavouring to indoctrinate the British public in an intelligent worship of the Alps. The present volume is intended to help the beginner in his attempts to reproduce the likeness of the wondrous peaks that have impressed his imagination during his summer rambles. A number of Mr. Walton's outlines have been reproduced in autotype and are accompanied by letterpress, which has had the benefit of Mr. Bonney's revision, setting forth the lessons to be drawn from them by the tiro. The whole book may be regarded as in some sort an appendix to Mr. Ruskin's admirable, though rather desultory, chapters upon mountain scenery in the Modern Painters. The advice given to the beginner appears to be sound, though brief. The importance of understanding the geological structure of the masses he is endeavouring to portray, the necessity of observing the rules of perspective, and of duly selecting his point of view, are all set forth with proper emphasis. We need not look at many specimens of the art in order to perceive that these directions, if tolerably obvious, are far from superfluous. The world is deluged with sketches in which the experienced eye at once detects the utter ignorance of the artist, and his incapacity to take advantage of the most effective aspects of nature; and we have no doubt that an intelligent student may learn much by a careful study both of Mr. Walton's precepts and his practice. We would venture, however, on the present occasion to draw a moral slightly different from that contemplated by Mr. Walton. He lays great stress upon the importance of "composition"; by which he means, as he is careful to explain, not that the artist should arrange the masses according to his own notions of what would be beautiful, but that he should select from the infinite combinations presented to him by nature those which will be most impressive when translated into a few black marks upon grey paper. Admitting all that Mr. Walton says, and admitting, too, what he does not expressly say—namely, that any artist, however resolutely he goes to nature, will inevitably express his own tastes by selecting certain classes of subjects—we would add that there is a danger against which Mr. Walton scarcely gives sufficient warning. Indeed, in spite of his conspicuous merits, he is, to our thinking, sometimes inclined to fall into the error to which we refer.

Mr. Walton evidently has in his mind a certain type of mountain beauty which he reproduces with rather provoking iteration. If we attempt to put his practice into words, we should say that the ideal mountain of his imagination is a uniform pyramid, rising above a delicate veil of mist which conceals its foundations, and seen from a platform of level rock in the foreground. The frontispiece of the present book is a drawing of the Dent Blanche, seen from the neighbourhood of Evolène, which corresponds pretty accurately to this description. We are far from denying its beauty; indeed we may admit that such views, when they can be obtained, are amongst the most striking in the Alps; but we must add that they are not only rare, but far from being the most characteristic of the infinitely varied combinations of cliff and slope and snow-field to be met with in the mountains. The love of this peculiar form seems to us to blind Mr. Walton to some of the grandest of all scenery. He specially admires the sigüilles of Chamouni and the Dauphiné district, and there we have no fault to find with him; he seems to have a still warmer, if not more profound, admiration for the Dolomites. Far be it from us to say one word against the beauties of the Marmolata, the Antelao, or the Sasso di Pelmo. Undoubtedly there is something very original and extremely beautiful in the singular scenery of which they are the ornament. But our quarrel with Mr. Walton begins when he introduces the magnificent precipices of the Oberland as a kind of corollary to the Dolomites. Though he does not expressly say so, we feel that he regards the Jungfrau and Eiger, and even that incomparable peak the Wetterhorn, as complimented when mentioned in the same breath with the more grotesque summits of the Venetian Alps. By all means let every man have his taste; and let us grant that a painter might find work for a lifetime in interpreting to the world the beauties of Mr. Walton's favourites. The selection, however, seems to us to imply a certain indifference to some of the main elements of mountain grandeur. In the first place, this love of peaks and pyramids explains why it is that Mr. Walton's mountains seem to be too often open to the criticism of the painter described in Mr. Clarence King's Sierra Nevada. They look as if a good gale might blow them over. The Dolomites are wanting in the sublime massiveness of the Oberland giants. They are fanciful, grotesque, and exaggerated, and suggest the most daring efforts of some eccentric Gothic architects; but they miss the tremendous air of eternal repose which the Egyptian pyramids might have caught from the Northern Alps. Both are beautiful in their way, and we need not decide which is most beautiful; but no one can be quite a worthy painter of mountain scenery who does not appreciate the weight and solidity of the more soberly devised masses. And, in the next place, there is another still more palpable deficiency in the Dolomites, which falls in with Mr. Walton's tastes. There is a want of the contrast obtained in the higher Alps by the judicious arrangement of glaciers. In the Wetterhorn, already noticed as in its way an almost perfect type, the sharp pyramid that cuts the sky gains more impressiveness than is due to the singular grace of its outline by the contrast with the gigantic pediment on which it rests and the long undulating lines of glacier below. This is a kind of beauty which Mr. Walton scarcely seems to recognize. He is not much at home in the snow-fields. He gives us in this volume only one drawing of a glacier, and the letterpress speaks of it rather as a natural curiosity than as an element in mountain beauty. Now glaciers, until they have all melted away, as they seem to be rapidly doing, are clearly amongst the most characteristic features of Alpine scenery, and the power of their rounded forms to enhance the grandeur of the precipices above them is an element of interest not to be safely neglected. Look, for example, at the Matterhorn, and observe the heightening of effect given by the long line of snow above the Zaunt Glacier. Omitting that, the great peak is indeed vigorous and commanding, but it loses enormously in grace and unity; and yet if it were a Dolomite peak, it would necessarily abandon this beautiful appendage.

* Peaks in Pen and Pencil. By Elijah Walton. Edited by T. G. Bonney. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

Mr. Walton observes in regard to two or three of the drawings in his book that they could not possibly be made into effective pictures. Something might be done, he thinks, by blotting out certain offensive lines by a judicious cloud; but even with that expedient two or three of them remain hopeless. They would be useful as topographical or geological memoranda, but as pictures they are given as lessons on what to avoid. Without entirely dissenting from his judgment, we fancy that the tendencies just described are partly exemplified in this opinion. Of course, in a mere outline sketch, where the painter is deprived of light and shade and the play of clouds, and everything depends on the combination of a few black lines, the power of art is very limited. The most characteristic beauties of the mountains, indeed, depend upon the strange magic of the atmospheric effects, and without them a sketch is little more than a mathematical diagram. We can only wonder that Mr. Walton has done so much with such simple materials; and we may admit that it is impossible without calling in other resources to make much of the condemned drawings. If, however, the saying is to be interpreted as meaning that they could not be made into the skeletons of really impressive pictures, we should be inclined either to dissent, or to infer that pictorial art is still less capable than we generally suppose of embodying the poetry of the scenery. Mr. Walton, for example, gives us an outline of the summit of the Viso, rising beyond a snow-field. The line of snow which crosses the middle of the picture is, he says, "a fatal defect." And he adds, "skilful treatment with clouds might trick it up a little; but, do what you will, this sketch must always be deficient in composition and grandeur." Why so? one is inclined to ask. The expression of "tricking it up with clouds" is a little unfortunate, for it sounds as if Mr. Walton, instead of aiming at some definite effect of which the clouds formed an integral part, first painted his mountains and then dabbed on bits of cloud here and there to hide awkward corners. Such treatment would be fair neither to the clouds nor to the mountains, and Mr. Walton is doubtless above it; though, to be frank, we think he is a little too much given to use his clouds simply as pretty decorations. But he that as it may, the scene is certainly one of those which affect one most powerfully in real life. The rough weatherbeaten rocks look all the more tremendous when contrasted with the level wilderness of snow. To give the effect of distance on the snow-field itself is indeed almost impossible from the want of aerial perspective, and one element in the effect on the spectator is therefore missing; but if the interest be concentrated on the curved mountain-top, and it is thrown back to such a distance from the snow-field as to suggest the probability of the vast intervening gulf, we have the elements of one of the grandest varieties of mountain scenery. Whether melting in a gorgeous sunset, or beaten by a thunderstorm, the crags would look all the more imposing for their contrast with the calm white foreground. It is true that it would be impossible to give the impression of their height; and probably it would be judicious of the painter to advance more nearly to the edge of the snow. If for any reason, however, he were fixed to this particular spot, we fancy that he might succeed in spite of the supposed weakness in the composition. In the same way, though Mr. Walton is clearly right in objecting to various scenes in which the mountain-summits rise in a vertical line, one behind the other, and repeat each other's forms with monotonous and apparently artificial symmetry, it is still to be remembered that on many occasions this monotony becomes an element of interest in its way by suggesting an infinite series. The long procession of peaks causes us unconsciously to exaggerate their number, and the simple form becomes impressive by repetition. In short, though we do not dispute that Mr. Walton is generally right, there are obvious objections to imposing too vigorous a law of composition. The tendency to mannerism is set up, and the artist cannot be satisfied till he has got all his mountains arranged according to a preconceived pattern, with the three distances properly distinguished, and no one peak looking impudently over the head of his brother. Great as is the variety of Alpine scenery, there are certain combinations perpetually recurring, and the painter who gets into the trick of always using one will find that his own mountains have a marvellous family likeness. He will repeat his peak and his bit of mist, or his chalet with its group of pines, or his crevasse with a blue centre, as regularly and mechanically as though the Alps were as monotonous as the Lincolnshire fens. And, therefore, though the tiro may safely trust himself for the most part to Mr. Walton, we suspect that he would do well to make a few excursions on his own account, and occasionally try a subject forbidden by all the laws of composition. If he will see what is to be made of it, he may occasionally evolve harmony from discord, and at any rate will get for a time out of the old ruts.

WARD'S EXPERIENCES OF A DIPLOMATIST.*

IT has become a commonplace to remark how easy it will be for future generations to write the history of our times from the abundant matter we shall leave them in our newspapers; but, as with many other commonplaces, there is a good deal of fallacy in the notion. Not only will the mere bulk of newspaper material be almost overpowering to the future historian, but there will be presented so many different and often conflicting views of the same event, down to its most trivial details, that the general bearing will be hard to discover; and the habit of exaggeration which seems to increase every year upon our public writers will prevent their articles from being a faithful reflection of the facts. If any Englishman in India or America is fortunate enough to have a well-informed, intelligent, and fair-minded correspondent at home, he will learn from his private letters much about politics which he would not learn from the newspapers, always pitched in an unnatural key, and he may probably get a juster impression of the tendency of current changes than a study of Parliamentary debates and leading articles could convey. It is therefore, we venture to think, a mistake to believe that the utility for historical purposes of personal memoirs and diaries is now at an end. Apart from their interest to subsequent times as repositories of the sort of gossip which does not find its way into a regular history, they will give even to the professed student a particularly valuable kind of information—a notion of the views entertained by thoughtful men who had no motive either for dissembling or exaggerating their real sentiments upon matters which the public prints declaim about with often affected vehemence. Such views, too, are specially suggestive when we know something of the character and surroundings of the writer; for one thus sees how certain facts struck people of a given class and mental temper, whereas the newspaper writer is impersonal, often untraceable at the time, and still more so after the lapse of years. We are for this reason glad to welcome such a book as that before us, in which an unprejudiced observer, whose circumstances have enabled him to see the interior of foreign life and politics, gives us the impression made on him by thirty eventful years of German history. The author strikes us as an amiable and cultivated man, singularly fair and unbiassed in political, if not quite equally so in religious, matters; comprehensive in his interests, sober in his judgment, and conscientiously anxious to do justice to the views and characters of those with whom he was brought into contact. He writes clearly, simply, and pleasantly; and although the book has the form of a personal narrative, it is free from any tinge of egotism.

Mr. Ward's diplomatic career began with an appointment, in 1841, to act as British Commissioner for the revival of the Stade Toll, a tax which the Hanoverian Government then levied upon vessels navigating the Elbe, and which was a source of much annoyance to ourselves as well as to the Hamburgers. In 1845 he was appointed by Lord Aberdeen Consul-General at Leipzig, with a sort of general commission to report upon commercial questions in Germany; and in 1865 he was transferred to Hamburg as British Consul-General and Charge d'Affaires, where he remained till the abolition of that office in 1870. He had thus excellent opportunities of watching the course of German politics during one of the most eventful periods in the history of the nation, and he gives us a good many valuable remarks on the forces which were at work, some bringing about, some retarding, national unity, together with interesting notices of influential personages known only by name in England, such as Schwartzberg, Radowitz, the Archduke John of Austria, Arnclion, Savigny, Lappenberg, Sieveking, Baron von Schell-Plessem, the painter Cornelius, and many others. These notices are generally briefer than one would wish, and sometimes approach the trivial. Apollo does not always bend his bow, and it is some comfort to know that Count Bismarck feels the necessity and the difficulty of making small talk to his guests:—

He [M. de Bismarck] spoke of English country life, which, he said, must be a most agreeable thing, and that he himself was fond of the country, and regretted that his official duties prevented him from spending more time upon his estates. He inquired how I liked Berlin, and said that the Prussian capital was really well off for good society. "I have had a glimpse of London," added M. de Bismarck; "your nobility are said to be rather exclusive, but London in the season must be very enjoyable."

But in many cases such reports of stray conversations supply just those little touches of individuality which one desires, and so often desires in vain, in the case of people whom we know by their books or by fame, and of whom one wishes to catch some slight personal impression for the imagination to work upon. The following, for instance, is interesting to scholars:—

At Wachsmuth's house I had the pleasure of meeting Godfrey Hermann, the great philologist, then in his seventy-fifth year, but fresh in intellect and able to continue his lectures on the Greek drama with unabated vigour. He was a short spare man, fresh coloured, and of a lively and ardent temperament, which he inherited from his mother, who was of French descent. His habits were active, and he rode a great deal for exercise, contrary to the custom of German professors. We talked of English scholars, most of whom were known to him. Upon Gifford he bestowed much commendation. He said, "You English philologists are so fortunate as to be provided with rich probandaries and dignities in the Church. Your Church feels the study of the classical authors who ignored Christianity." I remarked to Hermann that he was himself a doctor of theology, and I presumed had been in some measure occupied with ecclesiastical matters. He answered, "No, indeed, I care little about them. I have rather accustomed myself to look at religion from the point of view of the scientists, and I do not trouble myself at all about Church affairs." I asked him whether he thought that for a great commercial country like England the system of classical instruction followed in our public schools was the most desirable? He said, "Why not? the ancients are the best businessmen; they taught youth with brave and noble thoughts. As a nation you are egotistic, and your Church is too necessary to expect much reverence from young men. I should be sorry if the classics should fall into neglect in your schools." A merchant who was present started some objections, but Professor Wachsmuth supported his colleague's opinion, and thought that the Realschulen, or non-classical schools, had been carried rather too far in Germany. I walked home with Hermann, and in taking leave, he said, "Pray believe that I wish well to old England. I don't forget my English ring." This ring was a legacy he had bequeathed to him by Dr. Parr as the greatest critic of the age, and he wore it with peculiar satisfaction.

* Experiences of a Diplomatist; being Recollections of Germany, founded on Diaries kept during the years 1840-1870. By John Ward, C.B. London: Macmillan & Co. 1872.

Here are some words on the present King of Saxony:—

Prince John was favourably known before his accession to the throne of Saxony as a man of letters, well versed in history, theology, and German law. As a member of the First Chamber of the Diet he frequently took part in the debates, and as one of the Committee charged with the examination of the proposed new code of criminal law, he consented to act as Refrent, and his elaborate report materially contributed to the introduction of an improved system of penal legislation. He was in fact what is so rarely to be found among princes, an accomplished scholar. On the occasion of a visit which Frederick William IV. (of Prussia) paid to Dresden (I think in 1852) the King of Saxony and Prince John received their royal guest from Berlin at the foot of the palace staircase, who, on catching sight of him, called out to the King, "But you make too much ceremony with me, dear little angel!" and then, looking towards the Prince, "And you too, old schoolmaster!"

The following relates to the late King of Prussia:—

He had undoubtedly great social talents, and even if born in the middle rank of life would have been deemed a first-rate talker. At towns and after-dinner speeches he was particularly good. The columns which were so industriously diffused in regard to his habits of life did not rest upon the slightest foundation. The King seldom drank anything stronger than wine and water, and if he was at times in elevated spirits, it certainly was not from any cause of that nature, but simply from the effect of society and conversation upon a peculiarly excitable constitution. His affection for the middle ages and the times of chivalry was the result of his education. He certainly did not inherit it from his father, who, with all his love of dictatorial power, had nothing romantic in his notions, and cared little about historical traditions. The leading idea of Frederick William IV. was that of the continuity of the past with the present; he did not object to the political machine moving forwards, but it must be in such a way as not to break off into a new track—not to violate the memory of what has gone before us. When he visited Eton College, he said to the Provost, "This institution has for me an inexpressible charm, for here the old is ever new, and the new never out of harmony with the old." Accordingly he believed his hereditary right to be of divine origin, and that whatever concessions he might make to the wishes of his people were to be measured by no other rule than that of his own royal conscience. . . . Immeasurably superior to his father in talents and accomplishments, he unfortunately laboured under the defect, fatal to one called to rule a nation, of indecision of character. His Ministers could not rely upon his consistency in the ordinary affairs of business; and in the great political movement of 1849 his incapacity to take a decided line one way or the other was nearly the ruin of the Prussian State.

This whimsey of divine right is held quite as firmly by his brother and successor, the present King of Prussia; but the latter, with far inferior tastes and talents, has the tenacity of purpose in which Frederick William IV. was deficient, and the power, when he finds a thoroughly able and competent adviser, of holding fast to him and trusting him even in things at first sight repugnant. It cost Bismarck some trouble to persuade his master to annex Hanover in 1866, but he succeeded, and has induced the King to do many things which any one who knows his earlier career, and his strong feudalist proclivities, might have deemed impossible. Unlike as they are in many other respects, there is in this a certain similarity between King William and Victor Emmanuel, whose characteristic merit has been his loyalty to capable Ministers, and a certain power of inspiring the belief that he will act in a straightforward way.

Mr. Ward's notices of the movement of the Germans towards national unity are somewhat more succinct than we could wish, but they are often of considerable value. He is good upon the Schleswig-Holstein business, and any one who has, as Mr. Carlyle would say, a taste for raking in the Eternal Dust-heaps, will find its main points and bearings well put and commented on. A clear résumé is given near the end of the volume of the changes introduced in 1865 on the formation of the North German Confederation, and of the way in which the constitution of that body has been subsequently modified by the entrance of Bavaria, Württemberg, and Baden; and the author points out, what English critics usually forget, that even if the policy of Prussia may have been occasionally violent, the deadlock in Germany was one which nothing but violence could get rid of. When negotiations had been tried in vain for more than twenty years, it became clear that only the sword could decide between the pretensions of Austria and of Prussia to lead the nation; and between these two rivals no friend of enlightenment could hesitate. Englishmen forget that from 1815 down till 1866 the Austrian Government had been the embodiment of the reaction, the ally of the sacerdotal power, the oppressor of her non-German races, the great obstacle to the consolidation of the Germanic Confederation into a State. Whatever faults may justly be charged upon Prussia were certainly far less grave than these.

Though the best part of his own life has been spent in the diplomatic profession, Mr. Ward has formed no very high estimate of the services which it renders, at least so far as England is concerned. The following passage states his views on this subject:—

My experience has not tended to raise my estimation of the diplomatic profession in general. There is a great deal of smooth talk about trifles, much running about to hear what is passing, and to hunt up secrets, and many long-winded despatches without any point. The activity of the smaller diplomatists called the mouches is amusing enough. They cater for the ambassadors and envoys of the greater Powers, and are rewarded by their patronage and invitations. But all this bustle usually comes to nothing. What is wanted is more reflection and more political sagacity. It is easy enough to talk and write, but to think well is another matter, and without much thought it is not possible to hazard a prediction of coming events. . . . The envoys of Great Britain in foreign States are justly accounted honourable and generous-minded men. They are gentlemen in the best sense of the word. Here and there an experienced statesman is to be found among them. But, upon the whole, British diplomacy has not been successful in gaining the confidence of foreign Governments. For a number of years past England has almost withdrawn herself from Continental affairs, and the notion, whether right or wrong, prevails, that we are indifferent to the fate of foreign nations, except in so far as our commercial interests are involved in their well-being. This is the reason why important political secrets are withheld from the knowledge of the British representatives abroad. It explains why the inimical relations between Prussia and France which led to the late war were not fully communicated to our ambassadors at Berlin, and why he was left in ignorance of the dangerous overtures which had been made to Prince Bismarck on the part of the ruler of France for their mutual aggrandisement at the expense of independent States. . . . It was once suggested by Archbishop Whately that a prophecy office should be established by the Crown; that candidates for employment should be invited to deposit prophecies of events to happen at periods to be specified by them, and that those whose predictions had been most exactly fulfilled should be placed in high posts in the State service. Tried by such a test, I fear there are not many members of our diplomatic body who would be entitled to claim advancement, however striking may be their literary accomplishments, or their qualifications in a social point of view.

We do not understand Mr. Ward to mean, nor is there any reason to think, that our diplomatists are, man for man, inferior to those of other nations. But the peculiar position of England, her insularity, so to speak, of character and political system, as well as her geographical situation, places her at a certain disadvantage; while there is an air of ostentatious selfishness and contemptuous patronizing about the utterances of her press, and sometimes of her statesmen, which naturally makes us disliked by Continentals, who have no means of knowing that such utterances are far enough from representing the true feelings of the nation. Utterly unreasonable as was the sympathy of the upper and a large part of the middle classes for France in the late war, it did not in the main arise from a selfish view of English interests. It would be a much easier thing to launch us into a European war than foreign Governments believe, and they may some day find this to their cost. As respects the efficiency of our diplomatic agents, the truth seems to be that we need two different sorts of men. One of these we do not try to train; the other no training can do much to create. At each of the great Courts we ought to have as representative a man of great natural gifts, of political insight, force of will, serenity, and that indescribable power which people call "personal influence." Such men are as rare as great generals or great poets, and are as little to be produced by mere study and experience, though experience is necessary to ripen them. For all lesser work, for the smaller States and the subordinate agents at the great Courts, we chiefly want men trained to observe and report upon economical and legal questions, who can make the commercial and legislative experiments of other countries useful to us. Sometimes we are fortunate enough to have such (and Mr. Ward, we can believe from his book, was one), but our Foreign Office does not seem to be at any pains to produce them, and has but quite recently awakened to a sense of what may be required from them in this direction.

A CHINESE CLASSIC.*

"HAVE you read the Odes?" asked Confucius of his son. "Not yet," was the reply. "If you do not learn the Odes," rejoined the sage, "you will not be fit to converse with." Such was the estimate formed by Confucius of the original of the collection before us. To Western readers, who may be inclined to judge them only as pieces of poetry, the value thus set upon them will seem grossly exaggerated; but that we may have an opportunity of forming a correct judgment of their worth at the time of their appearance in a collection, we must view them from the same standpoint with Confucius. And to do this we must glance at the condition of China in the sixth century before Christ. The Empire of that day was divided into a number of small principalities, presided over by feudal chiefs who owed allegiance of a nominal kind to the Emperor. Following the instincts of their class, as his control over them became weakened they fought and quarrelled, intrigued and plotted one against the other, until the whole system of government became demoralized and the bonds of social union became loosened. The unsettled condition of the body politic was reflected in every department of State and in every household throughout the land. Parents took no heed of their children, and children paid no respect to their parents. Wives neglected their domestic duties, and husbands sought only their own amusements and pleasures. To reform this state of things was the task which Confucius set himself, and it was by attempting to revert to the strict observance of public and social rites and ceremonies that he hoped to accomplish his object. One of the chief instruments he employed to attain this end was the "Book of Poetry," of which he himself said, "The three hundred odes may be summed up in one sentence—Thought without depravity." By urging the study of it on both rulers and people, he trusted to induce them to return to that state of primitive simplicity from which they had so far fallen when the great man helped the poor,

And the poor man loved the great.

How the Odes were to accomplish this will be better understood if we briefly sketch their history. Like the wise man of whom Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun speaks, the Emperors of China from the remotest antiquity had attached great importance to the popular ballads of the country, as indicating the disposition of the people and the nature of the laws which governed them. One of their first duties was therefore to make themselves acquainted with the odes and songs current in the different States. And with this object meetings were held at well-known points at which the princes and governors attended, each with his music-master, to listen to and to collate the ballads from the different parts of the Empire. Chinese writers affirm that at the time of Confucius there were more than three thousand odes current among the people, and that the sage, rejecting those he deemed unsuitable, compiled the present collection, which consists of three hundred and five pieces. Dr. Legge considers, and we think with justice, that the number above quoted is largely in excess of the popular ballads of that day, and he further holds that before the birth of Confucius the "Book of Poetry" existed substantially the same as at the present time, and that his work as a compiler consisted only in rearranging the order of its books and odes. "I returned from Wei to Lo, and then the music was reformed, and the pieces in the Ya and Sung (divisions of the work) all found their proper places," is all he tells us himself on the subject. And this mention is confirmatory of Dr. Legge's views, since reference is found to the Sung and the Ya odes in the Chow Ritual, a work which existed some years before the time of Confucius. But, be this as it may, there can be no doubt that to Confucius the "Book of Poetry" owes its immortality, for though a large portion of its contents may be described as genuine poetry, its intrinsic merits are not such as alone to account for its preservation. It was the unbounded admiration expressed for it by Confucius, and the enthusiasm with which he inspired his disciples for it, that ensured its revival after the burning of the books by the tyrant of Tsin, and secured it the high place it at present holds in the literature of China. The man who had not studied its pages was, in the opinion of the sage, "like one who stands with his face right against a wall."

* The Shu King; or, the Book of Poetry. With a Translation, Critical and Exegetical Notes, Prolegomena, and Copious Indexes. By James Legge, D.D., LL.D. London: Trübner & Co. 1871.

The majority of the Odes consist of lines of four characters, forming from the nature of the language four syllables. This was the almost invariable ancient metre, and is considered a test of the genuine antiquity of Chinese poetry. In the "Book of Poetry" it is occasionally departed from, and we have instances of pieces of lines of two, three, five, six, seven, and eight characters; but these are rare exceptions, and have gained admission into the compilation from intrinsic evidences of their undoubted age. This and other peculiarities in the text have received ample attention from Chinese scholars of every age. Dr. Legge gives us a list of upwards of fifty works which he has consulted in making his translation. No point, however small, has escaped the notice of the critics, and especially to the explanation of the rhythm of the Odes they have devoted immense labour. It is plain from the construction of the lines that they are all intended to rhyme. Some do, even as read at the present day, as for instance:—

Cho po foo teen
Suy tsau shih tsen
Wo tsau ki chin
Shih wo nang jin, &c.

But, on the other hand, many do not, and the commentators have been driven to make certain very wild conjectures to account for the inconsistency. They are all agreed that the sounds of many of the characters had not the same value then as now, but the apparently extreme irregularity of the rhyming terminations has rendered it impossible for them to lay down any definite law on the subject, and the now generally accepted opinion among native scholars is that they are susceptible of no rule, but that, by virtue of poetical license, they should be taken at the value affixed to them by the composers—a value which was perfectly understood by the educated at the time at which they were written.

Such is briefly the nature of the "Book of Poetry." It is one of the nine Chinese classics, and the translation before us forms the fourth instalment of the series upon which Dr. Legge has been so long engaged. The industry and erudition displayed in the preparation of the prolegomena are worthy of all imitation, and to students of the classics the information therein collected will be of inestimable value. Dr. Legge's well-known character as a sinologue makes it almost unnecessary to speak of the accuracy of his translation were it not that his version is open to the objection of being too literal. The wide gulf which separates the two languages renders it necessary, when translating from Chinese into English, slightly to attune the style of the original to English forms of speech. This may be done without any departure from strict accuracy, and it makes the difference between a readable and an unreadable translation. Dr. Legge tells us that his aim "has been to give a version of the text which should represent the meaning of the original, without addition or paraphrase, as nearly as he could attain to it"; and the reason he gives for not having attempted a metrical version is that, as a whole, the collection is not worth the trouble of versifying. This is certainly the case; but, even had it not been so, we think he would have exercised a wise discretion in avoiding the difficulties of a poetical translation. A work such as this appeals only to the small section of the public who are interested in Oriental literature, and to them its chief value consists in the accuracy with which the native ideas are rendered into English. A very slight acquaintance with metrical translations of Eastern poems is enough to prove how little of the original spirit is left, as a rule, in the tortured rhymes which profess to reproduce it, and of this Dr. Legge gives us an example. Bunsen, in his "God in History," has given several passages from the "Book of Poetry," translated in verse from a German poetical version of Lacharme's translation of the original; and of these Dr. Legge says, "If the odes from which they were taken were not pointed out in the foot-notes, it would be difficult, even for one so familiar with the Chinese text as myself, to tell what the originals of them were."

To quote from Dr. Legge's translation would give a totally inadequate idea of the real aim and value of the Odes. They are almost entirely allusive, and have reference to the events and manners of the time in which they were written. The result is that, without a careful study of the foot-notes, they are for the most part unintelligible. With this help, however, they become highly interesting records of the condition of China in the time when Nebuchadnezzar sat on the throne of Babylon. But to students of Chinese the translation before us, accompanied as it is with the text, has the additional value of giving a clear insight into the construction of the style in which the classical literature of China is written. To all who desire to gain acquaintance with the language this knowledge is essential, and we know of no better text-book for the purpose than Dr. Legge's translation.

We cannot close this notice without making reference to the entire series of which the present work forms a part. In the immense literature of China nine works hold a lofty pre-eminence. One claims Confucius as its sole author, others bear traces of his hand, and all embody his doctrines and reflect his teachings. Their influence, even at the present day, is unbounded. A complete comprehension of them forms the sum total of the highest education in China. By a knowledge of them men rise to the highest rank in the State, and no official post, however mean, is open to him who has not studied their pages. They supply the keynote to the conduct of the government of the country, and form the criterion by which every action, whether public or private, is finally judged. To all thoughtful minds, works which have exercised so supreme a control over the intellects of the millions of China for three-and-twenty centuries cannot but be of very great interest. Of some of them translations of more or less value have from time to time appeared, but at the present day no uniform translations of the nine exist. On the completion of such a series Dr. Legge is now engaged. Already six instalments of the work have appeared, and the admirable manner in which they have been handled forms the very best guarantee of the successful reproduction of the remaining three. Dr. Legge is without doubt the greatest of English sinologues, and he has chosen for his labours the work which by virtue of that position rightfully belongs to him.

A GOOD MATCH.*

THERE is a certain questionable tendency in the plot of this story against which we think it only right to warn all mothers who have marriageable daughters. The heroine, who, in her own words, "was well born, very handsome, but very poor," very properly states when she first introduces herself to the reader's notice that she "was to make a good match." We must admit too that she does what she says she was bound to do, for she makes a very good match. She is the poor niece of a poor baronet, and she marries a wealthy lord, who, unlike the ordinary wealthy nobleman of the novel, adds to his peerage and the family estates virtues enough for half a dozen commoners. This story then would seem to be just the very book that a judicious parent should hasten to put into her daughter's hands, in the hope that her child too might tread the same narrow path of virtue, and find the strait gate which opens into some nobleman's estate. Unhappily, admirable as is the end reached by this young lady, the heroine, not equally admirable is the course which leads her to this end. A story is told how one of the richest silver mines in South America was discovered by a man in his passion throwing a stone at an ass. As the stone left his hand he was astonished at its weight, and, going after it to pick it up, found it was nearly pure silver. From that time, we believe, asses in South America have been most diligently pelted, but while their sides have been sadly bruised, no silver mine, as far as we can learn, has ever been discovered by that method. In like manner we fear that the only result of such a novel as the one before us will be to lead to a good deal of love-making, and not a few improvident engagements, but whether a peer will be caught is another question. No doubt a young lady who takes shelter from the rain under an oak-tree where four roads meet, and there falls into conversation with a young stranger "who had a knapsack on his back, and a thick stick in his hand," may find that her total disregard of all propriety, so far from being punished, is rewarded with a noble husband. No doubt the same young lady, when later on she engages herself to the same young gentleman, though she learns that he is only a clerk in Messrs. Stillington, Stephenson, & Co.'s, Cheapside, at 100*l.* a year, may in course of years find that her husband is a nobleman, and that she can exchange her London lodgings for "the handsomest place in North Longshire." Nevertheless, if these are the lessons of life that are to be taught by our novelists, the least that a prudent mother can fear is that her daughter may catch a severe cold by waiting in the rain at a cross-road for the disguised nobleman to appear, while there is a considerable risk that she may catch, instead of a cold, some poor "commercial gentleman" for her husband. While the prudent mother is teaching her children that the path to matrimony is as plain as that to the parish church, while she is pointing out that a good match, like every other good thing, is the reward of well-applied efforts and constant attention to a variety of apparently trifling matters, these novelists step in, and with their romantic stories scatter to the winds the principles which it has taken years to inculcate. How much dissatisfaction with their lot is produced in the hearts of young women by these fantastical stories none can tell. Men indeed to some extent are led astray by gambling, and hope to achieve fortune by the lucky chance of an hour. But nevertheless most men are sensible enough to know that the only path to fortune on which they can count is sustained and well-directed effort; they do not go lounging by the river-side in the hope of having a chance of rescuing an heiress from drowning, nor do they take their stand by the side of a London crossing-sweeper, with a view to rescue some wealthy bachelor from the wheels of a brewer's dray or a railway van. But what girl can be contented with the quiet discharge of her daily duties at home, when she knows that, unless the house by good luck catches fire, she has not the smallest chance of meeting her hero? The frequency of fires, as we read, is attributed to the carelessness with which lucifer matches are left about. We should be inclined ourselves much more to find the explanation in the carelessness with which novels are left about. Who can blame a young lady well versed in this kind of literature, who knows that at any moment a hero may be passing in the street ready to risk his life to save hers, if she puts the light to the curtains of her bed, and appears shrieking at her window? Much more is this likely to be the case at the present moment, when, if rumour is correct, the firemen's corps is often reinforced by volunteers of the highest rank, who may themselves be in quest of heroines quite as much as of conflagrations.

* A Good Match. By Amelia Perrier, Author of "Moa Culpa." 2 vols. London: King & Co. 1872.

We must, however, leave this to the attention of the Insurance Companies, to whom it more properly belongs, and turn to a more direct consideration of the book before us. Lord Texworth, the hero's father, some twenty years before the story opens, had been "brought to utter ruin" by horse-racing. "His ancestral home came into the market," but, as much of the story turns on the terms on which it was sold, we will here quote the author's own words:—

It was sold, but under a peculiar reservation. Lord Texworth, when he found himself a penniless man, retired from the scene altogether, and put his affairs into the hands of his family solicitors, who sold the house and estate for a rather low figure, but retained the option of repurchase for a larger sum, by Lord Texworth or his heirs, from the new possessors or his heirs at any time within five-and-twenty years.

Happily the "utter ruin" of a novelist is consistent with the possession of "a few thousand pounds," with which Lord Texworth, under the name of Mr. Stillington, and with a Mr. Stephenson as his partner, began to trade in London. Horse-racing lords, if they are easily ruined, are not so easily forgotten; nor does it seem very likely that one of them could have traded in Cheapside and lived in Doughty Street without being recognized. We can quite sympathize with the heroine when she says, "I have many times since puzzled myself to think how Lord Texworth succeeded so well in keeping this secret." "Grief and remorse had done their work" most thoroughly if, after three or four years' absence on the Continent, a nobleman could live in London and pass for a tradesman. Gambling lords no doubt must make excellent traders, and long before the twenty-five years had gone by Mr. Stillington was ready to buy back "his ancestral home." He had always been fearful lest, if he re-established the family fortune, it might be once more brought down by another spendthrift. His only son, therefore, he had brought up in entire ignorance of his birth, in the belief even that he was an orphan left under Mr. Stillington's charge. He it was, the clerk at 1004 a year, who, when out for his summer holiday, was so fortunately surprised by the storm of ruin at the cross-roads, quite in the beginning of the first volume. The shower was happily so long as to allow of some sixteen pages of love-making at first sight. There are a great many more pages of love-making at second and at third sight. In fact, the book is almost entirely given up to love-making, or to its imitation. The heroine is persecuted by the attentions of a wealthy Liverpool tradesman, who, having "realized an enormous fortune by speculations in pickled pork," had changed his name from Duggins to Duchesne, and had bought Texworth Park. Sir John Cawdour, the uncle—as wicked as the uncle of an orphan usually is, but much more needy—favoured Mr. Duchesne's suit. He was eager for his only son Mountford to marry the wealthy pork-merchant's only daughter; while Mr. Duchesne would only agree to the marriage on condition that he himself at the same time married Sir John's niece. The pickled-pork trade in Liverpool must be a very thriving one if it allows those who have engaged in it to make such proposals as the following:—

Mountford was to get eighty thousand pounds new with his bride; and at Mr. Duchesne's death, an equal share with any children he might have by his second marriage, of the remainder of his money; exclusive of three thousand a year to be settled on me, and the Texton property, which he reserved for an eldest son.

The wicked uncle behaves so cruelly to his niece that to escape further persecution she plucks up her courage to run away. Happily for the reader, she has very little money with her, and so has to go to London in a second-class carriage. This gives our author an opportunity of describing very minutely the inside of a second-class carriage, and the strange race of people who are to be found in it. She carefully describes also the refreshment-room and the food that is there supplied. Miss Perrier's readers—who no doubt will be either as wealthy or as high in rank as her characters—will be glad of the glimpse into a strange world which is thus happily afforded them by the temporary poverty of a baronet's niece, and will allow that seventeen pages are not at all too much to describe a three or four hours' journey in a second-class railway carriage. The heroine finds refuge in Mr. Stillington's house, and very soon is married to the hero. It is not till Mr. Stillington's death that they discover the dignities to which they are entitled, and as Lord and Lady Texworth enter into possession of the "ancestral home." The wicked uncle of course dies. Mr. Duchesne marries "a rather passée beauty of noble birth, but most impoverished fortune," while his daughter marries a lord "who spent as much of her fortune as he could get at, and then treated her so cruelly that she had to return to her father." Mr. Duchesne is not much better off in his marriage than his daughter, as his wife does not prove faithful to him. Happily, in our author's words, "The Lord Chief Justice Wilde—God help the Lord Chief Justice Wilde!—heard it all, and set Mr. Duchesne free to marry again." Why Miss Perrier invokes the divine aid on this Lord Chief Justice of her own creation we are at a loss to guess. It would be as well, however, if our author, before she bestows her benedictions on any occupant of the Bench, were first to consult some law almanack, and ascertain who it exactly is that she wishes to bless. It would be as well, too, if before she writes another novel, she were to get rid of a certain amount of vulgarity, and of a certain fine style of writing which is often to be found in company with it. The description of the death of Mrs. Duchesne, short though it is, is offensive to all good taste, while the constant reference to her husband's "porky antecedents" is scarcely more agreeable. Miss Perrier, while criticizing the language of the tradesman's daughter, says that "she did not congregate the English language quite to the extent that her papa and mamma did." We would advise Miss Perrier, before she writes about the English language, to make quite sure that she understands the meaning of the long words she uses.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE seventh volume of M. Dareste's History of France* has just appeared; it contains the events of the reign of Louis XVI. and the French Revolution down to the end of the National Convention. We have already expressed our opinion of this work when the previous instalments were published; we shall now only say that after the one-sided productions of MM. Louis Blanc, Michelet, and Quinet, it is a relief to have to deal with a dispassionate and impartial narrative, which moreover exhibits considerable powers of style. We only regret that our author gives hardly any references to original sources, not a single note, not the smallest quotation. Without much increasing the bulk of his volumes, he might, we think, have enabled readers to verify his statements by the help of a few brief bibliographical indications.

M. Dollfus attempts to take a general survey of ancient history, and to explain the law which, according to him, is at the foundation of the progress of humanity.† For him the supernatural is a meaningless word, and there is no such thing as a miracle. God, he tells us, is merely the embodiment of the notion of law and of order, and law has no need of a miracle to manifest itself; history alone is sufficient to establish the necessity and the reality of law. Besides, the notion of the supernatural and that of history contradict one another; we must, he asserts, choose between them, or rather we must accept Christianity as it is revealed to us by the broad daylight of human conscience—that is to say, stripped of every idea of miracle, and reduced to the rank of a mere phenomenon in the succession of religions. M. Dollfus devotes a long introduction to an explanation of this theory, and after having shown how men's passions influence the course of events, he illustrates his scheme by a brief survey of the history of the old world, beginning with the Eastern nations, and taking us down as far as the dissolution of the Roman Empire. M. Dollfus seems to have carefully studied the latest authorities on Oriental history, but the conclusions which he draws from his researches are singular, to say the least; and when we see the idea which he forms of religion, our only wonder is that he should have thought it worth while to retain even the shadow to which he gives the name of Christianity. His book is a counterpart of M. Havet's volume which we lately reviewed, with a little less pretension to classical learning.

M. Charles Ritter has dedicated to the memory of M. Sainte-Beuve the French translations of twelve essays or lectures by Dr. Strauss‡, and M. Ernest Renan contributes a short preface to the collection. European civilization is much endangered, says the French critic, because France and Germany, instead of joining with England in opposing the progress of the common enemy, have assumed towards each other a hostile position which strengthens the cause of evil, and is a perpetual menace to the peace of the world. The common enemy here meant, like a three-headed serpent, derives its vigour from the divisions now reigning amongst the natural champions of order and intellectual prosperity; and whether we consider the rapid strides made by international socialism, or the underhand intrigues of Jesuitism, or, finally, the ever-growing power of Russia, we have every reason to be alarmed. M. Renan goes on to say that France was wrong in attempting to stop the legitimate growth of Germany; but he finds fault also with Prussia for not having shown herself generous. At any rate, he adds, science should be kept carefully beyond the sphere of all these quarrels, for science has no country. The essays translated by M. Ritter form three distinct groups; the first contains pieces referring to theological controversy and to religious history, in the second are fragments of a biographical character, the third comprises sketches on subjects of art and taste.

* Histoire de France, depuis ses origines jusqu'à nos jours. Par M. C. Dareste. Vol. 7. Paris: Plon.

† Considérations sur l'Histoire. Le Monde antique. Par Charles Dollfus. Paris: Germer-Baillière.

‡ Essais d'Histoire religieuse, etc. Par le docteur D. F. Strauss, traduits par M. Charles Ritter. Paris: Lévy.

Many years ago, in one of his most delightful portraits littéraires, M. Sainte-Beuve gave a touching sketch of Ampère, the great philosopher* whose name will always be associated with the science of electro-magnetism. Physical problems, however, were far from occupying the whole or even the chief part of that essay, and many interesting details were introduced showing Ampère as he was in private life, and placing before us the history of his heart and of his affections. M. Sainte-Beuve had the opportunity of consulting several family documents whilst preparing his biographical notice, and now, after an interval of more than thirty years, the whole of those documents are published by a relative who is anxious to preserve on record a memorial of the virtues of a man who was as truly good as he was distinguished in the scientific world. The success obtained by the Récit d'une Sœur, and by the delightful memoirs of the De Guérin family, have no doubt had much to do in determining the publication of this volume; but in any case M. Ampère's correspondence well deserved to be given to the world. The dramatis personæ introduced, and the quiet history of the savant's courtship, of his struggles, and of his premature bereavement, are extremely touching. The volume is inscribed to a daughter, we suppose, of the great philosopher's son, M. J. J. Ampère, who, without having the genius of his father, was a most remarkable man for the variety and extensiveness of his knowledge. We hope to take an early opportunity of speaking more at length of this most interesting publication.

Admiral Jurien de la Gravière† is sufficiently known by the various volumes he has already published on questions connected with the service to which he belongs. The book now before us, treating as it does of the progress accomplished during the last few years in the various branches of the navy, cannot fail to be interesting. The author begins by remarking that, as the seventeenth century witnessed the birth of the French maritime power, so it was reserved for the nineteenth century to see a thorough revival of the whole service. Two hundred years ago England and Holland combined were deemed amply sufficient to ruin the French navy; and in our own time Russia thought that the British and the French fleets together would be unable to resist the power of the Russian squadron. It is rather curious to notice under what impulse the Emperor Nicholas was acting when he challenged the united forces of England and France. He had all the antiquated prejudices against steam navigation, and when he found out his mistake it was too late to repair it. M. Jurien de la Gravière describes in his book the various episodes of the Crimean campaign, so far as the navy was concerned; he then makes a few remarks on the position of Venice during the Italian war, and concludes by some general observations on the means of increasing the efficiency of the service.

Amongst the distinguished Frenchmen who died during the Prussian war we must name M. Henri Regnault, the painter.‡ It must be unnecessary here either to enumerate his merits or to give the list of his pictures, for most of our readers have been able to appreciate them both; but it was natural that his countrymen should endeavour to perpetuate his memory, and to show what a gap his death has made in French art. The small volume of M. Henri Cazalis contains a biographical sketch of Regnault, illustrated by numerous extracts from his correspondence. A catalogue of the artist's productions appears as a supplement, and a portrait is added by way of frontispiece.

Dr. Bernard has published a new edition of his important work on general physiology.§ Written in the first instance at the request of M. Duruy, Minister of Public Instruction, it appeared five years ago as part of the series of Reports issued by the Imperial Government. No material alterations have been introduced by the author in this reprint, and it stands now as one of the best modern contributions to natural philosophy. According to Dr. Bernard, physiology is distinctly an experimental science; that is to say, it takes as its basis and starting point the results of observation, and thus succeeds in conquering nature. The progress of physiology, our author remarks, is a fact which cannot be questioned for an instant; but still a number of barren disputes stand in the way, and it is necessary that physiologists should first see how far their opinions are borne out by facts, and secondly determine what amount of truth there is in the views held by the "vitalists," the "animists," and other sects whose doctrines are of a somewhat exclusive character.

Several modern French writers have bestowed considerable attention upon the history of the eighteenth century, and have studied it from various points of view. We do not allude to M. Villmain, whose lectures at the Sorbonne created, when first delivered, quite as great a sensation as those of M. Cousin or M. Guizot. But during the last few years a number of well-known authors have devoted their studies to the epoch which immediately preceded the French Revolution; and the remarkable works of MM. Jules Barni, Arsène Houssaye, and Gustave Desnoiresterres may be mentioned amongst the foremost. Whilst, however, the translator of Kant deals principally with the philosophical side of the question, and whilst the chronicle of the forty-first fastival of the Académie française introduces his readers to boudoir-life and to the ladies who sat for Fragonard, Watteau, and Boucher, M. Desnoiresterres holds a middle position between them. He is extremely fond of anecdotes, as his four volumes on Voltaire sufficiently prove; but he selects them with care, and works them into a much better narrative, so far as style goes, than the affected, over-brilliant pages of M. Arsène Houssaye. On the other hand, he does not neglect to generalize from the facts which he collects so assiduously, nor is he satisfied with the merely gossiping side of history. The volume he now gives us on Glück and Piccini treats of one of the most singular controversies of the eighteenth century; and it shows to what an extent that feverish longing for excitement had grown which manifested itself à propos of a debate on the merits of two musicians, before it found its full development in the stormy scenes of the Legislative Assembly and the Convention. The late revival of Orfeo and of Alceste at the French Opera has naturally directed public attention once more to the genius of Glück, and has suggested inquiries a copious answer to which will be found in the entertaining volume of M. Desnoiresterres.

Music leads us to the fine arts generally, and particularly to the second and very much improved edition of M. Charles Lévêque's Science du Beau.¶ We noticed the work when it first came out, and we have now to speak of the alterations introduced by the author. The part relating to the theory of the ideal, although remaining substantially the same as it was originally, has been revised, and put in a more popular form. The psychology of laughter also deserves mention, because this part of the book is to a great extent new. The question itself had hitherto been only very imperfectly examined, and few philosophers had thought it worth investigation. The remarks offered by M. Lévêque in his first edition were of so suggestive a character that they at once excited considerable notice, and were criticized with much spirit by MM. Dumont and Francisque Bouillier. To their objections M. Lévêque made a reply which was published eleven years ago in the Revue des Deux Mondes. It is now reprinted as a part of the chapter to which it belongs, and will no doubt be read with much curiosity. The second division of the work, treating of the relations between God and nature, presents likewise considerable additions. M. Lévêque had previously assumed the existence of the Deity as sufficiently demonstrated, and had argued from it as from a universally acknowledged truth. But the recent development of sceptical tendencies of the most extreme character has convinced our author that a fresh statement of sound views on theodicy would not be out of place; he has therefore added to his work a long essay originally read before the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques, and subsequently published under the title La Science de l'Invisible in M. Germer-Baillière's Bibliothèque de Philosophie contemporaine. Finally, in his chapters on painting and on music M. Lévêque has availed himself of the recent works of Professor Helmholtz.

M. Picot's Histoire des États-généraux‡ was composed as an answer to the programme set by the French Institute in the year 1866, and the four bulky volumes of which it consists give us the most satisfactory and exhaustive discussion of the subject we have as yet seen. The history of the States-General has a special interest at the present time, when the question is once more raised about the best form of government for France, and it is well worth while to study it from the political as well as from the historical point of view. The problem suggested by the terms of the programme is this:—Has the French nation ever seriously attempted to govern itself, and to what cause should we ascribe the fact that its efforts to obtain a free government were so slow? The various meetings of the States-General held from time to time certainly show on the part of the nation a desire for constitutional freedom; and though the results of those meetings were outwardly abortive, are we to conclude that the failure was complete, and that no good was really accomplished? M. Picot observes that the system of the States-General has been attacked by two distinct classes of adversaries, equally anxious to force history into the mould of their theories, though in opposite directions. Some persist in saying that previously to 1789 France had no real political existence, and they absolutely refuse to take into account the institutions of the country during the ante-

* Journal et Correspondance de André-Marie Ampère. Publiée par Madame H. C. Paris: Hetzel.

† La Marine d'aujourd'hui. Par le vice-amiral Jurien de la Gravière. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

‡ Henri Regnault, sa vie et son œuvre. Par H. Cazalis. Paris: Lemerre.
§ De la Physiologie générale. Par Claude Bernard. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

¶ Glück et Piccini. Par Gustave Desnoiresterres. Paris: Didier.

† La Science du Beau. Par Charles Lévêque. Deuxième édition. Paris: Durand.

‡ Histoire des États-généraux considérés au point de vue de leur influence sur le gouvernement de la France. Par G. Picot. Paris and London: L. Hachette & Co.

revolutionary epoch. Others, on the contrary, date the ruin of France from that epoch, and from the depths into which they fancy themselves to be sunk they look back with regret to a past fraught with blessings which our own age is never destined to enjoy. The history of the French States-General, M. Picot contends, is a complete refutation of both these extreme views, and it would not be difficult to show that the Revolution of 1789 was simply the last expression of grievances which had been stated over and over again for centuries. The great cause for regret is that these assemblies should never have occupied a recognized place in the institutions of the country. They existed for the purpose of giving utterance to the wishes and complaints of the people, but their power went no further; and the idea of representative government is still so alien to the political habits of the French nation that since the storming of the Bastille on the 14th of July, 1789, there have only been thirty-seven years during which our neighbours admitted such a form of government as the one which presents the best guarantees for security and order. M. Picot not only gives an account of the various meetings of the States-General since 1355, but he examines all the cahiers of grievances, describes the reforms introduced in the different branches of the administration, and finishes by taking a general survey of the results accomplished by all the political assemblies which were held in France before the reign of Louis XVI. A series of tabular résumés and a very copious index complete the work.

M. Maxime du Camp's third volume on Paris* introduces us to the gloomiest part of his subject; the police, the prisons, the criminal population, and the guillotine form the topics of his latest researches, and the facts thus brought under our notice, together with the reflections they suggest, read like a bitter commentary on the terrible events of last year. Our author begins by stating that half the population of Paris are thieves, for he comprises in that category not only cut-throats and pickpockets, but ladies who smuggle lace under their crinolines, and functionaries who appropriate to their personal use the pens and paper which they ought to spend exclusively in the service of the administration or office in which they hold a situation. The details given by M. Maxime du Camp, the episodes of criminal life which occur so plentifully throughout his volume, are of the most painful interest; they reveal a form of society so startling that to timid people it must be a comfort to remember the energetic surveillance exercised continually by the police. Whilst describing the present state of things, he carefully compares it with what existed in days gone by; thus he gives us curious particulars on the old Parliament of Paris, the Châtelet, the Tournelle, lettres de cachet, &c. His chapter on fallen women paints in its true colours the denizens of the demi-monde, and shows what are the creatures for whose sake young men of good family and social position consent to ruin themselves and to bear the disreputable appellation of politiciens. A series of important pièces justificatives terminates the book.

M. Ruchet has written a book† for the purpose of defending revealed religion against the attacks of science. Passing in review the various branches of human knowledge, he endeavours to prove that the conclusions arrived at by philosophers are far from having the character of certainty which is so generally claimed on their behalf, and consequently that, taking the most favourable view of science, it has nothing to oppose to Christianity. But this is only a negative apology for our religion, and M. Ruchet further contends that Christianity has the advantage of presenting solutions of difficulties which science can never succeed in clearing up.

The series of volumes on universal history published by Messrs. Hachette has recently been enriched by an excellent contribution of Dr. Hoefler‡ on the progress of physics and chemistry. The author examines successively all the properties of matter, and notices the ideas entertained of them at several epochs by the most distinguished philosophers. The instruments and other means employed to study the applications of natural law are carefully described, and, as Dr. Hoefler comes down to our own times, we can see how far we are indebted to our predecessors for the present state of science. The second division of the volume is devoted to an account of chemistry; here the field is perhaps still more interesting, for we have to deal with alchemy, the transmutation of metals, the philosopher's stone, and all the vain fancies from which was evolved by slow degrees the wonderful science identified with the names of Lavoisier, Thénard, Davy, Faraday, &c. The book is a valuable résumé of the history of scientific investigation.

Count de Gabriac's impressions de voyage§ take us over a great deal of ground, for China, Japan, San Francisco, and New York are the principal stations in his journey. He writes, as he professes to do, in the spirit of a humourist, but he does not yield to the temptation of giving us either questionable jokes or prejudiced views of the countries which he visits, and there is much information to be gathered from his amusing pages. Eight engravings illustrate the work, and the author has added likewise the music of several Oriental melodies.

* Paris, ses organes, ses fonctions et sa vie. Par Max. du Camp. Vol. 3. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

† La Science et le Christianisme; étude. Par L. Ruchet. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

‡ Histoire de la Physique et de la Chimie. Par F. Hoefler. Paris and London: Hachette & Co.

§ Courte américaine autour du monde. Par le comte de Gabriac. Paris: Lefevre.

Two more volumes on the Commune are now before us. The one for which we are indebted to the labours of MM. Bourloton and Robert* describes chiefly the ideas which form the programme of the new revolutionists, and traces them back to their antecedents in the middle ages. The other, by M. Maillard, is a list, unfortunately too incomplete, of the affiches†, or bills, posted on the walls of Paris during the reign of MM. Raoul Rigault, Assi, and Felix Pyat. The professions of faith, circulars, and proclamations of every kind collected in this duodecimo are most interesting, but M. Maillard has not given us half the materials which exist on the subject; and his new volume, like the one he published some months ago on the revolutionary press, requires to be thoroughly revised.

* La Commune, et ses idées à travers l'histoire. Par E. Bourloton et E. Robert. Paris: Baillière.

† Affiches, etc., pendant la Commune. Par F. Maillard. Paris: Dentu.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 871, JULY 6, 1872:

France. The Geneva Arbitration. Mr. Miall's Motion. The Ballot Bill in the Communa. The Mines Regulation Bill. Señor Castelar on Republicanism. General Cluseret and the Fenians.

The Study of History at Cambridge. A Romantic Sport. Leodum. Livingstone Interviewed. Count Montalembert on the Jesuits. Dilke's Domestic Book. Perils of Life Assurance. Combative Sobriety. The Hertford Collection at Bethnal Green. Sculpture in the Academy.

Immanuel Kant. Long's Decline of the Roman Republic. Three to One. Reeve's Royal and Republican France. Peaks in Pen and Pencil. Ward's Experiences of a Diplomatist. A Chinese Classic. A Good Match. French Literature.

CONTENTS OF No. 870, JUNE 29, 1872:

The Last of the Indirect Claims—Mr. Disraeli at the Crystal Palace—French Finance—The Mines Regulation Bill—Spain—Parties in the Versailles Assembly—Law Officers—Bethnal Green. Originalism and Plagiarism—Parish Constables—London as Summer Quarters—Variety in Religion—Who Pays for it?—The Pope's Last Manifesto—Lady Lecturers—The Fyl Islands—Habitual Drunkards—The Italian Opera. Reeve's Royal and Republican France—Orison—The Golden Lion of Granpere—The Second Period of the Franco-Prussian War—Children in Art—Conington's Miscellaneous Writings—Dr. Gladstone on Faraday—The Japanese in America—Dean Stanley on the Church of Scotland—Mary Hojila.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—GRAND ARCHERY MEETING. Under Distinguished Patronage.—THE FOURTEENTH ANNUAL MEETING will take place on the Cricket Ground in the Park of the Crystal Palace on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday next, when Prizes amounting to upwards of £100 will be awarded. Special Subscription Competition, open to the Societies of all England and to Amateurs. The Shooting will commence each day at 11 A.M. Ladies' Competition 1.15 P.M., excepting on Saturday (at 11). Entries should be made immediately; after July 9 the Target Ballances of 5s. will be double. A Military Band will attend on the ground. Tickets to the Inner Circle and Lawn Promenade, 2s. 6d. Admission to the Palace, 1s. (excepting Saturday). Guinea Season Tickets Free.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—EXHIBITION OF SPECIMENS OF GAME AND OF THE APPARATUS OF SPORT. August 2nd to 10th, 1872. This Exhibition, the first of its kind ever held, is designed to illustrate Natural History, in a most important respect, by bringing together, if possible, a Collection of all the Trophies at present in private hands, from the hunting-fields of all parts of the world. These Trophies, collected mostly by Noblemen and Gentlemen who, as true sportsmen, are pioneers of science, will, if exhibited together, whether they be prepared in life-like form or are in rough condition, constitute a display, not only valuable to Science, but most attractive and instructive to the Public.

This portion of the Exhibition, then, will embrace Natural History Specimens or Trophies of Animals, whether complete animals or skins, horns, skulls, &c., from all parts of the world. In a second division will be displayed the Apparatus of Sport, as guns, ammunition, fishing tackle, outfits for sportmen proceeding to foreign fields, traps, nets, decoys, shafts, and expedients for locomotion; apparatus of Aborigines, &c. The third division will consist of a Show of Game Birds, especially those indigenous or acclimatized in Europe. The object is to present as complete series as can be obtained of the Phasianide, the Tetradactylide, &c., whenever possible by living examples; when these are not forthcoming, by dead or prepared specimens.

A permanent Loan Exhibition of Objects of Natural History, or Trophies, and of the Apparatus of Sport, is to be formed in a suitable part of the Crystal Palace, and the owners or possessors of such objects shown on the present occasion are solicited to allow them afterwards to form part of the permanent collection.

Space will be also allotted, and special arrangements will be made in the New Gallery, for Trade Exhibitors. A Committee of Noblemen and Gentlemen, distinguished for scientific attainments, will award the Prizes, which will consist of a Gold Medal of Honour, Certificates of Merit, and Division III. of Money Prizes. (See Schedule, Div. III., Game Birds.) All Communications to be addressed to Mr. F. W. Wilson, Natural History Department, Crystal Palace, from whom every information can be obtained. By order, G. GROVE, Secretary.

THE OFFICE OF SECRETARY AND TREASURER to the BANK OF BENGAL, CALCUTTA. Having become vacant, Applications to the appointment by Letter, addressed to "THE COMMITTEE OF SELECTION," will be received by Messrs. CURTIS & CO., the Bank's London Agents, up to the 1st August next.

The Salary of the appointment is Rupees 2000 a month, with a rent-free residence. Specimen to the amount of £2500 will be required.

All applications will be treated as confidential, and the Testimonials submitted will be carefully returned to the applicants.

Applications are also invited by office of AGENT to the BANK OF BENGAL at Barmah, British Barmah. The Salary of this appointment is Rupees 1000 a month, with a rent-free residence.

THE ATHANASIAN OREED.—THE GUARDIAN of Wednesday, July 10, will contain a full REPORT of the PROCEEDINGS of the MASTERS in CONVOCATION on this OREED. 5d., by post, 7d. A. S. BARNARD, 10, W.C.

THE
SATURDAY REVIEW

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 72, Vol. 34.

July 13, 1872.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE NEW FRENCH LOAN.

AS soon as the new Treaty with Germany had been adopted by the Assembly, the French Government sought the necessary powers for the issue of the new Loan. A summary of the circumstances under which these powers were asked for was submitted by M. THIERS, and thus an opportunity for making a sort of financial manifesto was obtained. A nation like France is above issuing a prospectus when it asks even for a sum exceeding a hundred millions sterling; and all the world is supposed to know without inquiry that it may safely lend any sum whatever to a great nation. But it is convenient that, in some shape or other, those who are invited to subscribe should have the principal facts connected with the loan brought before them; and it would be difficult to find a better way of fulfilling this object than the French method of accompanying the introduction of the law legalizing the issue of new stock by an elaborate and authoritative statement of the reasons which have prompted the Government to ask for permission to make a serious increase to the National Debt. That three milliards of francs must be had, that to get them in time it is necessary to begin getting them at once, that Frenchmen have in the liberation of their country a special motive for endeavouring to help the State to get them, and that a five per cent. stock is the best form of issue, were points on which M. THIERS was obliged to dwell, although every one could anticipate what he had to say about them. The really interesting thing is to know how much is asked for, and how far the present financial position of the country warrants the expectation that the loan when issued will maintain a steady or an advancing price. Political causes of perturbation stand on a different footing, and subscribers must form their own opinion of the probable future of France. But the financial position of a country exercises an influence over the price of stocks apart from the influence of purely political changes, and the world of capital when it is asked for a hundred and thirty or forty millions sterling, likes to know the financial position of the country asking for it. There is no doubt that the whole of the loan will be readily subscribed, and no subscriber need seriously fear that the day will ever come when he will fail to receive the stipulated interest. But if the loan is issued, as the last was, at eighty-two and a half per cent., and thus gives a clear six per cent. to the lender, the practical question which most persons will put to themselves will be whether the price is likely to go up or down. The last loan was at one time quoted at ten premium, and if there were good reason for supposing that the same thing would happen with the new loan, the investment would be a very attractive one. If France were really in a good financial position, her credit ought soon at least to rival that of the United States, or, in other words, the loan issued at eighty-two and a half ought to rise to par.

The law authorising the loan gives the Government power to issue enough five per cent. Rentes to produce one hundred and twenty millions sterling, and also enough to pay for the expenses of the issue and the other expenses connected with the transaction. M. THIERS estimates that the new loan will cost eight millions sterling to issue, and the other charges cannot be less than two millions more. Thus the loan is to be for enough Rentes to produce at least one hundred and thirty millions sterling. In order to show those who wish to subscribe to it may do so with a sense of perfect security, M. THIERS in his statement urges, first, that France has now given up the system of deficits in the annual budget, and has begun to raise in each year all that is required for the service of the year. In the next place, he says that France has resolved to apply out of annual taxation eight millions sterling a year to redeem the principal of her new debts created by the German war. Lastly, he points to a recent vote of the Assembly by which Government stock was specially exempted from a new tax levied on securities, and this may convince subscribers that they will not hereafter have their coupons taxed. There is one special head, however, on which he thinks it necessary to offer a few encouraging remarks. The new taxes have not, as is well known, produced as much as was anticipated, but the deficiency was, according to M. THIERS, solely due to the fact that sellers of the articles taxed bought largely in anticipation of the tax, and thus the market was for a time supplied without the revenue benefiting. This process is now at an end, and the taxes are producing what they were expected to yield. Such is the prospectus which M. THIERS offers to the world, and although it does not seem to us either accurate or complete, criticism on it cannot be pushed to the length of saying that the stock will not be worth the price of issue. It is obvious that if France was really raising enough already from taxes to pay the interest of the new loan, and also to pay off eight millions a year of the principal of her recent debts, the loan would be cheap at par. What keeps down the price at which it can be issued is not only the magnitude of the sum and the dread of political convulsions, but the persuasion that the present loan is not all that France will have to borrow, the knowledge that France has not yet a balanced budget, or anything approaching to it, and the disbelief in the continued application of eight millions a year to the redemption of the principal of the debt. At present France is bound to go on paying eight millions a year till it has redeemed its debt to the Bank of France, but it is under no engagement whatever to continue to raise this sum for the redemption of its general debt, and the notion that this payment shall go on after the Bank is paid off has never been submitted to or sanctioned by the Assembly or the country, and is in fact an invention of M. THIERS in order to make his prospectus look hapdsomer. It may be observed that, if reports are true, the consequence of the issue of this very loan is that the Bank of France is to receive power to increase its inconvertible issue of notes by sixteen millions sterling. This may conduce to floating the loan and to the removal of the danger of commercial pressure through its issue. But the one great object of the annual repayment of the eight millions to the Bank is to enable the Bank to return to specie payments, the cessation of which transferred to England almost the whole of the exchange business of France; and now the loan which subscribers to it are invited to hope will be paid off by a sinking-fund is discovered to necessitate the delay of a return to specie payments by creating a very large increase in the inconvertible issue.

The Assembly has spent many weary days and heard many weary debates in the anxious endeavour to carry out that part of M. THIERS's statement in which he leads subscribers to believe that enough new taxes will be voted to balance the Budget. The great subject of recent contention has been the proposal to tax business transactions, which its authors estimated to be likely to bring in seventy millions of francs, and which was their great means of replacing the taxation of raw materials so dear to M. THIERS. M. GASLONDE a week ago made an excellent speech against this tax, which is, according to the rules generally supposed to apply to taxation, a very bad one. It is impossible to know what transactions a trader goes through, and it is necessary to trust his declaration. The tax thus becomes an income-tax; but the transactions of small traders are proportionately more numerous and serious than those of great traders, so that it is a bad and unfair form of income-tax. M. CASIMIR PÉRIER was therefore quite logical when he said that it would be better to put a special income-tax on traders. But the Assembly rejected this on the ground, to which M. THIERS always recurs with delight, that it has rejected one income-tax on principle, and that all proposals for an income-tax are now beyond the region of discussion. M. GASLONDE argued that the proposal of the Committee had much better have its shape changed, and that if traders were, as traders, to pay more than they do now, the simplest and best way of getting at them would be to increase the sums they pay for their licences to trade. By increasing the licence-tax, and by a few other augmentations of direct taxes, principally touching the trading classes, he stated that the seventy millions might be obtained which the Committee hoped to get from their tax on business transactions. Possibly to his surprise, he found himself taken suddenly under the wing of M. THIERS, who warmly applauded all he said, and informed him that the Government accepted his suggestions. On Tuesday M. THIERS unfolded his views at great length to the Assembly in a most curious speech, in which, so to speak, he stung all round, and had even a sharp word for his old friends the ORLEANS Princes. Having repeated and enforced his assertion that new taxes producing two hundred millions of francs must be voted in order to balance the Budget, he explained the views of the Government under the altered circumstances in which it found itself placed. All the criticisms lavished to show the impossibility of getting what was extracted from taxes on raw materials were quietly and completely ignored. M. THIERS went back to his old figure of ninety-three millions, as if it were beyond dispute, and he betrayed not the least shadow of doubt that in the end the Assembly would let him have his way, and would vote the taxes on raw materials. The Assembly has already voted a tax on securities, which will, he reckoned, yield fifteen millions, and one on mortgages, which will, he reckoned, yield three millions. The Government is going to propose a tax on metals other than iron, which is calculated to yield nine millions. To the one hundred and twenty millions thus obtained are to be added the twenty millions to be gained by suppressing frauds in the manufacture of alcohol. Sixty millions have still to be provided for, and for these the Government announced itself ready to look to the taxes suggested by M. GASLONDE. It had proposed to make up the deficiency by an increase of the direct taxes on real property and by an increase of the duty on salt. These proposals were in the highest degree unpopular, as M. THIERS frankly owned, and as it is impossible to help guessing he meant them to be. Now his intentions were clearly revealed. The Assembly had been, as it imagined, discussing what were the taxes that would best replace the taxes on raw materials. The Committee had suggested with this object a tax on business transactions. M. GASLONDE had suggested with this object a tax on traders in what he thought a better shape. M. THIERS now accepted M. GASLONDE's proposal, not, however, as a means of doing away with the taxes on raw materials, but as a means of doing away with other taxes which formed part of the Government scheme and were found to be exceptionally unpopular. Having thus made the Assembly exercise its ingenuity in devising taxes to replace the taxes for which he did not care in the least, and not to replace those on which he had set his heart, he went on to argue in favour of M. GASLONDE's proposal, and to condemn the tax on business transactions as very vexatious, and likely to bring in much less than was expected, while the produce of an increase on licences would be sure to yield what was expected of it, and would be in harmony with the existing habits of the country. On a subsequent day the great trial of strength was made, and the Assembly, by a majority of fifty-one in a very full house, rejected the tax on business transactions. M. THIERS has so far had his way, and it is probable that no further serious opposition will be made to his taxes on raw materials. But if this is so, and if it is thus that the financial equilibrium is to be obtained on which in putting forth his new loan he so confidently insists, it is to be remembered that, apart from their disastrous indirect effects on French prosperity, those taxes, which he takes as producing nearly four millions sterling, will, in the opinion of those who have examined the question most carefully, scarcely produce a tenth part of that sum.

LORD GRANARD AND THE GOVERNMENT.

THAT all Lieutenants of counties in Ireland, or even in England, should be exempt from imprudence it would be unreasonable to expect; but one of the local representatives of the Irish Government exceeds the license ordinarily accorded to incapacity. Since Lord GRANARD thought fit some years ago to join the Roman Catholic Church he has illustrated the distinction which frequently exists between native believers and proselytes, by adopting the politics as well as the religion of the wilder section of the priesthood. Not long since he thought fit to express his approval of the Irish rebellion of 1798; and it was naturally inferred by unfriendly critics that he could not logically disapprove of a repetition of the enterprise by Fenian insurgents. The Government may perhaps have been justified in taking no official notice of a verbal outburst of political and religious fanaticism; but Lord GRANARD appears to have misunderstood the toleration which was extended to his factious extravagance. Although he must have been aware that the late agitation against Justice KEOGH has been conducted with scandalous violence, Lord GRANARD in a published letter assured a meeting assembled for the expression of indignation that he fully sympathized with its objects. In complaining of the alleged scurrility and injustice of the Judge's charge, Lord GRANARD perhaps unconsciously sought to establish the immunity of the Roman Catholic clergy from secular jurisdiction. It is not to be supposed that he had taken any trouble to examine the evidence for the purpose of ascertaining the truth of Justice KEOGH's accusations. In substance Lord GRANARD and the other assailants of Justice KEOGH maintain, not that the priests were innocent of intimidation, but that the conduct which is denounced in the judgment was permissible or laudable. There is something to be said for the doctrine that spiritual intimidation is not properly cognizable by legal tribunals; but Justice KEOGH's opposite opinion, that fraud and violence of all kinds are legally as well as morally criminal, is at least not obviously untenable. Even if the priests are not prohibited by law from abusing their religious character for political objects, they are certainly not entitled to organize riotous mobs which deter peaceful voters from going to the poll. Their apologists are precisely on a level with the sophists who vindicated the trade assassinations at Sheffield, except that the picketing and rattening of Galway generally stopped short of wilful murder. Judicial disapprobation of crime, expressed perhaps in unnecessarily vehement phrases, appears to those who have cultivated Lord GRANARD's state of mind an aggression on the privileges of the clergy. For the Roman Catholic gentry of Galway, who were almost universally opposed to the clerical firebrands and to their congenial nominee, a zealous convert has no feeling of sympathy. Justice KEOGH himself was a Roman Catholic while Lord GRANARD still wandered in the paths of heresy, but it is well known that the thoroughgoing bigot regards lukewarm or mutinous believers with an animosity deeper than his habitual hostility to the outside portion of mankind. But for his official position Lord GRANARD's participation in the scandalous attacks on Justice KEOGH would scarcely have attracted notice. When a man of rank swells the clamour of a noisy rabble, the injury to his own character outweighs the mischief which he perpetrates.

To the Government it is probably not inconvenient that the Lieutenant of an Irish county should be acceptable to the Roman Catholic clergy; but Lord SPENCER avoided any expression of opinion on Lord GRANARD's conduct. The official excuse that the merits of the case are not yet fully known was purely conventional, if not wholly irrelevant. Lord MIDLETON was fully justified in censuring Lord GRANARD's attack upon a Judge, even if it were ultimately proved that Justice KEOGH himself was deserving of blame. It is not fitting that the local representative of the QUEEN should countenance the scandalous outrages by which the disaffected portion of the populace have expressed their sympathy with the riotous priests who were denounced from the Bench. It seems that some men belonging to Lord GRANARD's militia regiment burned the effigy of the obnoxious Judge in front of the barracks, although Lord GRANARD asserts that he prevented those who were under his own immediate command from taking part in the discreditable transaction. When militiamen share the turbulence of the mob, a Lieutenant of a county who is also a militia officer commits a gross impropriety by joining in the general clamour. Lord GRANARD affected to extenuate his offence by an admission that his strong language had been premature, inasmuch as he had not at the time seen an authentic copy of the Galway judgment. For grave judicial misconduct the proper remedy is an address to the Crown from the two Houses of Parliament, and not an unauthorized appeal to popular passion. It was probably by an oversight that Lord SPENCER adopted or anticipated the defence suggested by his troublesome client.

If Lord GRANARD feels no objection to disgraceful insults directed against a Judge, he is at least incapable of approving the threats of assassination which have been freely used by the apologists of the Galway priests; yet if Justice KEOGH had been shot, every promoter of the agitation would have been morally responsible for the encouragement of crime. The most deliberate criticism of the judgment could by no possibility have furnished a justification for the excitement of passions which might have found vent in murder. In other countries a public invective against an unpopular Judge might perhaps be an offence rather against propriety than against morality; but in Ireland the flatterer of an angry mob always runs the risk of becoming an accomplice in acts of lawless violence. It was to be expected that the priests who lately assembled at the summons of Cardinal CULLEN to censure Justice KEOGH's exposure of the misconduct of their Galway colleagues should be wholly indifferent both to the truth of the Judge's statements and to the possible consequences of their own remonstrance. A layman ought to be more closely bound by conscientious scruples, even though he may still retain the unreasoning enthusiasm of his original conversion. It might have been expected that a nobleman and landowner would have a certain sympathy with the Roman Catholic gentry who are the principal victims of sacerdotal tyranny and intimidation; but sectarian zeal disturbs all the social feelings which ordinarily unite the members of a class. To persons of secular habits of thought, prostration before a set of noisy and intolerant priests would seem to involve almost inconceivable degradation; but religious fanatics have a law of their own.

The LORD-LIEUTENANT and the PRIME MINISTER would consult their own dignity and the interest of their Government by hinting to Lord GRANARD the propriety of perpetrating his future extravagances in a private station. Affectionate reminiscences of Vinegar Hill and public attacks on Judges will certainly not strengthen the party to which Lord GRANARD belongs. The burners of effigies and the authors of anonymous threats of assassination will not be reconciled to English rule by any display of deference to their wishes. The capricious and incidental alliance of English Liberals with Irish partisans of priestly supremacy has already indicated, by many symptoms, its approaching disruption. To the enemies of spiritual intimidation it is not a little provoking that Justice KEOGH should have missed the opportunity of conveying a just and forcible exposure of the electoral practices of Galway in more temperate and suitable language; but the substance of his judgment agrees with the opinions of the great majority of intelligent Liberals. Even if Mr. GLADSTONE had been disposed to respond to the indignant demands of some Irish members, he could not in common prudence have vindicated, in the presence of his own supporters, the tyranny of the Galway priests. It was perhaps not injudicious to postpone on various pretexts the discussion of a question which will excite much angry feeling. The Government is accustomed to adjourn for many weeks the consideration of much more important documents than the Galway judgment; and it will not be a cause for regret if the debates on the question are put off until the general excitement has subsided. In the meantime Parliament has received the strongest assurances that the fullest precautions have been taken for ensuring the Judge's safety; and it would seem that several persons have been prosecuted for participation in the various riots. In all similar cases it is necessary to allow a certain width of discretion to those who are charged with the preservation of the peace. One member of the House of Commons asked the plausible question whether it was not as wrong to burn the effigy of a living Judge as to perform the same operation on the historical or mythical LUNDY; but a temporary burst of violence is distinguishable from an annual ceremony which almost always ends in blows. If the authorities were to repress too ostentatiously the KEOGH riots in different parts of the country, the malcontent faction which elevated the Manchester murderers to the rank of martyrs is capable of condemning Justice KEOGH to the periodical fate of LUNDY and GUY FAWKES. The removal of Lord GRANARD from an office which is not compatible with a too impetuous temperament would perhaps not greatly move the feelings of the populace; and it might convey a useful warning to agitators of the upper classes. If the Ministers meditate any reproof of the impropriety which has been committed, they may assume that the case is perfectly ripe for decision. Whatever may be the ultimate verdict of Parliament and the country on the issue which has been raised between Justice KEOGH and the Galway priests, Lord GRANARD has appealed in the most objectionable form to a wrong tribunal. His former error in judgment was perhaps not inexorably condoned on the ground that unwelcome speeches often express more than hasty orators intend. A letter to the promoters of one among a series of meetings which had in many cases resulted in outrage was a more tangible and definite violation of official duty. Turbulent Irish priests can scarcely insist that their lay disciples should share the immunity which they claim for themselves.

GERMANY AND THE POPE.

MUCH ingenuity seems to have been shown by the German Catholics in explaining away the Pope's pious assurance to the German deputation that by and by there will fall from the mountain a little stone which shall break the heel of the Colossus. The interpretation which they have chosen to affix to it is certainly not one which commends itself to unbiased readers. The Pope hates Liberalism, and he no doubt believes that some extremely unpleasant fate is reserved for its professors. But there is nothing to show that he had Liberalism in his mind when he was speaking to the German Catholics. Prince BISMARCK is not specially Liberal either in sympathies or in policy, and though the Pope is not given to draw accurate distinctions between his opponents, he can hardly have confounded the German Empire with his old enemy the Revolution. There can be no reasonable doubt that by the Colossus the Pope meant the existing German Government. It does not follow, however, that Prince BISMARCK's official journal is right in concluding from this that the Pope "aims at smashing the feet of the Colossus." It is probable that he intended the image in NBUCHADNEZZAR's dream to express a convenient allegory, rather than to convey a serious threat. The Pope, if Dr. CURMING will allow us to say so, is probably well acquainted with Scripture, and the overthrow of evil powers so often foretold in the Old Testament and in the Apocalypse have in all ages served to give point and fervour to clerical denunciations. If the writer in the Provincial Correspondent had known his Bible equally well, he would have remembered that the stone which crushed the Colossus was cut out of the mountain without hands; and it is far more likely that the Pope meant to comfort the German Catholics by a general reference to the chances which the future may have in store for them than that he intended to encourage them to any definitely hostile action against the powers that be.

At the same time the imprudence of the Pope's language is very obvious. Down to the utterance of this apparent threat he had, in some respects, the best of the position. The German Government has suddenly appeared in the new and odious light of a religious persecutor. Its excuse for this is that the Pope has suddenly appeared in the new and odious light of a fomentor of political sedition. Prince BISMARCK may have good evidence for this latter assertion, but until now it was not evidence that could be easily brought home to the popular mind. He may see that an intimate connexion exists between Particularist and Ultramontane agitations in the Southern States, and that in proportion as the clergy keep or regain their hold over the peasantry, the process of consolidating the Empire will be delayed and hindered. But the connexion, however real it may be, is not apparent. The opposition to Prussia is rarely confined to the Catholic element in the population. It is as often as not shared by democratic agitators, to whom Catholicism is utterly hateful. A little management on the part of the priests would have enabled them to keep their connexion with the movement almost unperceived, and to represent the Empire as the natural foe of all distinctively national and patriotic aspirations. By this means it would have been made to appear that Prince BISMARCK was simply giving a false excuse for his ecclesiastical policy, that he nourished a Protestant hatred against the religious Orders, and was trying to conceal it under the disguise of secular necessities. In an Empire where the Catholic element is still large, and where the members of the rival Churches have been accustomed for a long time back to live at peace with one another, anything approaching to religious intolerance on the part of the Government is both inconvenient and distasteful. It imports all manner of unpleasantness into their domestic and social relations. It exhibits them to the world in the disagreeable light of men who are contradicting their own repeated declarations and failing to do as they would be done by. The Pope had only to play his cards carefully to reap the full advantage of this feeling. If he had abstained from using any kind of menace against Germany, or giving the Government any overt justification for its hostility to the Church, public opinion would have gone against any resort to violent measures, and Prince BISMARCK rarely defies public opinion when he has satisfied himself as to the direction in which the tide is really setting. Instead of this the POPE, by a single unlucky phrase, has given the Minister the exact opportunity he needed. German Protestants and German Catholics will be alike alienated by the discovery that the fears of the Government have a real foundation in fact. Even the latter, when they see the POPE scheming against Germany, and moving Heaven, if not earth, to undo the results of the war, will watch Prince BISMARCK's attack on him with composure, if not with active sympathy. Their interests and wishes are on the side of the Colossus, and they will not be inclined to quarrel with it for objecting to be crushed by the little stone. The POPE has allowed himself to be drawn on to fight Prince BISMARCK on the very ground which the German Chancellor would have chosen for the battle. He has enabled his adversary to declare it "wholly unnecessary to enter into argument upon the question at issue." Even a German Catholic will ordinarily acknowledge that "when the POPE wishes that the foundations of the German Empire may be subverted, it is a work of supererogation to discuss the matter any further."

The POPE's blunder need not be set down to any profound political calculations. He had good cause to be angry with the German Government, and he expressed himself with the hasty imprudence natural to angry men. Indeed, the very form which his anger took seems to show that he has nothing definite to look forward to. When you do not see that any immediate evil is likely to befall your enemy, it is some consolation to indulge in vague predictions of future misfortunes. If the POPE had seen any prospect of aid from France or Russia, he would probably have held his tongue about little stones. Unfortunately for himself, hasty mistakes often beget leisurely repentance, and even Pius IX. may live to wish that he had restrained his inclination to call the German Empire namos. The initial error of making an enemy of Germany is not so easily accounted for. There were many reasons why the POPE should have pursued a directly opposite policy. Prince BISMARCK had until lately been ostentatiously civil to him, and had shown an equally marked contempt for the Old Catholic opposition. Ultramontanism with its exaggerated deference to authority has a certain attraction for statesmen of an autocratic turn of mind, and in the case of Prussia there was really no cause whatever why the Government and the Church should not be perfectly good friends. In Bavaria, where the Sovereign is a Catholic, and where the antagonism between the infallibilist and fallibilist elements in the Church is public and irreconcilable, there are constant occasions of quarrel; but in Prussia, where the Sovereign is a Protestant, and the Catholic population is almost entirely Ultramontane, the bishops would have been left to take their own course, and to excommunicate whomsoever they would. In other instances the POPE has not shown himself blind to the advantages of having to deal with heretical Governments. His disposition towards England, in spite of her very pronounced Protestantism, has been uniformly friendly, and if he had to name the country in which the Church is most fairly treated, he would probably fix upon Ireland. There is no reason to doubt that, if the POPE had held himself as much aloof from the internal politics of Germany as he has done from those of Great Britain, his relations with the Government would have been equally harmonious, and the position of the Catholic Church would have been even more favourable. There is much less of theological antagonism to Catholicism in Germany than there is in this country, and much less of suspicion founded on past persecution on the one side and past conspiracies on the other. This promising future the POPE deliberately resolved to cast aside. Instead of allying itself with the new Empire, as it might easily have done, instead of remaining neutral in the contest between Imperial and Particularist tendencies, as it was plainly bound to do, the Roman Catholic Church has thrown itself hotly into the struggle, and has taken the side with which to all appearance it has least in common. The explanation of this inconsistency is, that the POPE has followed the example of his predecessors in the sixteenth century, and sacrificed the interests of his Church to the necessities of his throne. The German Government would have behaved with the utmost friendliness to his spiritual subjects, but it was not prepared to give him any countenance in regaining his temporal subjects. Italy had been kept neutral during the war by the promise of a corresponding neutrality on the Roman question, and the consolidation of the German Empire is seemingly a virtual assurance that the Papal sovereignty will not be allowed to avail itself of external aid, supposing such aid should ever be forthcoming.

It is this conviction that has led the POPE to declare himself the enemy of German unity. It is not enough that the Church should be free in Germany, unless it is at the same time supreme in Italy. Excessive finess has always been the characteristic weakness of Papal policy, and at this moment the diplomatists of the Roman Court are probably intent upon elaborate calculations as to what will happen when the German Empire has gone to pieces from internal disruption, and France is once more left free to wreak her vengeance upon the "Subalpine Government." The next POPE will perhaps have cause to wish that his predecessor had given a little more thought to the spiritual side of his office.

GOVERNOR EYRE.

THE Jamaica disturbances and the conduct of Governor EYRE have been discussed probably for the last time in the House of Commons. The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and the PRIME MINISTER wisely rested the proposal of the vote for the costs of his defence on the narrow but sufficient ground that their predecessors had pledged the Crown to make the payment. It is an excellent habit to dispense with any arguments beyond those which are necessary to support a practical conclusion. Under the direction of the Duke of BUCKINGHAM, then Colonial Secretary, Mr. EYRE had been informed that his request for the discharge of the costs would be considered; and afterwards the Solicitor of the Treasury was officially desired to ascertain the amount of the demand. There could be no doubt that a formal decision had been adopted, and that Mr. EYRE had ample ground for believing that he would receive reimbursement. It is in every way undesirable that the interests either of public servants or of persons who have established pecuniary claims against the Crown should be affected by political changes. The present Government rightly declined to re-open a question which had been settled at the proper time by competent authority; and, although the House of Commons was competent to reverse the judgment of the former and the present Governments, it is usual to rely in similar cases on the judgment of the Ministerial departments. Some uncertainty had been occasioned by Mr. GLADSTONE's postponement of the vote in the last Session, at the instigation of a portion of his own party. Mr. EYRE has been exposed to unnecessary anxiety in consequence of the delay; but on the whole he may think himself fortunate. It was fitting that the vote should be moved by the Government, and adopted by the House; but it was at the same time expedient that it should not pass without debate. Some members of the minority are probably well satisfied that their remonstrances have not prevailed.

Mr. EYRE has been severely punished by the premature termination of a career which had up to the date of the unfortunate transactions in Jamaica been creditable. The additional suffering which might have been caused by pecuniary embarrassment could perhaps not be justly inflicted; and as a general rule the Government ought either to censure its subordinates at the moment, or to protect them against private litigation for their public acts. Mr. EYRE's conduct received the approval of the Colonial Secretary of the day when the facts were imperfectly known; and the censure which resulted from the inquiries of the Commissioners was not without qualification. The Association which was formed for prosecuting him repelled public sympathy by a repetition of attacks when their first legal experiments had failed; and it is well known that volunteers who undertake the duty of public prosecutors are in England commonly regarded with disfavour. The attempts to obtain a committal for murder before a country bench of magistrates, and to commence proceedings on a different set of charges in the Queen's Bench, successively failed; and finally the members of the Association had the good sense to abandon their self-imposed task. The presumption of innocence is on the side of an accused person who has never been brought to trial; and on the whole the decision of the Grand Jury was in accordance with general opinion. It is possible that the prosecution might never have been commenced but for the singular indiscretion of Mr. EYRE's friends in celebrating his arrival in England with fulsome and unmerited praise; nor can he be acquitted of indiscretion in having accepted compliments which were ill applied to a Colonial Governor who had just before been dismissed from office by his superiors.

The debate was on the whole temperate and fair, although Mr. P. A. TAYLOR exhibited his usual vehemence, and notwithstanding the attempt of one or two injudicious friends to represent Mr. EYRE as a hero and public benefactor. Fortunately for his client, Sir C. ADDERLEY failed to persuade the House of Commons that the Government was not bound to adopt the decision of its predecessor. If a vote had been taken on the merits, it is more than doubtful whether the payment of the costs would not have been refused. Vague assertions that Mr. EYRE's vigour prevented general rebellion and massacre furnished no answer to the charge that he had instigated or permitted numerous acts of severity long after resistance had ceased, if indeed it could ever be said to have commenced. The trial and execution of his chief political opponent by a scandalously incompetent court-martial was Mr. EYRE's personal act. The capital punishments and the floggings which continued for three or four weeks after the perpetration of the first and last rebellious outrage were only rendered possible either by the connivance or by the incapacity of the Governor. Sir J. P. GRANT afterwards instituted legal proceedings, probably on sufficient grounds, against various persons who had been guilty of crime or conspiracy; but the victims of Mr. EYRE's underlings were for the most part not even tried by court-martial. It seems that the Governor was possessed by an unfounded fancy that martial law once proclaimed must remain in force for a month; but even if his theory had been conformable to law, it was not requisite to exercise the arbitrary power which is only justified by the necessity of defending the community from danger. The Jamaica Legislature, since happily extinguished with the Constitution from which it derived its title, passed a vote of immunity to the Governor. His culpability would undoubtedly have been greater if he had been seized with a panic of his own than when he merely shared the terror and anger which were universal among the white population. The opinion of the Commissioners, formed on local investigation, and the deductions of the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE from the depositions, must be considered to afford sufficient proof that the Jamaica outbreak was the result of a conspiracy, and that a formidable insurrection might have ensued if the original outbreak had remained unpunished. The case was therefore reduced to one of excessive severity, where some disregard of ordinary legal restraints had become necessary. Even the unjustifiable execution of GORDON was in one sense rendered less culpable by Mr. EYRE's belief that it was unjust to punish the dupes of a demagogue without dealing with the supposed instigator of their crimes. It is true that GORDON's agitation was but indirectly connected with the outbreak, and that he was never proved, nor even believed, to have promoted or to have approved the plan of insurrection. Between the two parties in the House of Commons' debate substantial justice was done; and it may be added that the speakers on both sides for the most part candidly admitted that there was some force in the arguments of their respective opponents. Mr. HARDY prudently declined to share the championship of the inculpatated Governor with Sir C. ADDERLEY; and Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, in explaining the reasons of his vote against the grant, recognized the goodness of Mr. EYRE's intentions. Only one or two extreme partisans committed the error of treating Mr. EYRE either as a gigantic criminal or as a public benefactor. The Ministers, as represented by Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. LOWE, were strictly neutral, although they vindicated the vote as a necessary consequence of administrative continuity.

Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY's temperate and judicial speech probably determined the vote of the House; and only Mr. P. A. TAYLOR was capable of regretting that the Recorder and his colleagues were not supported and corrected by the calm judgment of some negro coadjutor. It was in accordance with the Report of the Commission that Mr. EYRE was dismissed from office; and Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY's statement fully justified the recommendation in which he had concurred. On the other hand, the Commissioners satisfied themselves that the danger to public order had not been imaginary; and they seem to have held that the earlier measures adopted by the Governor were justifiable, though they may have been irregular. As Chief Justice COCKBURN afterwards explained, martial law, except in the limited sense in which it is sanctioned by the Mutiny Acts, is unknown to English jurisprudence. A Governor of a colony, like any other guardian of the peace, is bound to repel force by force, and to take measures against anticipated breakers of the law; but there is nothing in England or in English colonies corresponding to a state of siege. The right of hanging or of flogging rebels is analogous to the right of shooting a burglar who is in the act of robbing a house. As soon as the immediate danger is over the worst criminal is entitled to the safeguards of the regular process of law. The Commissioners approved of the temporary suspension of law; but they were convinced that the term of anarchy or of despotism had been unreasonably prolonged, and that in the meantime the powers assumed by the local Government had been extravagantly abused by some of its officers.

In the Jamaica disturbances, and in the more recent case of the Kooka executions, there has been a salutary reaction against the old-fashioned doctrine that the rebellion of subject races ought to be punished with extravagant severity. The promiscuous application of capital, or even of corporal, punishment is a proof not of vigour, but of liability to panic. When an insurrection has been prevented or suppressed, it is inexpedient to display extraordinary excitement. Natives of Eastern and Western dependencies are fully capable of appreciating the calmness which indicates conscious power and security. The more or less disloyal men of colour who fled from the troops and police in Jamaica may probably have imagined that there must somewhere be an enemy against whom active military operations were directed. If the disaffected faction had been a little bolder, it would have been encouraged by a display of force which was entirely disproportionate to any visible opposition. There is reason to hope that during the administration of the present Governor many ancient causes of dissension have been removed or forgotten. In Jamaica alone among English colonies the tide of constitutional government has turned, and it has been discovered that two alien races cannot be safely or justly governed through the medium of a common representation. The negroes resented the supremacy of an Assembly in which the influence of the white inhabitants was predominant; and, on the other hand, the superior race naturally dreaded the consequences which might have followed the extension of the suffrage. Under the reign of common sense and justice the prosperity of Jamaica is at last reviving, and the colony is, according to the proverb, happy which contributes nothing to history.

THE BALLOT BILL.

THE majority of the House of Lords was wiser than its leaders, and refused to provoke a crisis on the untenable ground of the optional Ballot Bill. Whether the Duke of RICHMOND foresaw the result, or whether he really wished to take his stand on the success of his extraordinary scheme, he must be very well pleased at the result, for he has at once avoided a collision and seemed willing to undergo risk in order to defend his opinions. Neither he nor any of his friends had anything to urge in behalf of a proposal which, outside a small Conservative circle, had no supporters. He had nothing better to say for it than that Mr. FORSTER two years ago preferred an optional to a compulsory ballot for the election of School Boards. There is scarcely any similarity between the two cases, and if there were, it would not be wise to repeat a mistake simply because that mistake had been committed two years ago. But the Duke of RICHMOND naturally omitted to refer in any way to the explanation which Mr. FORSTER offered a few days ago of his conduct in 1870. Mr. FORSTER said that the Government did not wish in dealing with School Boards to prejudge the question of the Ballot as applied to Parliamentary elections. To have insisted on a real ballot for the School Boards would have been to fight the whole battle of the Ballot at that time, and so to make the passing of the Education Bill impossible. The optional Ballot is totally different from the real Ballot. It is merely a means of facilitating the voting of a certain number of the electors, and cannot in any way check intimidation or bribery. The whole purpose of the Parliamentary Ballot Bill is to check intimidation and bribery, and it is not meant to provide merely a comfortable machinery for voting. Unless there is probable ground for supposing that it will check intimidation and bribery, there is no good in it at all, and the Lords ought to have rejected it on the second reading. To permit the second reading and then to substitute a scheme which would have left intimidation and bribery exactly where they were, was a thoroughly unstatesmanlike step, and the Conservatives are very much to be congratulated on a result which will allow their discreditable blunder to be very soon forgotten. Lord PENZANCE even showed with much ingenuity how the optional Ballot might be made actually to increase bribery. A man who is inclined to sell himself may still have some shame left, and may not care to incur among his friends and neighbours the odium of having undergone a sudden and suspicious change of opinion. This restraint operates under the present system of open voting, and under the compulsory Ballot the agents will not know how the man votes, and therefore, according to the expectations of believers in the Ballot, will not buy him. But under the optional Ballot the voter was to be at liberty, not only to vote as he does now, but to vote by Ballot, showing his voting-paper to the agent. The elector who had taken a bribe might therefore proclaim to all his circle that he was as staunch as ever to his party, then vote the other way, show his vote to the agent only, and so make sure of his money, while he continued to enjoy the reputation of having behaved honourably. Such was the system by which the Conservative leaders affected to be willing to abide, and rather than give up which they were, or seemed to be, ready to make the Government resign or dissolve Parliament.

The Peers were, however, justified in resenting the imputation made on them in the Commons, that they had got through their amendments too quickly, had not debated the Bill enough, and showed by this quick despatch of the subject that they might have easily passed the Bill last year. Nothing could do the Peers more harm than that they should have long, vehement, and apparently earnest debates, when they know, and all the world knows that they know, that the talk is all hollow, and uttered for effect only. The Conservative leaders had to decide whether they would oppose the second reading or not. On grounds of expediency they decided, and most people think they wisely decided, not to oppose the second reading. They had therefore nothing more to do on the occasion of the second reading than to record their disapprobation of the Bill, to state why they permitted it to be read a second time, and to let peers like Lord SHAFFLESHIRE, who have strong feelings and no political responsibility, have their say. When they got into Committee they had to propose and carry amendments, many of which had already been sufficiently discussed in the House of Commons. They drew up a list of points on which they required the Commons to reconsider their judgment or pass a decision. Their mistake was not that they had their amendments ready and passed them quickly, for this was only a useful saving of public time, but that amongst these amendments they inserted one which substituted a rival Bill for that which they were engaged in discussing. Nor could they have done at the fig end of last Session what they have been doing now. They have now made their amendments at a period of the Session when there has been plenty of time to discuss them, and three weeks will probably have elapsed between the adoption of the amendments and the final shaping of the Bill. If the Conservative leaders wished to make such an amendment as that of the optional Ballot, it is far better for the Government and the country that it should have been rejected after full consideration, and at a time when it is possible to get together a full House, than that it should have seemed to have been swept away unfairly by the pressure of a tiny knot of officials who stay on until the middle of August because they are allowed no choice. The Ballot Bill this Session has been fairly and fully discussed and voted on by both Houses, and the country is now in a position to try the experiment under satisfactory circumstances. The Bill is not of course perfect. No Bill so much debated and so freely pulled about was likely to be perfect. But it does provide for a Ballot which will test whether the Ballot is a good thing. It is sufficiently compulsory and not too harshly penal. The ignorance of its contents displayed by many peers, even among those of high standing and long political experience, was astonishing. Lord RUSSELL showed that he knew no more of the provisions of a Bill which he violently attacked than if it had been composed in Chinese. He seemed to think that if a voter were asked to vote for such men as Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY or Mr. WILBERFORCE, and promised to vote for them, he might at once be imprisoned, and that a Middlesex elector who had voted for Lord ENFIELD, and said he had so voted, might also be imprisoned. It is scarcely necessary to say that every elector will, after the Bill is passed, be as entirely at liberty to say before he votes for whom he is going to vote, and to say after he has voted for whom he has given his vote, as he is now. All that he will not be at liberty to do is to show to any one at the time of voting how he has voted. There is no distinct penalty imposed by the Bill on his showing this; but the Bill distinctly directs him not to do it, the prescribed course of his proceedings will make it very difficult for him to do it, and any agent who induced him to do it would be liable to very severe punishment. If he conspired with the agent to show his voting-paper for corrupt purposes he would be liable to be indicted at common law. The result in all probability will be that electors will not be able to show their voting-papers so as to make bribery or intimidation possible through the disclosure; and if this is the case, the Ballot will have a fair trial.

To try the Ballot, which must in any case be a cumbersome and painful experiment, and not to try it fairly, would be quite unworthy of Parliament; but, as Lord GAZER pointed out, the Lords had a special reason for desiring to avoid the reproach that the experiment they were permitting was not to be made so as really to test its value. They intended to insist that the experiment should be treated avowedly as an experiment, and that the Act should only be in force for eight years. Unless during these eight years the Ballot was a real Ballot, the time would be spent, not in testing the working of the Ballot, but in agitating that the Ballot might one day be really tested. The balance of argument preponderates, we think, in favour of treating the Ballot openly as an experiment. It is indeed impossible to follow the argument of those who are pleased to assert that, if a vote could be taken, the majority of all the electors in the kingdom would be against having the Ballot at all. Any one can say this if he chooses as to any subject of political discussion. It is a mere assertion, and no one can test it. All that we know is that a majority of the constituencies has tacitly sanctioned a majority of the House of Commons in passing the Bill, and the Opposition did not think fit to challenge the opinion of the constituencies by rejecting the second reading of the Bill in the Lords. The only reason for treating the Ballot as an experiment is because it is an experiment. In one sense all new legislation is an experiment, but the Ballot is an experiment in the special sense that it is confessedly an evil designed to remove a greater evil, while no one can pretend to say in the least how it will work. Up to a certain point it may be said that its very success will make it unnecessary. It being assumed that open voting is in itself the right mode of voting, which is a point virtually conceded by all speakers in both Houses, but that open voting is made pernicious by abuses for which secret voting is the remedy, possibly efficacious, but certainly disagreeable, it follows that, if the abuses are taken away by secret voting, we may return some day without harm to open voting. In one respect this might easily be the case. Any one who will turn to the history of the Ballot in the present Parliament will find that the first serious call for it was occasioned mainly, not by bribery or the intimidation of landlords or of Trades Unions, but by the frightful lawlessness and mob violence which had disgraced many constituencies in the elections of 1868. A change in the manner of voting which might enable a man to vote in peace, and quiet people to stay at home without fear of injury to life or property, seemed worth having at any price. Scenes of violence are soon forgotten, and the impression made by the riots at the time of the last elections has to a great degree faded away. But while they were fresh in the minds of those who suffered from them, they prompted more than anything else the demand for the Ballot. There is every reason to expect that the Ballot will have an excellent effect in this direction. It will largely tend to make elections orderly, and the process of voting safe, if uninteresting. Possibly the result might have been arrived at in another way, and it may not have been necessary to have recourse to the Ballot in order to put down electioneering mobs. Still, as the Ballot has been adopted, the consequence of its being in operation on which it is easiest to rely with confidence is that of making the process of voting safe and tame. In the course of a few years the notion that law and order are to be wholly disregarded at election time may have almost died out, and then one considerable drawback to the system of open voting will have been removed.

M. THIERS AND MARSHAL MACMAHON.

AS the Conservatives in the French Assembly seem to have thought better of their designs against M. THIERS, it is not likely that anything more will be known as to what it was that they really intended. In one version of the story their conduct is described as being of the most innocent kind possible. They had taken M. THIERS's threats in their obvious and legitimate sense. He had told them again and again that if he found himself at issue with the majority of the Assembly upon any important question he should have no choice but to resign office. He had been at no pains to conceal the fact that there were several important questions upon which he expected to be at issue with the majority of the Assembly. The natural conclusion from these premises was that at any moment France might find herself without a President. It became the duty, therefore, of every lover of order to take thought for the uncomfortable morrow. The country could not go on without a Government of some sort, and unless the Conservatives did something to help themselves, they might find the Government to which Heaven helped them exceedingly disagreeable.

It was this conviction that led them to take counsel with Marshal MacMahon. So long as M. THIERS would consent to rule them, they would bow to his authority; but if he chose to talk of laying down his office, it was only reasonable that they should think about finding a successor. The other form of the story presents the action of the Conservatives in a very different light. They appear no longer as virtuous citizens taking counsel for their country's good. They are conspirators secretly scheming to overthrow the Republic, and determined to drive M. THIERS from power because he has refused to have any part in their designs. To men of this temper a coup d'état is the most natural method of compassing their end, and a coup d'état requires a general and an army. The man whom circumstances seemed to point out as best able to secure them these essentials was Marshal MACMAHON, and the simplest way to enlist Marshal MACMAHON on their side was to offer to make him President. They might make what professions they pleased of their intention of only falling back on this expedient in the event of being deserted by M. THIERS, but they would not have settled the details of their action with so much minuteness unless they were prepared to force M. THIERS to desert them. Notwithstanding their complaints of the personal character of his Government, what they really desired was a more personal Government still. They might hardly care whether Marshal MACMAHON restored the Empire, or the Monarchy by right divine, or the Monarchy by popular election; but they did care that he should restore something. The Marshal was sounded, and was found to be not indisposed for the part assigned to him. To what lengths the conspirators had agreed to go, or in what way the plot was to be worked out, has not been stated with any confidence. It was not necessary to be precise on these heads to give verisimilitude to the story. M. THIERS is easily provoked, and when provoked is certain to resort to his favourite menace. He would only have to be taunted into resigning office, and then be taken at his word, to give them all the opportunity they needed.

As regards the actual facts, it is probable that the first of these versions is nearer the truth than the second. The theory of a formal conspiracy may perhaps not exaggerate the hatred which the Right feel towards M. THIERS, but to all appearance it decidedly exaggerates their courage in giving effect to it. They can hardly fail to know that to depose M. THIERS—and to omit to ask him to reconsider his resignation would in effect amount to a deposition—would be to give the signal for a renewal of strife which might at any moment develop into actual warfare. There may be a few men among them of more than common impetuosity who would welcome such a result as at all events better than the existing compromise. They may argue that to sit still now is to see the Republic consolidated, and that to overthrow it when once it has been set up will be a yet harder work than to fight in order to prevent its being set up. If it be once granted that to promote the establishment of monarchies at all times and in all places is the chief end of man, there is much to be said for this reasoning. It cannot be denied that the Republic stands a much better chance of being permanent—as Frenchmen count permanence—than it did twelve months ago. M. THIERS has governed France during the interval with great adroitness, and upon the whole with great success, and each of M. THIERS's triumphs has been a fresh score on the side of the Republic. At first no one quite knew how far his professions of faith in the Government that divides Frenchmen least were really genuine. The Left half suspected him of plotting an Orleansist restoration; the Right were disposed to accept his anti-monarchical speeches as designed to wrap up monarchical intentions to be disclosed when the times were ripe for their publication. There is no room for any such uncertainty now. Whatever may be M. THIERS's secret impressions as to the constitutional future, his views as to the constitutional present have become perfectly clear. So long as he lives and governs France will continue a Republic. But whatever the fanatics of the Right may hold as to the wisdom of drawing the sword without further delay, this is obviously not the doctrine of any considerable section of French Conservatism. The majority would like perhaps to overthrow M. THIERS before he has had time to do any more mischief, but they are not prepared to overthrow him unless they can convince themselves that he and everybody else will take the overthrow quietly. There is no possibility, as things stand at present, of their arriving at any such assurance. M. THIERS might not be inclined to show much fight on his own behalf, but there are others who might be disposed to fight for him, with a view perhaps of consolidating some support from the moderate Conservatives by a judicious use of his name. The appointment of Marshal MACMAHON as President by an Assembly which has no present claim to represent the country would be almost as declared an outrage on Republican principles as the recall of NAPOLEON III. or the restoration of LÉON V. The form of a Republic might remain, but the substance of a Republic would be gone. It is not probable that M. GAMBETTA would submit to a coup d'état of this kind; and until the trial has been made, no one quite knows what amount of influence M. GAMBETTA can bring to bear upon the army. Marshal MACMAHON is popular with the soldiery, but the names which are associated with the most honourable incidents of the war are those of General CHANZY and General FAIDHERBE, who in their several fashions are both Republicans. It is at least possible therefore that the only result of placing Marshal MACMAHON at the head of affairs would be to destroy the apparent unity which for the time makes the French army a power on the Conservative side. The deputies of the majority are sharp enough to make these calculations for themselves, and cautious enough not to wish to verify them by any imprudent act of their own.

It is not surprising to hear that the last move of the Conservatives has been to attempt the formation of a new party which shall be composed of members of the Right and Left Centres and shall accept the recognition of the Republic as a condition of its existence. The statement may be true or false as regards particulars, but there can be little doubt that it is a true representation of the feelings of the majority. They have found out, not for the first time, that for the present their strength is to sit still, and they feel so much compromised by the talk of their more extreme members that they are anxious to weed their ranks of such violent and unmanageable allies. The easiest way of doing this is to construct a new party. The Will-o'-the-wisp which has brought them into their present difficulty is the wish to see a homogenous majority where in reality there has been none to see. They were misled by the notion that they could construct a strong Parliamentary party which should be at once a check upon the Government and upon their own unruly allies. They have now discovered that an organization of this kind is an impossibility. A French Conservative cannot hold himself equally aloof from the Government and from the extreme Right. A Parliamentary majority can only be constructed by the aid of one or other element. To ally themselves with the extreme Right would entail consequences of the utmost gravity. To ally themselves with M. THIERS will at all events leave matters where they are. The National party, if it is ever reduced into shape, will develop no new policy; it will be content to play the same useful, though undistinguished, part that the majority has played all along, except during the interval when it has allowed itself to be led astray by men of pronounced monarchical tendencies. It will give the same grudging but effective support to M. THIERS; it will show the same external acquiescence in the establishment of the Republic, and feel the same secret irritation at the consequences of its own conduct. The upshot of all the rumours that have been flying about for the last fortnight seems to be, that the relations between the Government and the Assembly will, in all essential respects, return to what they were before the interview of the Right with M. THIERS.

CONSULAR JURISDICTION IN EGYPT.

IT is well that the House of Commons should at suitable intervals be reminded of the anomalous relations which exist between Eastern Governments and the European communities within their borders. Egyptian Viceroys and Ministers, having attained more than a smattering of modern civilization, naturally chafe at the restraints which are imposed by foreign jealousy on their domestic administration. Not only merchants and capitalists whose enterprise adds greatly to the prosperity of the country, but miscellaneous adventurers of all nations enjoy exemption from the ordinary jurisdiction. The cession of the Ionian Islands to Greece has happily relieved the English Consulate from the troublesome duty of protecting many unscrupulous vagabonds both in Egypt and in Turkey; but a shifty Greek in trouble often discovers that by some unexplained process he has become a subject of France or of Russia. As the Egyptian Government cannot afford to offend any of its powerful patrons, its remonstrances would probably remain without effect but for the incidental inconvenience which is felt by Europeans from the conflict of privileges among themselves. Mr. BAILLIE GORDON, who introduced the subject into the House of Commons, mentioned a duplicate litigation in Egypt between a Belgian and a Frenchman which proceeded simultaneously before their respective Consuls. Either functionary decided in favour of his countryman, and it may be supposed that the plaintiff was practically defeated. A petty fraud in a bazaar perpetrated at the expense of Mr. COCHRANE himself might have found a precedent in cities more civilized than Cairo. In Switzerland, where there are no capitulations or foreign jurisdictions, travellers find that the local tribunals always decide against the unhappy victims of indigenous landlords or drivers. The petty grievances of tourists would hardly deserve either Parliamentary discussion or diplomatic intervention; but Egypt is, as Mr. COCHRANE truly stated, an important centre of commerce; and the facilities of trade are directly affected by the uncertainty of the law and by all impediments which disturb the regularity of administration. Although it is necessary that the lives and property of foreign visitors and residents should be protected, there is little danger of their being subjected to exceptional injustice. For more than one generation the local rulers have employed the services of European agents in almost every public department. At this moment the KHEDIVÉ's chief engineer is an Englishman, and an expedition under an English commander is, with the professed object of checking the slave trade, engaged in extending the Egyptian dominion along the upper valley of the Nile. Experience has shown the error which was committed when the construction and management of the Suez Canal were allowed to fall into the hands of French capitalists. To the surprise and disappointment of the countries bordering on the Mediterranean, the Canal is principally used by English shipping, and it would have been desirable that the interests of its owners should have been more closely identified with the prosperity of trade. It may be confidently asserted that unless the predominant interest in the Canal eventually becomes English the maintenance and gradual improvement of the undertaking will not be effectually assured.

The rivalry which prevailed in Egypt between England and France from the days of MEHEMET ALI to a recent period has fortunately in some degree abated. It is not likely that during the present generation France will attempt foreign conquests; and the pacific and unambitious policy of England is now generally recognized on the Continent. The Power which was two or three generations ago most actively engaged in acquiring new possessions in all parts of the world has since been the first to discover that markets are more cheaply secured by the simple process of buying and selling than by conquest. As long as the Empire includes the requisite number of ports and coaling stations at convenient distances, the multiplication of dependencies only involves useless cost and danger. Although it is probable that an English Viceroy would govern Egypt better than the Mahometan descendant of an Albanian adventurer, the advantage would accrue principally to the natives, while the possession of the province would provoke universal envy and occasional hostility. The Emperor NICHOLAS, when he offered Egypt to England as her share in the spoils of the Turkish Empire, was probably well aware that the acceptance of his proposal would have secured him the incidental advantage of a lasting quarrel between England and France. It is much better that French and English merchants should make money, while the Khedive more or less efficiently keeps the peace among the native population. An ostensibly Mahometan Government has many facilities for dealing with Arabs and African savages, although its conduct may not always strictly conform to the European standard of morality. The ambiguous position of a ruler who is not yet absolutely sovereign facilitates the exercise of foreign influence. English statesmen have consistently opposed the separation of Egypt from Turkey; but they would not less resolutely resist any attempt to reduce Egypt to the condition of an ordinary Turkish province. It is convenient that the country should be neutral, and that its fortunes should be as far as possible independent of political complications. The attempt in which M. THIERS failed, two-and-thirty years ago, to create an Egyptian kingdom under the patronage of France, was at the time ill-judged; and it is not likely to be renewed. It is not improbable that commercial residents in half-civilized regions may tend more and more to form themselves into extra-territorial communities on the model of the little republics which have been organized in some of the ports in the further East. In China and Japan even Americans cease to vex Englishmen, and Calvinist missionaries openly disapprove of the massacre of Roman Catholic priests and nuns. The necessity of associating for mutual protection is far less urgent in Egypt than in China; but traders from all parts of Christendom have in all Eastern countries many interests in common.

The anarchy which results from the present system of consular jurisdiction is universally acknowledged; and some approximation has been made to an understanding on the subject between the French and English Governments. The simple remedy of rendering Europeans amenable to the ordinary Egyptian tribunals is wholly inadmissible. It might be well that summary justice should be executed on some of the discreditable adventurers who crowd to Alexandria and Cairo from the coasts of the Levant; but it would be intolerable that English, French, or American traders and visitors should be placed at the mercy of a Cadi whose notions of justice probably correspond with those of his predecessors as recorded in the Arabian Nights. It seems to have been proposed that civil and criminal cases in which foreigners are concerned shall be submitted to a mixed Court of Egyptian and foreign judges. It may perhaps be right that the local authorities should enjoy an ostensible right of jurisdiction, as the Lord Mayor and Aldermen assert the municipal independence of the City of London by sitting at the Old Bailey beside the Judges who exclusively administer justice. On the other hand, it is indispensable that through a majority or by some other contrivance the European members of the tribunal should retain the virtual management of the proceedings. The difficulties of constituting a tribunal of judges accustomed to different systems of law would be overcome by the exercise of ordinary discretion and forbearance. French and English judges would soon learn to understand one another; but Oriental and European doctrines would be found practically irreconcilable. It is conceivable that, although Mahometans seem incapable of being converted to Christianity, the spectacle of Courts administering civilized justice may gradually influence native habits of thought and practice. Unlike the Turks of the European provinces, the mixed population of Egypt has been accustomed to regard the foreign residents as a kind of alien aristocracy. The dominant race are themselves few in number, and the peasantry is not sufficiently advanced in cultivation to be affected by political prejudices. The ambitious designs of MEHEMET and IBRAHIM to found an Imperial dynasty of their own are wholly obsolete. One or two of their successors adopted the opposite policy of seeking a closer connexion with the sovereign Power at Constantinople, and the Porte has on more than one occasion relied on Egyptian forces for the suppression of internal rebellion. The present VICEROY has sometimes been suspected of intending, at the instigation of Russia, to assert his independence; but, if necessary, the influence of England and France would always be effectually used to maintain the existing neutrality. The resident Consuls necessarily exercise diplomatic functions under the general control of the Ambassadors at Constantinople, but the KHEDIVÉ has not established the right of being represented by Envoys at European Courts. His rank corresponds to that of the great feudal vassals in the middle ages, and he would lose in security more than he would gain in dignity by exchanging his hereditary Viceroyalty for a precarious crown. If he desired to emancipate himself from the tutelage of European Powers, the existence of the Suez Canal, which may perhaps add largely to the prosperity of his dominions, would alone suffice to disappoint his hopes. The French projectors of the scheme may confidently rely on the support of their own Government against any local interference with their rights, and England will never consent that the highway to India should be controlled by any independent Power. The grosser anomalies which result from the claims of European residents to immunity will be gradually redressed, but any Government which may rule in Egypt must be prepared to acquiesce in many infringements of its nominal sovereignty. At present the mode of government suits all parties better than any alternative which could be suggested, although no politician would have deliberately invented the plan of an hereditary Viceroyalty.

THE LICENSING BILL.

THE Licensing Bill has reached the House of Commons. It is a Bill of moderate scope. It aims at improvement of the licensing authority, and strengthening the police regulations, and that is about all. As regards the former object, all reasonable persons agree in desiring to attain it. As regards the latter, the principal question is as to the hour of closing public-houses, and that must be decided by the balance of convenience, ascertained in the best practicable way. Mr. BRUCE says that he has received strong testimony that every advancing hour of the night brings with it an increasing ratio of drunkenness. On the other hand, it is clear that any important reduction in the number of hours must be attended in large towns with such considerable exceptions as greatly to impair the value of the rule. The case of persons employed in theatres has been lately brought under attention; and it is clear that any public-house in the vicinity of a theatre, and accustomed to supply its wants, would be entitled to a dispensation from any early-closing rule. The case of attendants at early markets would be equally strong for exemption from any regulation of late opening. It may perhaps be the best way of dealing with this question to remit it for consideration by the magistrates of districts, who are necessarily acquainted with the habits and requirements of the population amid which they live. A system of special exemption from ordinary rules has the advantage that the authority conferring a privilege may impose conditions on its exercise. There is a difference easily understood, but difficult to express in words, in the manner of conducting public-houses; and it might be possible for magistrates to require that those who enjoy special advantages should do something to deserve them. At any rate, it appears that if Parliament narrows the hours considerably, it must lodge somewhere a power of relaxing its own rules. It is remarkable that the demand for restriction is now preferred with increased urgency on the ground that hours of labour are being shortened and wages are being increased in many trades, and that the time and money thus placed at the workman's disposal will be spent at the public-house. This argument, however, proves rather too much; for if a man has money and desire he will contrive to use the one to gratify the other. If he cannot drink beer in company, he will drink gin at home; or, in other words, he will transfer his custom from the publican to the grocer. It has been thought right that the provision as to closing, whatever it be, should apply to grocers as well as publicans; but obviously a man who habitually drinks gin will take care to supply himself within the hours of business. A grocer's shop is open, we will say, for thirteen hours consistently with the sobriety of the neighbourhood; but if that shop is open another hour, the temptation to drunkenness becomes irresistible. When the discussion has got as far as this, we begin to feel that it is necessary to have recourse to common sense. The publicans may reasonably complain if the grocers' hours of selling exceed their own, and equality in this respect between the two branches of the liquor trade can do no harm. This remark applies equally to any provisions against adulteration. Mr. BRUCE says that a recent examination of liquor sold in London failed to furnish a justification for the sweeping complaints commonly made of adulteration. On the other hand, it is said to be impossible to procure a glass of good, pure, and wholesome beer in any public-house, and the adulteration of gin is declared to be one of the most serious evils that call for remedy. It would be desirable, and apparently not impracticable, to discover the truth upon this branch of the subject. Let trustworthy examinations be made of samples of beer and gin purchased at various retail houses, and let the results be published. It has been lately stated in a Parliamentary paper that much harm beyond simple drunkenness is caused by the deleterious ingredients of what is commonly called gin. It may be that the "gin spinners" are unjustly accused, but at any rate it would be satisfactory to have their justification, if it be forthcoming.

Sir WILFRID LAWSON has at last said something worth quotation. According to him the grocers accuse the publicans of making all the men drunk, and the publicans accuse the grocers of making all the women drunk. He would draw the inference that both publicans and grocers ought to be prohibited, and having thus passed beyond the utmost limit of practical legislation we must decline to follow him. He was enthusiastically cheered at a recent meeting of his supporters at Exeter Hall. The supporters of the Permissive Bill assure us that they are entirely satisfied with its present position, and on this point we have the happiness to agree with them. It strikes us, however, that their leader must be rather at a loss for a new argument when he takes up the long hours of public-house business as a grievance to potmen and barmaids. There is a Bill before the House of Commons to prevent women from working in certain trades more than fifty-four hours a week, and Sir WILFRID LAWSON desires that this Bill should extend to barmaids. We are by no means sure that the young ladies in fashionable attire who preside over bottles and glasses would thank him for his interference. It may be, however, that he is prepared to prove that it is impossible for any woman to dart stimulating glances and exchange effective "chaff" with customers for more than nine hours daily. But even if he had got as far as this, the publican might answer that his business was so good that he could afford to keep two barmaids. When any genuine complaint is produced from this class of women that they are overworked the House of Commons will doubtless respectfully entertain it. In the meanwhile we shall take leave to think that the remedy for their wrongs, if they have any, is in their own hands. Few publicans would be so blind to their own interest as to keep a woman with a grievance behind their bars. The work they have to do, unless it be done willingly, had better not be done at all.

The agitators sometimes represent themselves as engaged in educating the people, and if they really would do this instead of merely talking about it, they would have our entire sympathy in their efforts. If they would address themselves to the men who are earning more money in less time than they used to do, and would try to awaken in them the feelings of rational humanity, which by current supposition are altogether wanting, they would almost certainly do good, and at any rate they would do no harm. If they spent 100,000*l.* in maintaining an army of preachers of temperance, nobody would complain. Indeed, we should not greatly complain if they spent that amount in agitating for their favourite Bill, inasmuch as they are certain not to carry it. They are in fact undergoing the process of extinguishment. Mr. BRUCE will accept whatever amendments a majority requires in his Bill, and when the Bill has passed, the question will be done with for some time. When once it is seen that nothing beyond regulating the liquor traffic is possible, the discussion resolves itself into matters of detail, which can best be settled in Committee. Perhaps the most useful work that any journalist could perform in reference to this subject is to urge magistrates to make themselves thoroughly acquainted with the law of licensing, and with the condition and wants of their neighbourhood, so that the experience of the next few years may show that they deserve the confidence which Parliament still reposes in them. The agitation for what is called popular control will die away when it is seen that things are well managed by those who now hold power. As regards the law, which is now distressingly complicated, we may hope that next year it will be reduced into one or more tolerably intelligible statutes. As regards practice under the law, the Licensing Boards for counties and boroughs, with some supervision from the Home Office, may gradually arrive at something like uniformity. The utmost, however, that can be hoped from the combined efforts of Legislature and Executive is, that public-houses shall be well conducted and not too numerous. Any proposal for direct restriction is open to obvious objections which have not yet been answered. But the same result may be obtained indirectly to an adequate extent, because it is certain that if public-houses are to be well conducted there must be some limit to their number. If, however, experience proves anything, it is this—that if the open trade in liquor be unduly checked, an illicit trade is sure to flourish. Magistrates who are popular in their districts can generally find out much beyond that which policemen report to them; and this is a point well worthy of their particular attention. They should endeavour so to apply the law as to produce the least amount, not only of apparent, but of real evil. One speaker in the House of Commons complained that the Bill as it has been brought in would leave the licensed victuallers in full possession of their monopoly. It is true that if the Bill passes the licensed victuallers will be relieved, if they conduct themselves prudently, from any alarm as to the security of their property for some years to come. The discussion of the last two years will have made that clear to many which a few saw at first—that prohibition is impossible; but regulation, if not carried too far, is desirable alike for customers and dealers. As soon as this has become clear to the minds of the bishops and clergy who have hitherto lent themselves to agitation, it may be hoped that they will return to their more immediate and pressing duty. When a Roman Catholic Archbishop appears among the supporters of the Permissive Bill, one is almost tempted to ask whether the system of religion and morality which he inculcates is believed by him to be an efficient restraint upon human appetite. If it is, he had better trust to it; and if it is not, he may be sure that no possible legislation will attain the desired end. After all, we find ourselves in substantial agreement with Sir WILFRID LAWSON. Educate people to temperance, and they will be temperate.

THE PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION CROTCHET.

MR. MORRISON'S Proportional Representation Bill will perhaps supply some hints for a new game to amuse weary guests at country houses during the dull evenings of the ensuing autumn. Anybody who finds the arithmetic of bézique too easy or whist not sufficiently scientific will be charmed with Proportional Representation. If it were got up nicely, with pretty cards in a gay box adorned with portraits of Mr. HARE, Mr. MILL, and Mr. MORRISON, and with rules in rhyme, it would be sure to take. The fun of the game consists in its elaborate mystifications and amusing surprises. As many members are to be assigned to each constituency as the constituency contains "entire multiples of the quotient"—the quotient being the population of the whole country, divided by the number of members—and any existing borough which has a population exceeding or equalling "three multiples of the quotient" is to be reckoned a separate constituency. Boroughs and counties are to be mixed up with each other for voting purposes, but are to retain separate franchises. The country is to be divided into some seventy or eighty constituencies, and there is to be a general hotchpot of members for each district. Every candidate who obtains a certain proportion of votes will be at once returned. If a candidate has more votes than are necessary to secure his election, his surplus votes will go to the candidate who stands next on the list, and if any remain to the third, and so on till they are all exhausted. If after this process there are any candidates who have still not obtained a sufficient number of votes to be elected, the candidate who has the least number of votes will have to surrender his stock for distribution amongst more favoured, but not fully qualified, competitors. It is supposed that in this way every vote will tell, and that the opinion of the constituencies will be gauged with mathematical accuracy. There is another old-fashioned parlour game which nearly approaches to this. It is called Question and Answer, because a person outside a room is required to answer categorically Yes or No at hazard to questions which have been privately arranged, but have not been communicated to him. The amazement of the person who has given the answers when he learns what they imply is often very diverting. It is difficult, however, to imagine anything more ludicrous than the surprise, disappointment, and disgust which would be generally felt throughout the country at the startling results of the first elections conducted on the Proportional system. The voting would, of course, be very much at random. There are certain names which would attract foolish or fanatical persons in all parts of a district, and the consent of an imbecile minority would outweigh the discriminating votes of a majority of intelligent people who happened to have distributed their votes among a number of equally eligible candidates. If it were worth while to revolutionize our electoral system in order to secure the return of the TICHMONHE Claimant, it would be difficult to devise a more effectual scheme than that of Mr. HARE, which has been reproduced in a modified form in Mr. MORRISON'S Bill. Mr. MORRISON himself admits that the effect of the measure would probably be to introduce into the House of Commons the representation of crotchets; but he appears to be of opinion that this would be a beneficial result, and that crotchets would find a natural home in that Assembly. Everything, he said, that is new in politics and social philosophy is called a crotchet until it comes to be accepted by a substantial minority. A good deal of nonsense is often talked about the House of Commons being an exact microcosm or mirror of the country. It is quite impossible that it could ever be anything of the kind. In order to produce such a result it would be necessary to have members with infinitesimal fractions of votes corresponding to the comparative insignificance of the parties who had returned them. In point of fact, the House of Commons is only a rough and ready representation of the more weighty elements of public opinion. It is neither desirable nor practicable that the opinions of every petty clique or sect should be represented by voting power in Parliament, and it is time enough for a crotchet to make its way there when it has at its back a substantial minority capable of influencing an election.

It is difficult to imagine a more fantastic or inconsistent measure than the Proportional Representation Bill in the form in which twenty-six members of the House of Commons were reckless enough to vote for it on Wednesday. It was admitted that the Bill could not be applied exclusively to England; that it would be impossible to work it without an assimilation of the borough and county franchises; and, further, that it would work satisfactorily only with household suffrage. Under these circumstances it would have been natural and reasonable to include in the Bill all the provisions which were essential to its practical success. Mr. MORRISON is indignant that national interests should ever be sacrificed to party interests, and he assures us that his only object is to obtain an exact representation of the opinion of the nation in all its aspects. We are bound of course to believe him when he says that it is only for the sake of simplicity that he refrained from proposing that Forty-shilling Freeholders in boroughs should cease to vote for counties, and we presume it was for the same reason that he provided for swamping the counties still further with borough votes. It may be a remarkable circumstance that in three different countries, in the United States, in Denmark, and in England, three different inquirers, without concert, should have hit upon this wonderful scheme of Proportional Representation; but this is hardly in itself a sufficient ground for recommending the adoption of a bewildering and mischievous novelty in electoral procedure. It is perhaps significant that, whereas a few years ago the United States was the model country of Radical reformers, which corrupt and decrepit England was urged to imitate as far as she could, the United States are now usually held up as a dreadful example to be carefully avoided. A considerable part of Mr. MORRISON'S speech was taken up with showing the injurious operation of American caucuses and wire-pullers. There is undoubtedly a great deal of force in his objections to the system of equal electoral districts, as being destitute of local pride, and subject to the arbitrary manipulation of party managers. The caucus system practically deprives electors, as Mr. MORRISON said, of all freedom of choice in selecting their own candidates, while it confers enormous power on a small and irresponsible clique of wire-pullers who are able to dictate the choice of the constituency, and who may be crotchety, fanatical, or corrupt. Mr. MORRISON, however, appears to have overlooked the fact that the helplessness of electors and the power of wire-pullers would be infinitely greater under the system of Proportional Representation than under that of equal electoral districts; in fact the former would include all the evils of the latter with a large addition of evils peculiar to itself. At first the fanatics and crotchet-mongers would probably have the best of it, but caucuses and managers would soon come into play. The promiscuous multitude of one of the agglomerated constituencies, scattered over a vast area and composed of the most diverse and perhaps antagonistic elements, would be utterly bewildered when called upon to make out a list of candidates in the order of preference. It would be natural to seek advice, and still more natural that advice should be offered; and the result would inevitably be the adoption of a party platform, and a list of candidates to be voted for en bloc. As the electors in their perplexity would almost certainly fall into the hands of party managers, the House of Commons would be chiefly composed of the nominees of caucuses, with a mixture of zealots and crotchet-mongers. The gentlemen at the Reform Club who were anxious the other day to spare the people of Aberdeen the trouble of electing a member would be able under the Proportional Representation system to concert their measures beforehand, and to impose their candidates without difficulty on paralysed and helpless constituencies. Skilled agents would after a time be masters of the elections, and the voters would be driven like sheep to the fold.

We do not know whether it is intended that this system of Proportional Representation is to be established in conjunction with the Ballot or to supersede it; but it can hardly be doubted that the tendency of the system, like that of the Ballot, would be to diminish the personal interest of the community in the election of members. The electors would soon discover that they had no alternative but to surrender themselves to the dictation of party managers, or allow themselves to be overridden by crotchet-mongers and advocates of extreme opinions. We are far from saying that, if all electors were enlightened, possessed of sound judgment, and animated by a keen public spirit, there might not be something to be said in favour of Mr. MORRISON'S proposal, or rather of Mr. HARE'S, for we believe it would be found to be practically impossible to stop short of the latter if the principle were admitted. But electors being what they are, and what they are likely to be for some considerable time to come, men for the most part of moderate intelligence and indifferent education, knowing and caring very little about politics except in so far as their own interests are immediately affected, can hardly fail to be persuaded and deceived by well-fangled schemes of mischief and misdirection. Mr.

MORRISON frankly admits that the House of Commons on the whole represents the country very fairly; but this is due, he complains, to "a series of petty accidents," and he sighs for "more scientifically constructed machinery." It has usually been thought a merit of our political system that it tries to make the best of "petty accidents," and looks rather to practical results than theoretical refinements; and the history of France is in its way equally instructive as to the value of a strictly logical Constitution and scientific machinery. It is perhaps somewhat surprising to find that the Government has no opinion to offer on this wild and preposterous measure, and especially to be told that "it does not call for an immediate decision on the part of those who would be responsible for carrying out its provisions." It would appear that Mr. GLADSTONE is preparing for the contingencies of a possible campaign, not by burning his boats, but by laying in a stock of munitions of war. The constitution of Parliament is to be kept an open question in order to provide for the exigencies of political agitation. As Mr. MORRISON candidly observed, we are on the eve of "new departures" in politics, and "as soon as the Liberal party are in Opposition, they will raise the cry of 'electoral reform.'" It will perhaps then be discovered that the condition of the agricultural labourer and the want of household suffrage in the counties are branches of Mr. GLADSTONE'S unfruitful Upas-tree which must be immediately dealt with.

OUR CRIMINALS.

A GREAT number of philanthropists, male and female, have been for many days discussing the important question, What is the right thing to do with our criminals? The Congress seems to have been creditably distinguished from many of those which are in the habit of gratuitously bestowing their wisdom upon mankind. A very large number of the members were really entitled to speak with authority on the subject. They brought to their task not merely a general tendency to expansive benevolence and a capacity for putting the universe to rights by the enunciation of a few truisms, but also a large amount of practical experience. There were speakers from every part of the world who had had the management of prisons on a large scale, and who fully appreciated the conditions of the problem before us. It was impossible but that many useful hints should be struck out, and we may hope that they will bear fruit in some definite reforms. But it is also true that any Congress, even if it were composed of the deepest philosophers, would have certain weaknesses. In a multitude of counsellors there is always abundance of twaddle and diffuse platitudes. That element does not appear to have been by any means absent from the Middle Temple Hall; and, moreover, the discussion ranged over so vast a variety of topics that it would apparently be quite impossible to sum up its conclusions within any limited range. Every possible question connected in any way with the treatment of prisoners, before, during, and after their punishments, seems to have been energetically discussed; and it would be quite melancholy to observe—were it not that there is some consolation in the fact—how many promising discussions were nipped in the bud under the inexorable pressure of time. One or two general principles seemed to emerge from the chaos of conflicting opinion, such as the question whether reformation or repression should be the primary object of punishment. Here, as elsewhere, there seems to have been much difference of sentiment; and yet it is obvious, when we come to look at it, that the difference is one rather of practical detail than of abstract principle. Nobody in fact would deny that it is desirable both to repress and to reform. It is plainly desirable that whilst there are criminals, which is likely to be the case for some time to come, they should have a wholesome fear of gratifying their amiable propensities. A gentleman who wishes to stamp his wife into a jelly should be made to understand that the consequences to his own personal comfort will be highly disagreeable. It is also plain that, if we can effect such a change in his character that when he returns to the discharge of his conjugal relations he will treat his wife to a new bonnet instead of breaking her head, it will be so much the better for society. The only question is how far the two objects can be reconciled. The problem is to make things as disagreeable as may be for the prisoner whilst degrading him as little as possible.

Unfortunately there are a good many people on whom our reforming agencies seem to be so utterly hopeless that the deterrent mode of action is apparently the only one available. Many of the brutes who appear before our Police Courts are all but devoid even of those rudimentary propensities by the cultivation of which alone we can hope to convert them into decent members of society; they are mere aggregations of brutal passions, utterly dead to any appeals to their consciences, and accessible to no motive but that of bodily suffering. What is the legitimate inference with regard to such persons if we are to proceed on the principle adopted by some of the speakers that a prison is to be considered as a hospital for mental diseases? If we pursue the analogy, we might be disposed to say that when a limb is hopelessly mangled the only remedy is amputation. Or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that in this case the patient is suffering from a disease which is at once incurable and highly infectious. What excuse can we have for ever turning his loose upon society? In an essay on which we commented some time ago, called Euthanasia, it was argued with much ingenuity and a certain show of reason, that when a man was in such a condition that nothing remained possible for him but hopeless and prolonged suffering, the right thing was to put him to death. It was of course added that the consent of the patient should first be obtained to so decisive a remedy for all human ills. The only answer which could be made from the point of view of practical convenience was the extreme liability to abuse of such a power. Dead men tell no tales; and it would be unpleasantly easy for a wife who wanted to get rid of her husband to put an end to the unfortunate person's existence, and to set up the theory that she had acted only by the express desire of the invalid. There can, however, be no doubt that if such a system could be introduced with sufficient safeguards, it would put an end to a great quantity of human suffering. Whether that would be a sufficient justification for the practice is a question involving a great many moral and theological problems on which we cannot here enter. Though the tendency of civilization is certainly to increase the value of human life and to condemn the practice of the savages who put their aged parents out of the way from motives of the purest kindness, it may possibly be held that our scrupulousity can be pushed so far as to defeat its own ends. Some, however, of the obvious objections to the proposal do not apply to the case of criminals. Suppose it to be conclusively proved that a human being has become so utterly degraded that there are no hopes of making anything better of him, should we not be giving rather a desirable lesson to mankind by removing him altogether from the world? The moral would be not, as in the other case, that suffering is an intolerable evil, but that a certain degree of moral depravity is intolerable. You have brought yourself to such a pitch, the judge would say to the criminal, that on the whole you are a nuisance, and that there is not the least chance that you will ever be anything but a nuisance. Therefore, lie off with you! Whither, it is not our province to inquire. The other world is fortunately beyond our control, and you will doubtless be disposed of there as infinite wisdom may direct; but in this you are simply a corrupting agency, like the cholera or the small-pox, and we shall exclude you from society, to the satisfaction of mankind in general. Mr. Darwin points out in one of his ingenious speculations that, if bees have a moral sense, the working bee probably considers it as a first principle that the drones should be exterminated at a certain period of their existence. The argument is advanced to prove that morality is the creation of the conditions under which we live; and that it might be so materially altered under a change of circumstances that fratricide would become a duty instead of a crime. On principles of utilitarianism it seems to be capable of being argued that, even as things are, a very analogous duty might exist. We do not indeed feel it right to destroy drones, or there would be some horrible gaps amongst the ornamental classes; but when the drone takes to go about stinging his neighbours, why not summarily smash him? The answer would of course be obvious, and indeed is pretty much the same as that which we should make to the remedy proposed in Euthanasia. There would be a difficulty about drawing the line. If we were to be restrained by no moral principle, and were not to take into account the indirect influence upon the general sense of security and justice, it can hardly be doubted that a very extensive massacre might be arranged which would be productive of highly beneficial effects to the survivors. We do not agree with the gentleman who proposed to sink Ireland for a few hours beneath the level of the Atlantic, for there are many excellent people in Ireland; but the police could easily furnish a list of criminal classes whose annihilation would be no sensible drawback to the sum of intelligence and good feeling at present existing, and would render our throats and pockets a good deal safer than they are at this moment. One objection, however, to such a proceeding, which is sufficient without going further, is that neither the police nor any other body could safely be trusted with such a power. The precedent would be very awkward, and if ever our friends of the Commune should get the upper hand they might be inclined to retort upon the governing classes. We must therefore be content with the operation of the slower agencies which will, it is to be hoped, gradually lead to the survival of the fittest and the dying out of the most degraded classes.

Even in the comparatively limited case of criminals regularly condemned, the difficulty of decision makes the remedy practically impossible. We may continue to hang murderers, but we cannot hang a man simply because we pronounce him to be morally incurable. There is no sufficient test for the purpose. Atrocious crimes do not of necessity indicate a hopelessly evil nature. Many of the worst cases are simply the result of drink; and if it is possible to make a man sober, it may be possible to make him into a tolerably useful member of society. In short, the question of moral incurability is altogether too delicate a one to be solved by the rough and ready means at our disposal. We can say pretty confidently that a given criminal has committed an atrocity, and even an atrocity which deserves death; but we cannot say with any certainty that a complete change of circumstances would not make him endurable or even useful. Though, however, we do not feel able to pronounce upon the individual, we can speak with perfect confidence of the class. There are certainly a vast number of men who will never be reformed, do what we may, though we cannot put our finger upon the particular of whom it may be truly said. From this it follows that the purely reformatory system cannot be carried out to its logical consequences, which would involve the removal of the absolutely incurable as well as the improvement of the curable. There are a great many ruffians whom we cannot kill off, or who, in other words, must remain as a permanent burden upon the country; and for them it is plain that nothing but purely deterrent agencies can be useful. The conception of a prison as a moral hospital points therefore to the ultimate ideal, but by no means to the existing state of things. It is melancholy that there should be inevitably many persons who can only be kept from mischief by simple fear. It is ardently to be wished that their number may be diminished by every means open to us, short of downright killing. It is to be wished, too, no doubt, that we should abstain as much as possible from punishments which degrade as well as deter. It is a misfortune that we are compelled to keep these criminals in awe by measures which frighten without reforming them, and tend to make them more cunning rather than less wicked. Still, under existing circumstances, the evil, however lamentable, is unavoidable.

And from this it follows that the questions at issue can only be decided by practical experience. We should be only too glad if we could hang nobody and degrade nobody. But how far criminals can be kept within tolerable bounds by measures which do not involve death or degradation is a question which can only be satisfactorily answered by those who have an intimate acquaintance with the manners and customs of the criminal classes. Mere sentiment is certainly tempting on such matters, and nothing is more easy than to lay down general principles which have a charmingly philosophical sound. Nothing, at the same time, is plainer than that the discussion is precisely one of those in which general principles without the aid of intimate practical experience are utterly futile. We are therefore glad to see that the Congress has devoted itself, in spite of some amiable rhetoricians, chiefly to the discussion of an infinite variety of minute details. We are glad also to believe Mr. Bruce's assurance that, as a matter of fact, we are making some progress towards the satisfactory solution of the numerous difficult problems involved. The result is, however, that we must either indulge in mere platitudes or plunge into a number of small practical questions which can only be satisfactorily treated when they have taken the shape of definite proposals.

THE TEMPLE OF DIANA AT EPHEBUS.

IN a shed which for many years contained the long-lost remains of one of the Seven Wonders of the World, the newly found relics of another and still more renowned of those wonders are now to be seen. For, by an arrangement unusually in keeping with the fitness of things, the space at the British Museum which was until recently occupied by the marbles from the Mausoleum is now devoted to the first fruits of the fortunate discovery of the great Temple of Diana at Ephesus. That discovery is in itself of so interesting a nature, and the results to be expected from it may prove so important, that too much attention can scarcely be directed towards it. It is no light matter that, after so many unsuccessful attempts, the shrouding mantle of time should have been at least to some extent drawn aside, and that we should have been able to obtain a glimpse of the fallen majesty of that famous edifice which the ancients accounted the crowning effort of Ionic architecture, and which was to the people of Asia Minor what St. Peter's at Rome is to the Christian world.

From innumerable times the Ephesian river Cayster has gone on "making land," its annual inundations leaving behind them an alluvial deposit which raises the level of the plain and slowly encroaches on the sea. In the early period of their history the Ephesians kept the river to some extent within bounds, but as time went by their harbour began to fail, and, after the vigorous attempt of the King of Pergamus to clear it had resulted in failure, it was abandoned to its fate. From that period the old city which surrounded it—as distinguished from the new city built on higher ground at a later date—seemed gradually to sink as the level of the plain rose, until at last its walls lay buried beneath some twenty feet of marshy soil. The Ephesus of the present day, called by its inhabitants Aiasoluk, consists of "a few miserable houses, and a few hovels, some of them leaning against the pillars of the great aqueduct that strides across the plain," at some distance from the river and the marshes. Of the glories of the past but little remains. The whole neighbourhood of the modern village of Ephesus is strewn with marble relics, and where the ancient city stood lie the ruins of many vast buildings. Conspicuous among these is the Great Theatre which held upwards of 56,000 persons, and the Odeum, or smaller theatre, both of which have been cleared out in recent excavations. The Stadium and Gymnasium are also recognizable; the outline of the harbour may still be traced by the rankness of its reeds, and the city wall crops up here and there in massive blocks.

But the building for which every Western spectator of this scene of desolation long looked most eagerly, though all in vain, was the great Temple of Diana. It seemed strange that every trace of so vast an edifice should have completely vanished, though it was known that the Goths sacked and destroyed it in the third century of our era, that the Byzantine Christians subsequently used its ruins as a quarry, probably until the time of Justinian, and that for centuries the Cayster has been yearly spreading a fresh pall of alluvial deposit above its buried remains. Successive travellers suggested various localities as its site, most of them attempting to identify it with some of the massive substructures still visible. On the Admiralty chart of the Gulf of Scamander, issued in 1836, the position of the Temple is conjecturally laid down on the north side of the city, and in Mr. Falkener's elaborate work on Ephesus, published in 1862, it is supposed to have been at the head of the harbour, on the west of the city. In the year 1863 Mr. Wood began his explorations, "with no funds" (says the Report of the Committee of the Dilettante Society, a memoir to which we are greatly indebted) "except what he ventured out of his private means, with no implements or other plant, with no dwelling-house at hand, and with no kind of assistance from others, except a firman obtained for him by the Trustees of the British Museum." Beginning with the Odeum, Mr. Wood proceeded to clear out the area of the Great Theatre, the scene of the uproar on the occasion of St. Paul's visit to the city. There he found a number of inscriptions, one of which furnished the first clue to the discovery of the Temple. After clearing out the Great Theatre Mr. Wood discovered what he had good grounds for supposing was the Magnesian Gate of the city. From that gate, according to Philostratus, a stoa, or covered portico, led to the Temple of Diana, intended to yield shelter in bad weather to processions; and outside the gate he had discovered Mr. Wood found, about eleven feet under ground, "an ancient road, with tombs on each side, pointing in a north-east direction, and at the side of this road a row of bases of square piers, such as would have served to support a stoa like that of Damianus." This road Mr. Wood continued to explore during the years 1867, 1868, and the first half of 1869, and in the meanwhile he discovered "another ancient way leading from a city gate near the Stadium towards the Turkish village of Aiasoluk," along which also were tombs and bases of piers indicating a line of portico. Thinking it probable that these roads converged towards the Temple, Mr. Wood followed their track, and in April 1869 he "struck upon the angle of the peribolos just where it might have been expected to be." In this wall was an inscription stating that the Emperor Augustus had rebuilt the peribolos wall round the Temple of the Goddess Diana. Two other inscriptions at a little distance stated the distance from the river and the width of the road at the points where they occurred. From the angle of the peribolos on which he had thus lighted Mr. Wood proceeded to trace the two lines of wall as far as he could. By November 1869 he had followed the western wall for about 1,150 feet from south to north; but it then bent towards the west, and no further trace of it could be found. Meantime he had sunk a number of pits within the presumed area of the peribolos, in hopes of lighting upon the Temple itself. In one of these he came upon "a pavement of square blocks of fine white marble, nine inches thick, laid on a level bed of black marble, as was the practice of Greek architects in laying the floors of their temples," together with two marble sculptures. "These remains lay buried under eighteen feet of alluvial deposit, the lowest stratum of which was composed of splinters of fine white marble, which appeared to have been partially calcined by fire." Proceeding with his explorations on this spot, Mr. Wood in 1870 "soon came to several drums of Ionic columns, ranging from four to five feet, of white marble, with fine joints"; by January 1871 he had enlarged the area of his excavation to about one hundred feet square, over the whole of which space drums of columns and other architectural marbles were strewn, and in February a fragment of the lowest drum of a column, six feet one inch in diameter, was found in its original position on its base. As it was clear by this time that the site of the Temple had been discovered, the explorations were continued on a greater scale.

From this sketch of the history of Mr. Wood's discovery—one for which no slight praise is due to his intelligent and unwearied perseverance—we may turn to the consideration of its products, some of which have already arrived at the British Museum, while others are on board two ironclads now, we believe, at Plymouth. Among these are, to use the words of the Report we have already quoted so freely, "the lower drum of a column, nearly entire, with figures sculptured on it in relief, and large fragments of two or more drums, similarly sculptured; also the base of a pilaster, sculptured in relief, on the same scale as the drums." These sculptured drums are evidently portions of the thirty-six columns of the Temple which Pliny describes as calata, or "sculptured in relief." The largest of them, which weighs eleven tons and a quarter, bears on its least injured side a composition of six figures, three of which are supposed to represent Hermes, Victory, and either Hera or Demeter. A figure in Oriental trousers occurs on the fragment of another drum; on the pilaster is a female figure, clad in a talaric chiton, who appears to be struggling with Hercules. Part of another figure is seen on the return face of the pilaster, and above the sculpture on the block are the remains of a bead-and-reel moulding. The fragments do not suffice to settle the question as to what were the subjects chosen as the sculptural decorations on the thirty-six calata columns, but it is probable that the sculptors selected Asiatic myths connected with the early history of Ephesus—a Hittite element by the occurrence of the figure in Oriental dress. The sculptures on the largest drum appear to have been at least well calculated for their purpose of architectural decoration, and if each drum of the thirty-six calata columns was adorned with similar reliefs, each column being sixty feet high, a richness of effect must have been attained of which we have no other example in Greek architecture. Perhaps the Beautiful Gate of Herod's Temple at Jerusalem was a portico with decorations of this kind. Now that we know what Pliny meant by his colata columnæ, we are able to appreciate the sagacity of Professor Donaldson's conjecture that the outlines of these sculptured columns may be discerned in the representations of the Temple of Diana on certain Roman coins of the Imperial period. On those coins one of the fronts of the Temple is shown with an octostyle portico, and, on a close inspection of the columns, figures in relief are to be seen on their shafts, from their bases to about a third of their full height. It should be remarked that on those coins sculpture in the round is indicated in the pediments, and of this sculpture, which must have been on a colossal scale, we may expect to find fragments in situ.

Among the other architectural marbles sent home by Mr. Wood are two fine specimens of Ionic capitals, and a base, found in its original position with part of the lowest drum of a column still standing on it. There are also several fragments of columns on a smaller scale which must have belonged to the interior. We do not yet know enough of the plan of the Temple to decide whether these smaller pillars are to be reckoned among the 127 columns with which, according to Pliny, the Temple was adorned. Each of these, he says, was the gift of a King; and, in curious confirmation of this statement, the excavations have brought to light several fragments of inscriptions on the torus moulding round the bases of columns, which, in all probability, actually record dedications of such a nature. The architectural marbles present many other interesting features; some of the smaller fragments, for instance, retain traces of red colour, while the calcined surface of other marbles, and their charcoal smears, tell the sad story of some ancient conflagration in which probably perished the beautiful timber roof and the staircase cunningly wrought in vine-wood.

A survey of these fragments, taken in connexion with the narrative of Mr. Wood's operations already referred to, tells us just so much about the Temple as makes us eager for that fuller and more precise information which we can hope to obtain only when the mass of marble now cropping up everywhere under the alluvial deposit of the Cayster has been examined by intelligent eyes. Ionic architecture, which may be said to have been indigenous in Asia Minor, and to have been thence in all probability transplanted to Athens, attained its final development in the great Ephesian Temple—an edifice in which, as in the Mausoleum and the almost contemporary Temple of Minerva at Priene, we recognize, though only defaced and mutilated fragments can offer their evidence, that freshness and vigour in the execution, that versatility and felicity of adaptation in the application, which distinguished all Greek art in its best days, and still continued to be its characteristic as late as the reign of Alexander the Great, and perhaps up to the middle of his century. That is precisely the period when the history of Greek art, which we may still trace through a series of extant examples from the archaic period up to that point, breaks off abruptly, leaving a vast chasm between the reign of Alexander and the Augustan age.

Knowing as we now do something more than we did about the school of Scopas and his compeers, the next chapter in the history of ancient art should be the comparison of this school with that which immediately succeeded it, and of which Lysippus is the reputed founder and eponym; and it is on the site now being explored at Ephesus, more than perhaps on any other spot in the whole Hellenic world, that we are likely to find those missing links in the chain of evidence which Winckelmann sought for in vain in Roman galleries. Such an enterprise as Mr. Wood has undertaken ought, when once begun, to be carried out to its legitimate conclusion. Let us have, not a petty, partial, faint-hearted experiment, but a real, thorough exploration, carried out, as in former expeditions, with all the means and appliances which a liberal and enlightened Government has at its command. Otherwise envious foreigners may say that we had better have let the Temple sleep on beneath the twenty-feet-deep covering of alluvial soil in which the Cayster had entombed it.

MR. AYRTON AND DR. HOOKER.

A LEARNED Judge once likened a brother on the Bench who was remarkable for the rude energy with which he tore through his work to a rhinoceros in a sugar plantation. There would appear to be a good deal of the rhinoceros in Mr. Ayrton's style of doing business. From the glimpses we get of him in the course of the official controversies in which he is perpetually embroiled, he would seem to be always rushing about madly, tearing up the ground with his horn, dashing himself against trees and palisades, and occasionally by way of personal diversion ripping up some unfortunate man of art or science who has got in his way. In the last year or two we have had more than one opportunity of seeing the "noble savage" on the rampage, but the spectacle, though enlivening perhaps for those who like these exhibitions of wild fury, is not exactly a pleasant one. It is an unequal contest, to begin with. The victims chosen for attack have clearly no chance in an encounter with their hard-horned, pachydermatous assailant. They have feelings, and he has none. They are poor sensitive creatures who wince under any disparagement of their profession as much as under personal insult; and they are doubly outraged when their art and themselves are simultaneously degraded. It may be a nice question why architects, artists, and people of that sort should consider themselves gentlemen, and expect to be treated as such; but they have at least been accustomed to this treatment; and the first shock of being addressed in the fashion in which a "ganger" navvy usually communicates with his subordinates is apt to be too much for them. The Chief Commissioner is protected by the consciousness of his own moral superiority against whatever remonstrance or reprobation may be excited by his conduct. It is true his victims might meet him with his own weapons. They might address him in the same style as that in which he addresses others; but even if he were sensitive to this kind of retaliation, he is preserved from it by the self-respect of his antagonists. It would appear that Mr. Ayrton has made it his mission to put down artistic and scientific pretensions. He loses no opportunity of screwing, brow-beating, and bullying architects, painters, sculptors, and gardeners, and making them know their proper places. Last year he was running a-muck among the architects. Now it is the turn of the gardeners. A curious story is told in a memorial which has just been addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury complaining of the usage to which Dr. Hooker, the Director of Kew Gardens, has been subjected by Mr. Ayrton. It is possible that there may be some misapprehension as to the facts of the case, and official explanations, when we get them, may throw new light upon it. But the statements in the memorial appear to be based on official correspondence, and the names which are attached to it, including those of Sir Charles Lyell, Mr. Charles Darwin, Sir James Paget, Professors Huxley and Tyndall, and the Presidents of the Royal Institution, the College of Physicians, the College of Surgeons, and the Geographical and Linnean Societies, invest it with authority. We will endeavour to state as briefly as possible the substance of the complaints.

It is asserted that as soon as Mr. Ayrton found himself at the Board of Works one of his first official acts was to send a "reprimand" to Dr. Hooker. This was, as we can readily understand, "a new experience to the Director of Kew," after thirty years of public service; and it is alleged that the grounds of this reprimand were supplied entirely by the First Commissioner's own misconception. In 1871 Dr. Hooker was suspended in the control of the heating apparatus throughout the botanical establishments at Kew, which he had remodelled under the authority of a previous First Commissioner. No notice of this supersession was sent to him, no reason was assigned for it, and he was left to discover it accidentally from his subordinates. He wrote to the First Commissioner to ask whether it was true that he had been superseded, and was informed that it was true, and that he would have to "govern himself accordingly." It is asserted that the Curator of the Gardens has been removed from his duties under Dr. Hooker, and empowered in various ways to act independently, and that this step also was taken without any previous communication with the Director. Moreover plans and estimates have been submitted to the Treasury for considerable alterations in the Museum at Kew without consultation with, or notice to, the Director. These plans were however abandoned on reference to Mr. Stansfeld. Mr. Ayrton is accused of having tampered clandestinely with the loyalty of subordinate officials, and introduced into the management of the establishment a policy subversive of discipline and fraught with injury to the public service. He is said to have treated the Director with habitual, and it would appear studied, discourtesy, and to have done everything he could to make his position at Kew unendurable to a man of spirit and self-respect. Unable to obtain anything but fresh insults in reply to letters of inquiry addressed to the First Commissioner, Dr. Hooker turned to Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone referred the matter to Mr. Ayrton, and appears to have been satisfied with the explanations he received. On a subsequent application from Dr. Hooker, the subject was remitted to a Committee of the Cabinet, over which Lord Ripon presided. The Committee decided that Dr. Hooker was to be treated in all respects as the head of the botanical establishment at Kew, but "of course in subordination to the First Commissioner of Works." Dr. Hooker is naturally anxious to obtain a more distinct and definite interpretation of his duties; and he has applied to the Treasury to determine whether he is to have the control of the heating apparatus, and to be consulted with regard to the estimates and any proposed changes in the organization and management of the Gardens.

It can scarcely be necessary to remark that one story is good until another is told, and that the memorial gives us only one side of the controversy between the First Commissioner and Dr. Hooker. We have yet to learn what Mr. Ayrton has to say for himself, and it is possible that on some of the points which have been raised there is room for argument. But the argument must not be allowed to take too wide a range. Whether it is or is not desirable that Dr. Hooker should exercise supreme and undivided authority over the establishments at Kew is a question which may be conveniently postponed. The most serious part of the accusation against Mr. Ayrton is, as it seems to us, not that he superseded Dr. Hooker in some of the duties he had previously discharged as Director, but that he superseded him in a grossly offensive and insulting manner, without complaint and without notice, so that Dr. Hooker had not only no opportunity of justifying himself, but was left to discover his supersession casually from one of his own subordinates. We have here a simple question of fact, as to which there should be no beating about the bush. Either Dr. Hooker was superseded in the way he alleges or he was not. If he was not, he must be the victim of an extraordinary hallucination; if he was, there can be only one opinion as to the First Commissioner's conduct. It is incredible that the head of a great public department should be exposed to this kind of petty spitefulness and boorish insolence. We hope that Mr. Ayrton will be able to refute the charge, but it is impossible not to have a painful recollection of other incidents of a too similar kind which have distinguished his not very glorious career at the Board of Works. We have no desire to reopen the Barry controversy, but it will be remembered as a conspicuous example of our Edile's unhappy manners, or rather want of manners. There is a kind of surly gruffness which in the vulgar mind is apt to be associated with honesty, if not deemed an indispensable ingredient of it. Mr. Ayrton perhaps aspires to be known in history as "honest," and if rudeness and honesty are synonymous he may be acknowledged to have fairly earned the coveted appellation. It is obvious that a man must be of a very superior moral constitution to his fellows when he disdains the weak dissimulation of calling a vault a crypt, and exercises his ingenuity in inventing impertinent answers to the simplest questions which are addressed to him on matters of business in the House of Commons. When Mr. Ayrton entered on his present office he claimed the confidence of Parliament and of the public in his administration on the ground of his utter ignorance of art. His knowledge of botany is probably on a par with his knowledge of art, and we are ready to believe that in each case his native sagacity is equally unerring. It may be suggested that Mr. Ayrton perhaps pushes the converse of his pet theory a little too far. It is impossible to relieve Dr. Hooker from the imputation of possessing a profound knowledge of the science to which he and his father have devoted their lives and the greater part of their means. So far we are bound to admit the worst that Mr. Ayrton can urge against him. It is impossible to get over the damning evidence of such authorities as Sir Charles Lyell, Mr. Darwin, Professors Huxley and Tyndall, and the other memorialists, who do not attempt to deny that Dr. Hooker is "a man of whose scientific labours any nation might be proud, and whose natural capacity for the post he occupies has been developed by a culture unexampled in variety and extent." It is clear that on Mr. Ayrton's principle, Dr. Hooker is quite unfit to be entrusted with the management of botanical collections; he knows too much about them. Without disputing the soundness of the theory, it may be hinted that there are exceptions to every rule, and Dr. Hooker may be an exception to this one. There are, at least some facts to sustain this conjecture. Dr. Hooker and his father have managed Kew Gardens since they were first transferred to the nation in 1840; and it is admitted that they are now the finest establishment of the kind in existence. Kew has become not only a great nursery and museum, but a model school of universal horticulture. From Kew seeds and plants and skilled gardeners are distributed over the world. It is stated in the memorial that the present Director has to a great extent remodelled and reorganized the Gardens, at a great saving in outlay, without any sacrifice of efficiency. All this, however, has really nothing to do with Mr. Ayrton's alleged treatment of a responsible public officer. Dr. Hooker may or may not be fit to manage the collections at Kew. If he is not fit, he should at once be removed; but while he continues to hold office, and to bear the responsibilities of office, he is entitled to know what is being done in his own department, and to have an opportunity of expressing his opinion on the estimates and on any changes which may be in contemplation.

Should the statements in the memorial prove to be correct—and, as we have said, nothing can be easier than to ascertain this—it will be the duty of the House of Commons, if the Government declines to take the initiative, to make Mr. Ayrton understand in some very sharp and decisive manner that it is not part of the duty of a Parliamentary official to treat the permanent advisers of his department with "personal contumely" and studied insult, and to neutralize their efforts by intriguing against them behind their backs, and inciting their subordinates to disregard their authority. Every one must admire the indomitable austerity and persistent insolence of Mr. Ayrton's demeanour, on which the softening influences of official life have produced no effect whatever; but perhaps this kind of heroism would be more admirable elsewhere than on the Treasury bench.

AACHEN REVISITED.

THOROUGHLY to get up any city or district in its historical relations is rather a long business. We believe that, in order to be thoroughly master of any place, a fourfold process is needed. The traveller should first arm himself with a general knowledge of the history of the place and of all that is to be seen in it. He will thus be able to examine the objects themselves in an intelligent way, to understand their history and meaning, and to go through the process implied in the Aristotelian phrase of rovro iavrov. Then let him go home and study all his materials afresh by the light of the local knowledge which he has thus gained. The difference between reading the history of a place which we have seen and of one which we have not seen is simply infinite. When we read of spots, buildings, natural objects, which we have ourselves looked on and examined, the story gains a force and depth and meaning which makes all the difference between a living thing and a dead one. We feel at home in the place of which we are reading, and we feel as if the men of whom we read were our personal acquaintance. Then, lastly, having done this, it is well to see the place a second time by the light of the livelier knowledge thus gained. We are now in a position to correct any mistakes which we have made in our first visit, and generally to bring our book-learning and the evidence of our own eyes to illustrate and strengthen one another. Every place, every part of every place, should, whenever it may be done, be visited twice, even if the two visits happen with only a few hours' interval on the same day. There is something in the process of recollection, another form of the rovro iavrov process, which makes the impression far keener than if the object be looked at only once. Even if a man has only an hour to give to an object, he will learn more by giving it in the form of two distinct half-hours. But this work of re-visiting reaches its highest form when we come the second time charged with all the knowledge gained by a comparison of our earlier memories with the written history of the place.

Sometimes, again, a visit to one place makes it almost a duty to make a second visit to another place. Two or more places are often so closely connected that the history of the one is imperfect without the history of the other. The connexion may be of various kinds; the same great names may be common to both; the events which happened at one may have had a direct influence on the events which happened at the other; the two places may actually stand to one another either in the relation of sisters or in that of child and parent. Or again the connexion, though not so direct as this, may be none the less true and instructive. The two places may hold the same position in the history of their several countries or of the times when they were severally most famous; the comparison may be instructive through the likeness or the unlikeness of the two physical sites, or through the likeness or unlikeness of the buildings which have been raised upon them. In all these ways, whether by likeness or unlikeness, by direct cause and effect or by mere analogy, one place illustrates another, and the traveller is constantly led to form the fruitless wish that he could suddenly spirit himself away from one spot to another far distant. The architectural inquirer would be well pleased if he could place the apses of Köln and Amiens side by side. He would be still better pleased if he could fly suddenly from the banks of the Wear to the banks of the Arno, and see the glories of Northern and Southern Romanesque, Durham and Pisa, in successive hours. And he would be well pleased again on such a Utopian ramble if he could stop on the way by the banks of the Rhine, and compare the metropolitan church of Germany, the stately and varied forms of the great minster of Mainz, with the buildings on each side of it which have so much in common with it and yet so much that is unlike. Here the connexion is one only of analogy and of contrast. But when we stand in St. Mark's, while we look at the intermediate building, we feel that the survey is imperfect, because we cannot see at the same glance its parent church at Constantinople and its daughter church at Périgueux. In all these ways one spot illustrates another, and as, even in the days of electric telegraphs, the laws of time and space cannot wholly be got rid of, the best thing is to take every opportunity of seeing one of two places thus mutually connected with a mind still full of the memories of the other.

We have been led into this train of thought by a comparison of the feelings aroused by three visits, under three different sets of circumstances, to Aachen, the city of the Great Charles. To many travellers Aachen—Aiken, as our forefathers called it, with a nearer approach to the true speech of the country—and its minster will be their first German city and their first German church. There they may see for the first time on a gigantic scale the tall aisleless apse with windows of boundless height, which so clearly fences off the churches of Germany alike from the square ends of England and from the surrounding chapels of France. But setting aside this one feature, there is nothing about Aachen which specially connects it with German buildings rather than with the buildings of any other part of Christendom. It is rather one of a class belonging to no particular land, but scattered here and there through all lands. The round or octagonal church, very commonly with a choir added to the east and a tower added to the west—three things which can never be brought into real harmony with one another, but which from their very incongruity always produce a striking effect—is found scattered here and there from Jerusalem to Northampton, more common in some countries than in others, but everywhere rare enough for each particular example to have a sort of personal interest of its own. The Temple Church in London and the renowned St. Gerson at Köln are among the examples which will occur to every one; but the peculiar effect of Aachen is best realized on a far humbler scale in the church of St. John at Liège, which we spoke of in a former article, and in the church of St. Sepulchre at Northampton—we speak of this last as we knew it years ago; we believe that additions have lately been made to it. In all these three, without any kind of likeness in any other point, we find the three elements placed close together, but which no art can really fuse into one whole—the western tower, the central round, and the eastern choir. But the city which connects Aachen, and the church with which Aachen Minister really connect themselves are not to be looked for on either English or German soil. Aachen can never be so well understood as with the mind fresh from the memory of Jerusalem, and the Imperial Minister better takes its place in the general vision of things than look at it with a constant reference to its parent church of St. Vital.

The connexion between Ravenna and Aachen illustrates well nigh all those different forms of relation which, as we have said, bind one building or city to another. Among all the cities of the earth these two stand forth as the chosen homes of Teutonic dominion. To the student of the general history of our race no spots can speak like the city of Theodoric and the city of Charles. Each is, as it were, the crowning-place of one of the two great branches of our race, and we in our island cannot forget that the elder and the nobler of the two was the crowning-place of that branch whose kindred to ourselves was the nearer. We honour the Frank, we feel our common blood stirred by the vision of his greatness; but in the Goth we have our ten parts, as speaking that oldest form of the common tongue from which we have, after all, changed less than Frank, Swabian, or Bavarian. But the Goth ruling over Italy in a Roman city, according to Roman law, and the Frank translating the seat of the Roman power to a city of its own Northern land, alike set forth the twofold and mutual conquest—the way in which the Teuton bore rule over the Roman, and the way in which, in return, the Roman led captive his conqueror. The Goth who on Italian ground remained King only of his own people, and the Frank who on German ground reigned as Cæsar and Augustus, each played his part in the same great work. But they severally mark two stages of it. In the state of things under Theodoric we see the stage when the Roman and the Teutonic elements stood distinct and side by side. In the state of things under Charles we see the stage when the two were rapidly fusing together into a third different from either. But of these several stages, and of the work in which they were stages, Ravenna and Aachen stand out as representatives beyond all other cities of the earth. Nowhere else do we feel so thoroughly in the presence of the Teutonic lords of Rome, lords who were at once conquerors and disciples. In the local Rome the names even of Theodoric and Charles would be simply two in the long series of the mighty ones of history. And in the local Rome neither Theodoric nor Charles ever dwelled. To be its masters was their highest glory; they visited it as the venerable centre of their dominion; but it was not their home in life and their resting-place in death. For that and they chose Ravenna and Aachen; and as such Ravenna and Aachen stand together, apart from all other spots on earth, the cradles of the two mightiest forms that Teutonic dominion ever took.

As regards the buildings of the two cities, the connexion is of the closest possible kind. It is a connexion of cause and effect, and indeed of something closer still. The greatest building of Aachen is a direct copy of the greatest building of Ravenna, and for more than one building in Aachen Ravenna actually supplied the materials. The round of the Minster at Aachen beyond all doubt reproduces the round of St. Vital, and columns from Ravenna, though certainly not from St. Vital, were used to adorn the churches and palaces which Charles raised, both at Aachen and at Ingelheim. The letter is well known in which Pope Hadrian gives leave to the Frankish King and Roman Patriarch to remove columns and marbles from the palace of Ravenna, and there can be no doubt that some at least of the monoliths which adorn the dome at Aachen, which the eye now dimly sees through piles of scaffolding, were once among the enrichments of the fallen house of the great Goth. The man whom at Aachen we revere as a founder, we are tempted at Ravenna to curse as a destroyer; but the spoliation of Theodoric's palace has at least brought about what we might almost call a material identity between the two most famous spots in the transitional period of European history.

As regards the two men themselves, the Kings who each for a while raised his city to at least the second place on earth, their fate has in it a strange mixture of likeness and of unlikeness. The work of Theodoric died with him. No successor was found worthy to fill his place, and the very name of his kingdom and dynasty soon perished from among men. The power founded by Charles lived on in name within the memories of men now living, but it was but in name that it lived on, and the noblest part of his work has been just done over again before our eyes. As for the mortal remains of the men themselves, they have gone the way of the mortal remains of most of the mightiest men of the world's history. As we seek in vain for the dust of Harold at Waltham, or the dust of William at Caen, so we seek in vain for the dust of Theodoric in the resting-place reared on high beneath his own mighty monolith, and we seek no less in vain for the dust of Charles beneath the huge slab which bears his name within his own minster. Bigotry cast forth the bones of the barbarian and of the heretic; reverence removed the bones of the hero, the founder, the reputed saint, that his fragments might be exposed to the same degrading veneration as any stray relic to which fancy or legend might have attached a memorable name. In the view of what we venture to think a higher feeling of reverence, such is alike removed from his own place, such is alike cast forth from the sepulchre which he had himself wrought for his own resting-place.

As regards the present state of the two cities, no contrast can well be greater. At Ravenna we have no temptation to think of aught but the past, of those few wondrous ages of the past of which Ravenna has, as it were, the sole possession. The monuments of those times meet us at every step; tombs and churches, towers and palaces, such as no other spot on earth can show, are strewn, as by a magic hand, from one end of the city to the other, and there is hardly enough either of modern life or monuments of later times to disturb us in their contemplation. From Aachen, as from Ravenna, her dominion has passed away; she is no longer

Urbs Aquenens, urbs regalis,
Regni sedes principalis,
Summa regum curia;

but in the general aspect of the city the present has swept away the past. It is only while we keep within the shadow of his minster, or look on the one surviving fragment of domestic building which speaks of his age or of the age of his early successors, that we really feel that we are in the city of the Great Charles. Go where we will, there is nothing to set against that one city which seems preserved as a fossil fragment of a world which has passed away, of a world which in some sort had its own being within its walls. The true life of Ravenna has been kept safe and sound by its shiding death; at Aachen, as in a crowd of other places, the life of the past is well nigh choked by the continued or revived life of the present.

ACROBATS.

IF every other subject of legislation had been exhausted, if all the great and crying evils which afflict society had been set right, and the world made nearly perfect by Acts of Parliament, it might perhaps be worth while to think about passing the Acrobats Bill which Lord Buckhurst has just persuaded the House of Lords to read a second time. The Bill is to be sent to a Select Committee, and if there is a law lord on the Committee we shall possibly hear no more of it. A question has lately been raised as to what the country has a right to expect from ex-Lord Chancellors, and we should certainly say the country has a right to expect them to make short work of such Bills as this. It belongs to the category of impulsive legislation. Something occurs which strikes the fancy of an amiable legislator as very sad and shocking; he remarks himself, or he hears somebody else remark, that this sort of thing really ought not to be allowed; and forthwith he proceeds to bring in a Bill to put a stop to it. He does not pause to consider whether the object he has in view, however good in itself, is of sufficient importance to justify the interposition of the State in this solemn manner; whether it is an object which can be effectually attained by legislation, and in no other way; or whether the legislation he proposes may not do as much harm as good. After a few discussions he probably discovers that his Bill is either so loose and wide that the mischief aimed at is pretty certain to escape, or so close and stringent that a great deal more will be caught in the net than he intended, or than Parliament would permit; and so the pretty project is abandoned. The general purpose of Lord Buckhurst's Bill is very plausible. It can hardly be pretended that the performances of acrobats and gymnasts are essential to the moral or intellectual welfare of the nation. They too often appeal to a barbarous and brutal passion for thrilling sensations, and the exhibitions of Female Blondins and little children trundled on wheelbarrows on a high rope are not only revolting in themselves, but an outrage on public decency. On the other hand, it may be taken for granted that little boys are not trained to be acrobats without a good deal of suffering, and occasionally a bad accident, either at rehearsal or in their public displays. A number of juvenile acrobats are maimed while learning the art; now and then one is killed; and even when they have acquired sufficient dexterity to appear in public they are sometimes in peril of life and limb. It will be admitted that it would be in itself a good thing if children could be protected from this kind of danger. It may be said that if grown men and women choose to run the risk of breaking their own necks in gymnastic feats they have a right to do so, but that they have no right to imperil children who are not yet of an age to exercise their own judgment or free will in the matter. This is Lord Buckhurst's view. He proposes that children under sixteen years of age should not be allowed to take part in any gymnastic performance; and a fine not exceeding £1. is to be imposed on any person who hires out or derives a profit from a juvenile acrobat or gymnast, and on the owner of the hall where the young gymnast goes through his performances. Turning to the Interpretation Clause, we find that "gymnastic performance" is to be held to mean any gymnastic or acrobatic exercise or performance practised or given by way of trade and for the purpose of gain whereby the life, limb, or health of the person so engaged may be endangered or injuriously affected. It will be observed that a gymnastic performance is defined to be a gymnastic exercise, which reminds one of the famous definition of arch-diocesan functions; but no attempt is made to interpret "acrobatic." It is important to inquire whether a Bill thus worded would not apply to every kind of dangerous occupation, as for example to jockeys, stable-boys, ship-boys, and so on. In Webster's Dictionary acrobat is defined as one who moves high, one who practices high-vaulting, rope-dancing, &c.; and the sailor boy certainly moves high enough and practices dangerous feats on the ropes, and does this "by way of trade and for the purpose of gain."

In the debate on the Bill, those who supported it made good use of what they asserted to be the analogy of the Factory and Mining Acts. It was asked why protection should be afforded to children in mines and factories, and not to children employed as acrobats. One obvious reason why it is at least less necessary to protect young acrobats is that the latter are comparatively few in number. Assuming that the performances of the acrobats furnish the public with legitimate and innocent amusement, and that the only reason for suppressing them is the peril of life and limb to which the performers are themselves exposed, it can hardly be said that Lord Buckhurst made out a sufficient case for what the manager of a circus has called "this terrible and absurd Bill." Lord Buckhurst mentioned a recent instance of a boy of fourteen being killed by a fall from a high trapeze; but Lord Morley says the Home Office has made special inquiries on the subject, and that accidents of this kind are by no means so frequent as is supposed. Some of the feats of the acrobats are unquestionably dangerous, but it must be remembered that it is part of their business to make them appear more dangerous than they are. It will probably be found that their ordinary exercises are dangerous only in appearance, or at least infinitely less dangerous than riding a vicious horse or climbing the rigging of a ship in a high wind. If boys under sixteen are not to be allowed to engage in any dangerous occupation, there is as much reason to interfere in the case of stable-boys and ship-boys as in the case of acrobats. It was very proper that the barbarous practice of employing climbing-boys, who were sometimes burned or suffocated in the chimneys through which they had to pass, and whose health necessarily suffered from the bad air, the soot, and the painful contortions of climbing, should be put down; but no comparison can be drawn between climbing chimneys and going through the ordinary tricks of a young acrobat in the circus. It is part of the training of an acrobat to know how to fall when he misses his tip. An elderly gentleman who has taken his boys to see some ground and lofty tumbling no doubt thinks it dreadful that one should have to gain a living by apparently violent dislocations of his limbs, and would be horrified at the thought of his youngsters engaging in similar exercises. Yet it is doubtful whether there is not as much real peril in the playground, in the modern style of cricket, with cannon-ball bowling, or in foot-ball in the approved Rugby fashion, to say nothing of boating and hunting. Lord Buckhurst may perhaps not be aware that the effect of his Bill, if it became law, would be to put down gymnastic performances altogether. Everybody knows the difference between learning to ride as a boy and as a man; and the difficulty of acquiring the suppleness and confidence which are essential in acrobatic feats after the first period of boyhood is passed is said to be so great, that practically one can hope to be a skilful acrobat who has not been trained when very young. It cannot be pretended that ground and lofty tumbling is an indispensable element in our civilisation, and if it were to be immediately struck out of the list of popular amusements, we do not know that anybody would be much the worse for it, except the poor people who would thus be shut out from earning a living by their agility. But it is not desirable that the State should interfere with such matters except on very strong grounds, and with a distinct perception of all the consequences of legislation. We are afraid that the dangers of impulsive legislation are greater than those of acrobatic exercises.

It is to be hoped that the Select Committee on Lord Buckhurst's Bill will not fail to seek out and examine the boy to whom Lord Shaftesbury referred as a shocking example of the mental and moral consequences of gymnastic training. The lad, who had been sent to school after a course of acrobatic discipline, used—so Lord Shaftesbury assured the House of Lords—to rush away from his class and stand upon his head in a corner, and unless he was allowed to do this for three or four minutes he was perfectly unable to go through his lessons. Lord Shaftesbury's conscientious precision and literal accuracy of statement are so well known, we might say so notorious, that we do not for a moment question the truth of the story in any of its particulars. It is possible however that, if the boy could be got hold of, he might throw some light on the motive of his eccentric conduct. It might appear that it was the school lessons, the vexation of rule-of-three and the maddening influence of fractions, which led him to seek relief by stretching his legs in the air; or he may perhaps have found that he could in this attitude reflect more calmly and profitably on the knowledge he had just imbibed, and that he returned to his place refreshed and invigorated. We never had the advantage or disadvantage of acrobatic training in early life, but we can recollect at school having had at times a strong conviction that a little muscular relaxation would be an agreeable interlude in the course of lessons; and even in later life, at church and elsewhere, when suffering under a severe attack of verbose exhortation, we have been haunted by similar wild desires. The passion of Lord Shaftesbury's young friend for turning himself upside-down, and surveying life in a reversed attitude is certainly suggestive. It is possible that from this point of view some things in the world might seem less topsy-turvy than at present. It is getting to be understood in these days that all the old conventional points of view, especially in political and theological matters, are very misleading, and that the only way to secure a philosophical breadth of mind and emancipation from all prejudices is to change one's standpoint as often as possible. When Mr. Cowper-Temple calls out for more variety in religion, and Dean Stanley rushes about seeking all manner of strange pulpits to preach in, the Abbey and Prayer-Book being so stale to him now, they are perhaps only obeying a similar instinct to that which led the ragged schoolboy to stand on his head. There is no saying what good results might not be anticipated if the House of Commons could only be persuaded now and then to break off a heated discussion, and to look at the question before it calmly with its legs in the air. Mr. Sanger, the proprietor of a travelling circus, has undertaken, in a letter to the Times, to show that, instead of putting down acrobats, the State ought to foster and encourage them. Mr. Sanger does not go so far as to propose that acrobatic exercises should immediately be introduced into the public schools, or that chairs of gymnastics should be founded at the Universities. But he thinks "it would be well if the Government would appoint some person to inspect the entire business of the training of acrobats." So far from being painful or injurious, "the practice is more like the most genial recreation, and calculated to develop the symmetry and promote the growth of youth than anything else." And then he draws a melancholy picture of the desolation of England when all acrobats shall have been suppressed by morose and tyrannical legislation:—"No tight-rope dancer, no acrobat, no sprite for your Christmas pantomime, no harlequin whose quick and graceful point of the toe lends a charm to the whole body, no columbine who cuts eight and lends so much delight by her graceful and perpetual positions and dancing." The gaiety of at least one nation would be eclipsed, and life would offer nothing worth living for. This is a terrible picture, and it is impossible to contemplate it without emotion. Between these two extremes, Lord Buckhurst on the one side, and Mr. Sanger on the other, the common sense of the matter will be found. It may be desirable to prohibit very young children, say under eight or nine, from being engaged in public acrobatic performances, and some of the more dangerous and disgusting feats which are performed by adults as well as by youngsters might perhaps be put under an interdict. In any case the wire netting under the trapeze and other precautions might be made compulsory. But nothing can be more objectionable than rash, ill-considered legislation under the impulse of a passing sentiment, and without regard to the indirect consequences of the principle enforced.

ROMAN CATHOLIC PRISON CHAPLAINS.

THE International Prison Congress is greatly exercised about the moral reformation of prisoners. Indeed many of the speakers seem to consider this, rather than the prevention of crime, the main, if not the only, object of legal punishment. One enthusiastic lady orator, who is so zealous a champion of woman's rights that she indignantly protests against the most degraded of her sex being called "fallen women," broadly maintains that in every case "society, and not the criminal," is the real culprit; she never sees a prison van without comparing its unfortunate occupants to the discarded neckties which Beau Brummel's valet used to carry away from his master's dressing-room and called "our failures." "For she (Mrs. Howe) looked upon prisoners as the failures of the world, and as proving the want of social justice." We are not going now to discuss this somewhat sentimental view of the question, but it will be admitted on all hands that the moral treatment, especially of juvenile delinquents, is one important item of prison discipline; and accordingly it has always been thought necessary, as was expressly affirmed in an Act of Parliament of fifty years ago, to bring religious instruction and influence to bear upon prisoners. We are not surprised, therefore, that the duty of providing them with religious instruction according to their own belief should have been dwelt upon by one of the Belgian delegates, who objected that this principle was not adequately recognized in England. Nor can we think the answers given by Mr. Hastings and Sir John Pakington at all satisfactory. It is true, no doubt, that prisoners are allowed the services of ministers other than those of the Established Church, if they choose to demand them, and that, as both speakers rather oddly expressed it, "it is even open to magistrates of counties to appoint and pay Roman Catholic chaplains"; which, however, they often refuse to do. But this by no means proves that Roman Catholics have equally with Protestant prisoners "the full advantage of religious instruction from ministers of their own religion," and the contrary is notoriously the case. Sir John Pakington's plea is, in fact, precisely that which was urged two years ago by Mr. Newdegate when opposing Mr. Maguire's original motion for a Select Committee, and which was felt to be so utterly inadequate that the motion was carried by an overwhelming majority, and Mr. Bruce promised to introduce a Bill on the subject—a promise which he very characteristically fulfilled last year by first introducing and then withdrawing a Bill to remedy the existing grievance. It is hardly necessary to repeat here what we have often urged before now, and what experience has abundantly proved, that to leave the appointment of Roman Catholic chaplains to the option of the local magistrates is to leave the spiritual interests of the Catholic prisoners—which are in this case also the interests of society—at the mercy of a class of men far more open to the narrow influences of religious sectarianism than to broader considerations of humanity and justice. And when the object is to instruct and reclaim criminals, who may be reasonably assumed as a rule to "hate instruction," the absurdity of making the process dependent on their "requiring the attendance of a priest" must be conspicuous to all who do not at bottom hold, with Mr. Whalley, that Popish instruction is worse than none. They virtually admit as much when they tell us whether rightly or not we cannot say—that only four per cent of the Catholic prisoners do, under the existing system, "require" the services of a minister of their own persuasion. We doubt the accuracy of the statement, but if it is accurate, to make the worse for the system. And it must be borne in mind that, so long as of the obstacles often thrown in the way of the attendance of a Roman Catholic priest, there are very strong indirect inducements to Catholic prisoners who are not very keen about their own reformation to enter themselves as Protestants, if only to avoid being locked up in their cells during the Protestant service, which would otherwise be something of a relaxation to them. On every ground, therefore, of expediency and justice we hope that the Prison Ministers' Bill will not be again withdrawn this year by the Government, who are perfectly able to carry it through with half the trouble they have taken about many more ambitious measures of far less obvious utility.

Two petitions which have recently been published—one for and one against the Bill—very fairly gauge the true merits of the case. The latter, which has 476 signatures, and was presented by Mr. Kinnaird, professes to emanate from members of "the Evangelical Church, Nonconformists, and other inhabitants of Plymouth." It may seem hypercritical to take exception to the heading, but we must venture, at the risk of betraying profound ignorance of matters ecclesiastical, to confess our perplexity as to what is meant by members of "the Evangelical Church." Such is, we are aware, the proper and legal designation of the established Protestant Church of the German Empire, founded by the late King of Prussia from a fusion of the Lutheran and Calvinistic bodies, but we were not aware of any Dissenting sect in England having assumed the same name. And, moreover, as the Evangelical Church is here sharply distinguished from "Nonconformists" generally, we are almost left to infer that it is either a new designation of the Establishment, or a sobriquet for the Evangelical party; and in either case greater accuracy of definition would have been convenient. Passing over these preliminary difficulties, however, we come to the substance of the petition, which demands on ten separate grounds the rejection of the Prison Ministers' Bill, very incorrectly described in the preamble as a measure for "the establishment and endowment of Roman Catholicism." The petitioners, who describe themselves as penetrated with the "deepest shame, and grief, and alarm," at the bare prospect of such an enactment, object first to the title of the Bill, on the somewhat irrelevant ground that Roman Catholic priests "are not ordinarily called ministers"—a term which they will perhaps learn with still deeper shame is not unfrequently prostituted to this profane use in the rubrics of the Roman missal. Their second point, which alone even touches on the real issue, simply repeats Mr. Newdegate's and Sir John Pakington's illusory assertion that the measure is wholly unnecessary because at present the Romish prisoner can see his priest whenever he pleases—which is quite untrue practically—and the Justices can appoint a Romish chaplain whenever they please—which is true, only they usually do not please. On this item of their plea we should like to ask the petitioners one simple question. Would either of these concessions, insufficient as they are, have been allowed had the matter rested with them; and would a Roman Catholic chaplain be appointed in any single prison of which they had the control? Their remaining eight points contain just so many emphatic replies to this question. For if they mean a word of what they say, they would be committing a most terrible sin against God and man by sanctioning any appointment of the kind; in fact, they tell us plainly that it will be a duty rather to submit to persecution than to pay rates levied for so iniquitous a purpose. Their language has at least the merit of being tolerably explicit. We can only cull a few flowers of this pious rhetoric, which reminds us a little of the answer given, if we remember rightly, by the Church Association to the proposal that it should tackle Rationalist as well as Ritualist errors. It was necessary, they observed, to vindicate the Protestant character of the Church of England before its Christian character could be successfully maintained. The Plymouth petitioners have certainly established their Protestant orthodoxy, but on the Christian charity of their programme opinions may differ. Our readers shall judge for themselves.

They assure us that, as "lovers of God's Word, mindful of the labours and sufferings of Reformers, Covenanters, and Puritans," &c., they "do abhor the idea of setting up at the public cost Roman idols, superstitions, and falsehoods in this land"; and that the Bill, if passed, "would compel Bible-loving Protestants to become rebels against God, and help to draw down His most righteous indignation on the nation," by contributing to maintain "the blasphemous, Christ-dishonouring, soul-destroying imposture of the Romish mass." One might be tempted to ask whether it is not an equal hardship to conscientious Roman Catholics, if any such there be, to be compelled to contribute to the support of what they may perhaps consider, though they have not called it so, the blasphemous imposture of Protestant worship. But so far are these Plymouth petitioners from recognizing the analogy, that they offer the bold and felicitous suggestion of substituting for the proposed Bill a measure for laying a special tax "on those Churches which signalize themselves by an increase in the criminal population beyond their fair share"—evidently meaning the Church of Rome—in order, not to provide ministers of their own religion, but to "pay and reward ministers of whatsoever denomination" who will most effectively convert them to Protestantism. No doubt from their own point of view there is some reason for adopting such a course, for we are informed that it is now the duty of all Roman Catholic confessors "to inculcate on their penitents as morality those very habits and crimes which prisons in this country" (are theft and murder not punishable in other countries?) "are maintained, and magistrates are appointed to punish and correct."

And so successfully have they inculcated these vicious principles that "history shows the practice of confession to be detrimental to all true morality, injurious to the States where it prevailed, and ruinous to the souls of those addicted to it." It follows of course that the proposed measure would simply "provide a machinery for the manufacture of criminals," not to dwell further on the "terrible national sin" of "the establishment and endowment of the very worst and most Antichristian of all the Churches which call themselves after the name of Christ." On all which there is one obvious comment. If a fraction of this tremendous indictment is capable of proof, not only should no Bill for the appointment of Roman Catholic prison chaplains be passed, but no minister of that creed should ever be allowed to enter any of our prisons; it would indeed be a question fairly open to discussion whether their ministrations could be tolerated at all in the country. We should hardly tolerate the public preaching of Thuggism, and the cases would be strictly parallel.

If we turn from the pious declamation of Mr. Kinnaird's clients to the petition presented by the "Council of the Catholic Union of Great Britain," an institution with which we were not previously familiar, it is impossible not to be struck at once with a refreshing difference in the tone of the second document. Right or wrong, it contains a plain, commonsense statement of the case which is not written either with a "cursive" or a "cursing pen." The petitioners begin with observing that the present state of the law, which makes the appointment permissive, has resulted in great inequalities in the position and status of Roman Catholic ministers in different prisons, which seriously affect their opportunities of usefulness, and that thereby Catholic prisoners are often deprived, wholly or partially, of the only religious ministrations they can conscientiously accept. They add that these ministrations ought to be provided for all prisoners alike at the public cost; that it is highly inexpedient to leave it to the discretion of individual criminals—a plan, we may observe, which no one dreams of applying to the case of Protestant prisoners—whether they will invite the salutary offices of a minister of their own creed or not; and that it ought to be left with the minister to select the time and manner of offering his ministrations to the prisoners. And they point out in conclusion—what is distinctly proved by official statistics—that their views are confirmed by the experience of Government prisons, where the system proposed to be universally introduced has been in working for some years with the most satisfactory results. The case is really one which lies in a nutshell, and there is little or nothing to add to the statements of the Roman Catholic petition. Facts and common sense are all on one side; on the other side are such manumblings as those of the Plymouth Evangelicals about "idols," "superstitions," and "soul-destroying impostures," and the shocking criminality which is manufactured by auricular confession. But it does not therefore follow that a measure of demonstrated justice and expediency can be left to take care of itself. There are politicians of the screaming and "cursing" kind to be found even in the House of Commons, and we trust that both the Government and members of Parliament who have at heart the true interests of our criminal population, which are also the interests of the country, will exert themselves to prevent any further miscarriage of justice in a matter where opposing prejudice is as bitter as it is irrational.

MILITARY EDUCATION IN AUSTRIA.

THE solid military and general education given to officers in Prussia offers a strong contrast to the imperfect and somewhat superficial and unsystematic training of British officers. A country which does not practically recognize the fact that the career of arms must be developed into a scientific pursuit, in whatever may be the discipline, physical strength, courage and proficiency in drill of its soldiers, in considerable danger of undergoing the rude teaching of adversity. Prussia has taken the lead in the path of military progress, Russia is beginning to follow in its neighbour's footsteps, but Austria required the bitter lessons of the campaign of 1866 before it could be thoroughly convinced that a punctilious observance of the traditions of the past must be replaced by an earnest study of the lessons of the present, and an anxious forecast of the possible conditions of the future. In spite of military virtues of the highest rank, Austria has been more frequently beaten than any other great and powerful country; but, as far as can be judged, she will on any future occasion enter the arena of war with very fair chances of victory. In every possible way she has studied to perfect her military machine, and, convinced of her former defects, to ground her system on original principles. Her system of tactics, drill, organization, and promotion—all has been changed during the last five years, and she continues with admirable perseverance to occupy the stool of the learner. There is not a detail of her system but is carefully studied, and constantly improved; and in nothing are rulers take more pains than in developing the mind and increasing the professional knowledge of every officer and man in the army. In this respect we notice a superiority even to Prussia. In the latter country no trouble is spared to promote the professional and general training of officers; but the teaching of the non-commissioned officers and men is restricted to little more than instruction in mere drill, or at the most to its intelligent application on the battle-field. There are, it is true, regimental schools for non-commissioned officers and privates, but nothing save reading, writing, and arithmetic is taught in them. In Austria, on the contrary, equal attention is bestowed on the instruction of all ranks in every subject likely to increase their efficiency as soldiers.

The military educational establishments of Austria may be divided into three principal classes, with numerous subdivisions in each. These classes are, the military colleges, the regimental schools, and institutions for the professional training of officers. The first class is chiefly intended to provide for the sons of deserving or needy officers of the army, the cost of their education being either wholly or in part defrayed by the State. Pupils not included in this category are also admitted on full payment. This class is subdivided into two academies, and two colleges which serve as feeders to the former. The two academies are the Military Technical Academy, which furnishes officers for the Artillery, Engineers, and Pioneers, and the Military Academy, which provides a small proportion of the officers of the cavalry, pioneers, and infantry. The first is supplied by the best pupils of the Military Technical School; the remainder, if they have passed satisfactorily, entering the Artillery as non-commissioned officers, and being admitted to the Cadet School after one year's service. Those who have not passed satisfactorily enter the Artillery as privates. The feeder of the Military Academy is the Military College. Admission to the two academies is not limited to the pupils of the colleges, any one being admitted who can pass a good examination. Those who pass out successfully receive commissions as lieutenants; unsuccessful students enter the army as privates or non-commissioned officers; for every pupil is compelled to render military service, giving additional time, according to the category to which he belongs, proportionate to the period spent at the academy. Admission to the feeding colleges is obtained by production of a certificate of qualification from a lower Gymnasium or Polytechnic School, or by passing an entrance examination. The regimental schools are a special feature in the Austrian system, for by means of them the mass of the army, in some countries starved and robbed for the sake of special corps and departments, are trained. In each company, or similar unit, there is an elementary school for non-commissioned officers and rank and file. Attendance is compulsory, and lasts from the 1st of December to the end of May, during which time no manœuvres take place. Instruction is imparted by the captain, assisted by his subalterns, cadets, and qualified non-commissioned officers, and the course comprises orders and regulations, including military and civil law, drill, service in the field, and musketry. There are two classes, one for privates and another for non-commissioned officers and such privates as are selected for promotion. In the latter, in addition to the subjects above mentioned, instruction is given in army organization, writing, the first four rules of arithmetic, compilation of returns, and written reports and accounts. The whole company is also frequently practised in the bayonet exercise, jumping, climbing, running in heavy marching order, and gymnastics generally. The importance of thus developing individual intelligence—i.e. securing the individual efficiency of each man—cannot be overrated. Further, this great benefit results, that officers and men learn to know and respect each other thoroughly. The captain is not a mere portion of the regimental routine machinery, but a model for his men, their proved intellectual as well as military superior, the source from which they obtain all their knowledge. He learns each man's mental and moral characteristics, and is the head of a family rather than the mere leader of a body of armed men. Not only is he directed to further the acquisition of professional knowledge by his men, but he is also ordered to occupy himself with their moral education, and to inspire them with "an honourable feeling and true military spirit."

In addition to the company school, there are also regimental schools for training men selected for promotion to the rank of non-commissioned officer, who are not sufficiently proficient to enter the company school. The course lasts six months. The commanding officer selects for the post of instructor a specially qualified officer, who is assisted by a certain number of cadets and non-commissioned officers. The subjects of instruction are the same as those in the company school, with, in addition, dictation, reading, and arithmetic. A proportion of non-commissioned officers are also trained as accountants. Another regimental school is that in which infantry soldiers are trained as pioneers. In some of our battalions of Guards an informal institution of an analogous nature exists. The one-year volunteers are trained apart from the rest of the regiment, and receive a high professional education, including military topography, fortification, tactics, and military administration and organization, the object being to fit them for commissions in the Reserve. A regimental officer is appointed instructor, and in large garrisons there is but one class for all the regiments. Connected with the regiment is also a preparatory school, intended to qualify the pupils for admission to one of the cadet schools, the most customary channel to a commission. The colonel of each line regiment appoints a captain as commandant, and two subalterns as instructors; and the course resembles, but is higher than, that of the one-year volunteer, particular importance being attached to topography, mathematics, and field service. Soldiers from the cavalry and the military train desirous of going through the course are attached to the school of the nearest line regiment. Those who are reported to be "thoroughly qualified" are transferred to a cadet school. Those who are simply "qualified" must compete for admission at the entrance examination of that institution. The theoretical portion of the course lasts nine months, and two additional months are devoted to practical instruction.

There are thirteen infantry cadet schools, each of which is under the immediate command of the general of the district. The full course lasts two years. The cavalry can send pupils to the infantry schools, but the Artillery, Engineers, and Pioneers possess their own cadet schools, and in the Pioneers the course lasts four years. The staff for discipline and instruction is appointed by the general of the district, and selected partly from regimental, partly from staff officers. The pupils are furnished partly by the preparatory schools of regiments, partly by civilians who are obliged to pass an entrance examination. The latter can also compete for cadetships at the final examination without passing through the school. The education imparted at these cadet schools is of a very high order, far higher than that given by our garrison instructors. Among the subjects we find geometry, trigonometry, and general and military history. Particular attention is devoted to surveying, at which the pupils are expected to work sometimes as much as eleven hours a day. Practical instruction in outpost duty, gymnastics, and swimming is also imparted. The education at the cadet schools of the special or scientific corps is naturally of a higher order than that imparted at the line cadet schools.

We have thus far spoken of the system pursued in educating men with a view to their becoming eventually either officers, non-commissioned officers, or merely efficient private soldiers. We now come to the education of those who have already obtained commissions. As in Prussia so in Austria, there is no regular staff corps, and no college a certificate from which entitles the holder to employment on the staff. The staff is, however, as a rule, selected from those who have qualified at the war school. On leaving the latter they rejoin their regiments, and are appointed to and remain on the staff according to their aptitude and the exigencies of the service. On promotion they generally revert, at all events for a time, to regimental duty. The course lasts two years, and embraces all the higher branches of military study. All officers of three years' service, not above the rank of captain, are allowed to compete for admission. The inducement to enter is to be found in the fact that a lieutenant passing out with the certificate "excellent" is at once promoted to the rank of first lieutenant; officers of higher rank passing out with the certificate of "very good" are placed upon the roll for promotion out of turn. To our mind, however, the crown of this military education edifice is to be found in the system of instructive occupation for officers and cadets. This is afforded by means of lectures and conferences, reports on manœuvres, essays on tactical propositions, reconnaissances, fencing and target practice, and equitation. The commanding officer frames the programme, selects the officers to instruct and give lectures, and is expected, as a rule, to be present at the delivery of the latter. With few exceptions, attendance is compulsory on all officers and cadets, and, at the discretion of the colonel, some of the non-commissioned officers are also allowed to attend. The instruction is of the most practical nature, and, in the case of tactical propositions, the scene of imaginary operations is selected from well-known ground in the neighbourhood of the garrison. The best essays are forwarded, through the brigadier, to the general of division. In most infantry regiments there are moreover equitation classes, in which officers are taught to ride across country, and instructed in all that appertains to saddlery, shoeing, the care of horses, &c. The central infantry school is intended to fit officers for being promoted out of their turn. All captains must attend this instruction before they can be promoted, whether in or out of turn. In addition to the establishments we have mentioned, there are special schools for the various special branches of the service, but these call for no particular remark.

In reviewing the general system of military education in Austria, the chief point which attracts our attention is the trouble taken to educate in the duties of his profession every officer and man in the army. Not one is neglected, and every encouragement is offered to those who wish to qualify themselves for promotion. For each rank there is a special training, which is always eminently practical in its nature, and calculated to make efficient soldiers rather than mere theoretical and pedantic bookworms. Not, as with us, is a simple mechanical knowledge of routine duty considered, when combined with good conduct, a sufficient qualification for the non-commissioned officer who wishes to obtain a commission. In Austria the officer from the ranks can never be despised by his brother officers, for he is compelled to prove his right, as regards education, to be one of them; whereas with us there will, we fear, ere long be two classes of officers, one consisting of mere drill-sergeants, the other of those who, possessing more money than the latter, have received a better general education. It is too much to expect that these two will ever amalgamate. Austria teaches us also an important lesson with regard to the officer-ing of the auxiliary forces. We have already expressed our opinion about regimental schools; but that which we admire most of all is the system by which the professional training of officers is never allowed to slacken. With most of our officers duty and study are looked on as necessary but disagreeable interludes in their normal occupation, which is amusement. With Austrian officers their profession is the business of their lives, and pleasure is merely an occasional relaxation. Is there any hope that we shall ever witness a similar feeling in our army? Yet, if some radical reform as to the point of view from which the science of war is to be regarded does not soon take place, we shall be in a perilous position, our chances of success against a foreign army being at present as good as those of an amateur who contends with a professional billiard player. This indeed is the evil; at present the British officer is, as a rule, only an amateur.

THE ALBERT MEMORIAL.

WE shall not tarry long over the architecture of the Albert Memorial; for we neither desire the easy success of fulsome panegyric, nor the still easier labour of retailing Rotten Row criticism. No doubt the base is expansive compared with the superstructure. No doubt the flèche springs somewhat abruptly from the intersecting ridges. But, after all, what do the critics want? We must grant the conditions under which the Memorial came into existence—a limited area, sufficient height, and the sound principle that it should be monumental and not utilitarian. Similar conditions produced not many years since the York and the Nelson Columns, while earlier days gave birth to the more noble, but still conventional, Monument. Would the critics like to have had a fourth column or an obelisk? The battle-gauge of materials—gilding, enamel, spar, mosaic—as against the London climate is undoubtedly most risky; but when all the parties interested showed themselves willing, we are perfectly content on behalf of experimental art that the trial should have been made. It is only by adventure that the limits of London possibility can be defined, and in the meanwhile we who enjoy the freshness of the Memorial have one sparkling speck on which to rest our eyes. Consent to one such monument no more implies acquiescence in unlimited golden architecture than having served as Middlesex sheriff compels the citizen to the perpetual use of a red gown. The sculpture demands fuller and more distinctive notice, because it is more than accessory; it is well nigh chief. The Memorial is essentially personal; the central idea is the status of the Prince; the main purpose is to illustrate through sculpture the arts and the sciences to which he devoted a large portion of his life. For the first time architecture has to do suit and service to her younger sister sculpture, and herein is one of the characteristic differences between the Eleanor Crosses and the Albert Memorial—works which in motive are analogous. No less than two hundred figures in bronze or marble are here congregated—a number far in excess of any known precedent. The Mausoleum at Halicarnassus was not thus densely populated; the memorial recently set up in Worms to Luther, though directly personal and exclusively dependent on statues, has not one-tenth of the number of figures now unveiled at Kensington. But the general scheme is sufficiently logical to save this crowd from confusion. At four corners, immediately in front of the sustaining columns, are four groups, emblematic respectively of "Agriculture," "Manufacture," "Commerce," and "Engineering." Directly beneath, on the four sides of the podium, are 178 portrait figures, arranged after the manner of friezes or pannels, and designed to set forth the history of Poetry and Music, Painting, Architecture, and Sculpture. Lastly, at the four furthest points of the enclosure the composition is clinched by large groups emblematic of the four quarters of the world. Here the link of connexion with the Prince, who was not known as a great traveller or circumnavigator, is scarcely at first sight sufficiently obvious. It would appear, however, that International Exhibitions, of which the Prince was the inventor, are hereby symbolized. We are sorry to add that for a whole twelvemonth the Prince himself will be absent from his Memorial; Mr. Foley's statue is not ready for its pedestal.

We will begin with the four quarters of the globe, which, being stationed on the outworks, are the first to meet the eye. In the distance they present confused masses; nothing can be distinguished but four beasts, which have nought in common except that, while each presents his head to the spectator, all unanimously turn their tails upon the Prince. In point of art these ambitious groups are far from successful; the several compositions are complex, crowded, and confused. An analogous group—the Farnese Bull in the Naples Museum—is comparatively broad and simple, and the famous horses with attendant figures on the Quirinal, strongly pronounced against the sky, have just the force and decision which these latest and weakest products of the chisel lack. "Europe," by the late Mr. Macdowell, R.A., is not monumental at all; the style is that of the drawing-room, and the largeness of the scale is rendered valueless by the smallness of the treatment; yet the group is as pretty as alabaster figures under glass shades. Michael Angelo would have wrenched all the heads from the shoulders rather than have left the figures thus emaciated. "Asia," by Mr. Foley, R.A., is seated on an elephant; the whole group is allegorical. The young lady who enacts the character would appear to an ordinary spectator to be doffing her dress for a dip in the Tigris or the Ganges; but the Executive Committee explain on authority "that the action of removing the veil is an allusion to the important display of the products of Asia which was developed at the Great Exhibition of 1871." This is but one example among many of the absurdity into which allegory is pushed in these mutilated compositions. Mr. Foley's group has good points—the woman of India is a noble figure; but the composition is better in the parts than in the whole; it is not well kept together in the design; it cannot be looked at all round; indeed, what viewed from behind, the elephant might be mistaken for an Arab tent. Passing on to the middle-east group, "Africa," in the person of an Egyptian princess, mounted on a camel, comes in sight. On her right stands a Nubian, on her left is seated an African merchant. Mr. Theod has been at much pains to gain perspective, and his composition does not fall into disorder; yet finish and refinement are secured at the expense of force; the romantic classicism which is the bane of modern sculpture is the style here triumphant; a style fatal to original thought or manly execution. The last group, "America," by Mr. John Bell, the sculptor of the "Eagle Slayer," is at all events not wanting in power. A lion grand in head and mane, rushing onwards, has fire and movement. On either side the impersonations of the United States and of Canada have an air of command. The execution, which is somewhat hard and mechanical, does little justice to the conception. We need scarcely add that the four groups which collectively represent the round world and all that dwell therein have severely taxed the sculptors' energies. That the works produced are not in the large manner of Phidias is nothing more than might have been anticipated.

Leaving the outworks and approaching the monument itself, we examine within easy distance four more allegories; "Agriculture," a graceful group by Mr. Calder Marshall, R.A.; "Manufacture," by Mr. Weekes, R.A., not strong, though Hercules has apparently been called in to assist; "Commerce," by Mr. Thornycroft, careful and timid; and "Engineering," a science which Mr. Lawlor has managed to throw into rebellion against the sister art of architecture. Evident care is taken to bring these four groups into agreement with the adjacent columns and canopy, but the discrepancy of colour is too great to be overcome; nothing can reconcile the cold white marble of the statues with the warm enrichment of the architecture; and it is to be feared that coloured sculpture, as tried by the late Mr. Gibson, would have stood neither weather nor criticism. Again we have to object to the confusion and silliness which would seem inevitable in allegory; when "Agriculture" is permitted the attribute of a "steam-cylinder and chemical retort," she may easily be mistaken for "Engineering" with "steam-hammer and blast furnace." We have never found such mechanism lend itself kindly to sculpture; Mr. Crawford, the American, with the worst possible effect, put a cog-wheel within a pediment. Above these utilitarian arts are ranged about the canopy and the flèche the exact sciences—beginning with astronomy—modelled by Mr. Philip and Mr. Armistead; also the Christian virtues by Mr. Redfern; and finally, winged angels carry the composition into the upper sky. These abstractions, all clothed in bronze, have a symmetry of proportion suited to architectural service; here only is the statuary in absolute keeping with the architecture.

Having mounted the last flight of steps, we approach the alto-relievos, which, as four panoramas, decorate the four sides of the podium or base whereon the canopy rests. Two of these frieze-like spaces have, in the hands of Mr. J. B. Philip, been made to illustrate what may be termed the biographical history of "Architecture" and "Sculpture." Forty-four figures, including Cleopatra, Palladio, Wren, Pugin, and Mr. Gilbert Scott, are supposed to represent the epochs and styles of architecture; in like manner forty-three sculptors, comprising Phidias, Ghiberti, Michael Angelo, Palissy, Canova, Maximan, and Thorwaldsen may be said to do ample justice to sculpture. It has been supposed, not unnaturally, that in the arrangement of these and the two remaining compositions, Mr. Philip and Mr. Armistead have been indebted to Delaroche's "Hémicycle des Beaux Arts," just as all pictures of the Last Supper are usually said to owe much to the work of Leonardo in Milan. We incline to think, however, that the two sculptors have borrowed little or nothing from Delaroche but the first elementary idea. Mr. Philip, though giving small sign of originality and power, is not servile; he has thought out his theme with independence. Nowhere does the composition break down or fall asunder; these "Imaginary Conversations" are sustained throughout with ease and amenity, even though Torrigiano comes next to Michael Angelo whose nose he crushed, and Pugin is within arm's reach of Barry. Still it can hardly be said that the work rises above respectable mediocrity. The action is halting and lame, the grouping is both crowded and scattered, the execution inclines to be hard; and as to that most difficult problem, the management of relief, while some figures stick to the background as effigies, others start from the field of action as if about to break loose altogether and to disown their historic brethren.

The only reputation made by this Memorial is gained by Mr. Armistead. The two compartments committed to his charge, though not free from fault, are master-works. In the one dedicated to Poets and Musicians he secures an effective centre; Homer, lyre in hand, groups with Dante and Virgil, Shakespeare and Milton. The narrative is well sustained, the action is animated, and the treatment, with few exceptions, artistic. The difficult matter of drapery is settled by adroit compromises. Modern coats with buttons, knee-breeches, and buckled shoes are, for the sake of historic accuracy, closely transcribed; and yet, by the help of sweeping robes, forms obnoxious to the sculptor's art are disguised and adorned. Here and there, however, intrude dissonances in lines which imply either haste or inability to surmount the difficulties which these complex compositions perpetually involve. As to the treatment of relief, knowledge and skill are for the most part shown. In bas-reliefs, such as the Elgin frieze, profiles necessarily preponderate, which it will be easily understood are not favourable to a work which primarily is a transcript of portraits. The very large percentage of full faces out of a total of seventy-nine poets, musicians, and architects is almost beyond precedent in the sculptor's art. And yet, though the manner thus tends to the pictorial, we have seldom to object to that forced turn of the head and neck by which the spectator is saluted in Waterloo Banquets and similar portrait compositions. Indeed the treatment, with some obvious exceptions, inclines to the Greek rather than to the more pictorial manner of the Renaissance; the action, as in the Elgin frieze, is on one plane, or at most on two planes, and the accessories intruded are few. Thus the style is more cognate with the pediments of Phidias on the Parthenon than with the Baptistery gates of Ghiberti in Florence. On the side of defects must be mentioned the execution. The surface of the marble is frittered away by play of hand and flourish of chisel—a manipulation less in keeping with the breadth and repose of sculpture than with the dazzle of painting and the dexterity of etching. This mode of finish partakes of triviality; much to be preferred were the bold, broad blocking out of Michael Angelo.

The sculpture generally, especially in the large groups, suffers from not having been modelled for open air and sunlight. Our artists are so much accustomed to work for corridors, halls, or drawing-rooms, all under roof, that they are wholly put out when light is flooded down on all sides from the sky. We remember once in Paris to have realized how utter was the destruction to form and chiaroscuro when compositions which had looked well in studios were exhibited in a large uncovered area. The Greeks when they worked for the open air were concentrated in their high lights, strong and compact in their deep shadows; in modelling a brow, a mouth, or an eyelid, the lines were made sharp, decisive, and prominent, so as to catch light and throw shade. English sculptors in the groups before us are weak because they ignore these conditions of strength. We fear too that their labour is for a day and not for eternity; these works in marble and in metal will be wrecked by English weather. Our sculptors can show themselves pictorial, realistic, romantic, but not sculptural or architectonic. The Albert Memorial is beautiful in detail, but lays no claim to grandeur in the mass; it suffers by proximity to the Albert Hall; the Memorial is dwarfed into an art toy by its neighbour, the gigantic gasometer of science and musical sound.

THE THEATRES.

MISS BATEMAN is unrivalled in imprecation, and may justly claim the title of Queen of Scolds. Her curses are grand, powerful, and impressive, but they have, if we may venture so to say, a tendency to become tedious. The character of a woman with a grievance is hardly capable of indefinite repetition, and the favourite dramas of Miss Bateman contain absolutely nothing beyond her own parts that can excite the smallest interest. It is far from our intention to depreciate the merit of her performance, either in the well-known play of Leah or in the new play which has been constructed for her of Medea, and it would be very unfair to blame her because these plays contain only that one element of which she makes the most that can be made. Happily, when she has produced a sufficient sensation in London it will carry her round the world, and we shall only have to wish that cursing may be a favourite article in the dramatic market of all the countries she may visit before she returns to us again. It may perhaps be doubtful whether another drama of the same peculiar quality will be forthcoming. We are inclined to agree with Bob Acres, in the Rivals, that "dammes have had their day," and we fear that Miss Bateman's theatrical career is likely to terminate prematurely unless some entirely new form of blasphemy can be invented for her use. Her success is very like that of Mr. Irving in the Bells. According to the manager's advertisement, there was a "startling unanimity" among the critics in praising that performance. We fully admit that this praise was deserved, but the really startling thing would have been to find a human creature, critical or other, who desired to see the performance a second time. Happily there are many rich communities in which English actors may ply their calling, and if it is admitted that everybody ought to see a play once, the fortune of all concerned in it is tolerably well secured. Thus much we certainly can say on behalf both of Mr. Irving and Miss Bateman, that every intelligent frequenter of the drama should desire to see their performances, but in neither case should we expect that increase of appetite would grow by indulgence. As the Frenchman said of fox-hunting, "I have been." It would be incorrect to represent that the part of Medea is composed of unadulterated cursing; there are allusions to her poor feet, and other attempts to make pity alternate in the hearer's mind with horror; but probably even Miss Bateman's warmest admirers will hardly contend that her attempts in the pathetic line of business are successful. It is true that she sobs over her children until we wish that an incident of a well-known French play might be imitated by somebody throwing a pocket-handkerchief along with one of the bouquets that are showered down on her. Our meaning will be clear if we suppose this lady to attempt the part of Constance in King John. In some passages she would be grand:—

Oh that my tongue were in the thunder's mouth!
Then with a peal would I shake the world.

There is no modern actress to whom these lines are more appropriate. But there is another side to the character of Constance to which Miss Bateman would hardly render justice. When rage is merged in grief, as in the beautiful lines beginning

But now will canker sorrow eat my bud, we should dread that hardness of look and manner which seems inseparable from this lady's acting. If "windy inspiration of forced breath" could make a scene pathetic, then perhaps all London might weep over Medea's woes. But Miss Bateman seems neither to possess in this part of her business the ars celare artem, nor to be capable of that sensibility which brings nature to the aid of art, where art alone must almost inevitably fail. There have been many actresses who could feel the sorrow of Constance as that of a mother mourning for her own child, just as there have been many actors who could so transport themselves in imagination to the scene which they represented as actually to produce before their audience the agony of passionate lamentation in which Anthony kneels before the body of the murdered Caesar. An artist who adds to all the mechanical and physical resources of the stage this one quality of imagination leaves what we should call in schoolboy's phrase the "blubbing" business of Miss Bateman far behind. She is, however, unapproached in cursing, and perhaps may do as well by her peculiar talent as the Irishman who started in life with a rare faculty of personal vituperation.

The author of Medea tells us that he has drawn partly from French and partly from Greek sources, and that he has himself invented the scene in which Jason insists that Medea shall take her choice between the two children, while she demands both or neither. It is hardly a reproach to this author to say that he would probably be unequal to his task even if he had bestowed more pains upon it.

As one by one at dread Medea's strain
The sick'ning stars fade off the ethereal plain.

Thus did Pope write upon this theme; but even Pope wrote only two lines, which perhaps suggested to the manager of the Lyceum Theatre to turn down the gas while Miss Bateman utters her denunciation. But although Pope has no further shown the way, there are other guides whom the modern dramatist might find sufficient. An actress of more varied talent would desire to make the most of the pathetic side of Medea's situation, which has been skilfully elaborated by Ovid. An experienced reader of that poet can supply almost equally from memory or invention the sort of turns he gives to Medea's story. She asks where were the Gods when she and Jason put to sea and dared their vengeance, he for treason, and she for trusting to the traitor. The physician cannot heal herself, and she is sleepless who sealed the dragon's eyes. She quenched the fire which burned around the Golden Fleece, but she cannot quench the fire which burns within her own breast. Thus she enters on the subject of her wrongs, and she works herself into a sufficient passion before she leaves it. But still she expresses many emotions besides that of anger at Jason's treachery. Her mental retrospect of her forsaken home, and of crime committed when she left it, is one of the most effective touches of the picture. Her hand has done that which it dares not write. She deserves the death which she inflicted on her brother, and she desires only that Jason might share it with her. Although Ovid did not write plays, he is probably a better model for the modern dramatist than Euripides, whose treatment of this subject is rather didactic than sensational. The terrible Medea under his hand becomes, if we may so say, a trifle prosy. She delivers one or two speeches which would not be out of place at a congress of domestic philosophers among ourselves. But it is better that fire and fury should be mitigated by social science than not be mitigated at all. It is curious to notice how Euripides answers by anticipation Shakespeare. They say, remarks Medea, that the women lead a life free from risk at home while they, the men, are fighting with the spear; but they are much mistaken, for I would rather go thrice to battle than bear child once. We all remember that Katherine, after she has been tamed by Petruchio, expresses a view of married life exactly contrary to that which Medea propounds for the consideration of the Corinthian women. We do not recommend that Miss Bateman should spout a translation of Euripides, but it deserves notice that the classical Medea has teeth and claws, although she is not always saying that she knows how to use them. In this very speech from which we have quoted she comes effectually to the point at last. A woman, says she, is usually full of fear, and bad at quarrelling and fighting, but if her husband injures her there is not any creature more bloody-minded. Towards the end of the play she says that Jason may well call her lioness, since she has torn his heart. Yet when she is neither furious nor didactic she knows how to excite pity. She has determined to kill her children, and still she fondles them. "May you be happy," she says, "but there"—that is, in the other world. As regards this world, their father has destroyed their happiness. Looking at all this wealth of ancient material for his purpose, we should have thought that the modern dramatist might have done his work better; but still he might have done it worse. He is only glaringly absurd in one or two passages, and perhaps no author could have helped Miss Bateman more effectually to maintain her monopoly of malediction. Jason perhaps brags rather too much. He appears in effect that he cannot have too many enemies to kill, and a like noble appetite Expands a hero's heart when he would win.

One feels tempted to quote, by way of comment, "My great revenge has stomach for them all"; but these words would be perhaps more applicable to Medea, whom all the poets agree in representing as capable of marrying and murdering any number of husbands. Certainly if Jason had married Creusa, any jury would have found extenuating circumstances in his bigamy; and when Medea's children prefer their future stepmother to her, we should say that they showed a discretion beyond their years. A leopard, even if partially domesticated, is not an agreeable companion for life.

The retirement of Mr. Alfred Wigan deprives the stage of a finished artist whom people praised much more frequently than they want to see him. There have been few more melancholy spectacles on the modern stage than that of Mr. Wigan at the Gaiety Theatre playing in the audience which came to laugh at Mr. Toole. There could be no more conspicuous failure than the production of an abridgment of Vanbrugh's play, The Relapse, in which Mr. Wigan performed the celebrated part of Lord Foppington. Few persons saw this performance, and still fewer seemed to understand it. The small success of this experiment may perhaps have discouraged others of the same kind. It might have been expected that Mr. Wigan would have done more than he did towards the revival of comedies of the eighteenth century, in which his performance of Lord Foppington showed that he was eminently qualified to succeed. But in our time an artist of Mr. Wigan's reputation must have a theatre to himself, and if he does not succeed—as with high ability, unallied to a commercial instinct, is possible—it must be given up. Mr. Wigan's example will not, however, be wholly lost, as he expresses the hope that he and Mrs. Wigan may still do something for dramatic art. There is truly much to be done, and if Mr. Wigan can induce young actors to place before themselves his own high standard of perfection, he will redeem the promise of his farewell speech.

Mr. Fechter has lately returned with his old parts to the Princess's, and Mr. Bandmann with his one old part to the Queen's Theatre. We understand that Mr. Bandmann has made the dramatic tour round the world, and if he has been playing in Narcisse all the time, it is a pity that this able actor should have so little variety of experience. His difficulty perhaps is to find another play to suit his special talent. But whenever that play turns up, he will be provisioned for another voyage round the world. Of his repertory of characters is as limited as that of Miss Bateman, they are at any rate more agreeable.

NEWMARKET JULY MEETING.

AT the meeting of the Jockey Club held at Newmarket last week a somewhat unusual amount of business was transacted. Lord Calthorpe's proposal to impose a fine of ten sovereigns on any person altering the name of a horse after it has once run was rejected, and it must be admitted that such a proceeding would be very arbitrary. Surely people into whose possession such animals as Jennie's Bawbee, Snorter, Tickle Toby, Tails, Wiffey Waffey, and Holy Joe may happen to fall should be encouraged rather than thwarted in their attempt to discover more appropriate and euphonious names. Again, there are occasions when a new owner likes to get rid as far as he can of associations attaching to the previous history of a recent acquisition; and such a case occurred last week, when Faraday, under circumstances to which we will refer presently, was, with a touch of quiet and justifiable sarcasm, renamed Bank Note. Lord Calthorpe's second proposition met with ready acceptance. It contemplates the appointment of two or more deputy starters, who, while acting at various country meetings, shall still be at the call of the Jockey Club, and will in time have undergone sufficient official training to enable them to take the place, when necessary, of the present starter. The principle is excellent, and we fail to see why its application should not be extended to the case of the judge, who is not less mortal than his brother official, and whose place would be equally difficult to fill. Indeed, an inexperienced judge who attempted to fulfil his duties, especially on the Newmarket courses, would, we fancy, make a pretty mess of the business. A motion followed to secure increased accuracy in the registration of thoroughbred stock, and we rather regret that the resolution, as finally carried, leaves the matter at the option of breeders, instead of establishing a compulsory rule. It was more questionable policy to begin to tamper with the rules so recently and so deliberately fixed for the termination of the flat racing season. It is also difficult to believe in the existence of any reasonable human beings who can take a delight in a series of plating races in the dreary afternoons of the third week of November; but if such there be, we suppose we must not grudge them their pleasures. Naturally, however, the managers of the early Spring meetings will resent the favour shown to the managers of the late Autumn meetings, and will try hard next year to extort from the Jockey Club some similar leniency toward themselves. And nothing can so effectually impair the authority of any legislative body as a disposition to make laws one year and reverse or modify them the next.

The racing at Newmarket last week was hardly so good as in 1871; but then last year's July Meeting was about the most brilliant on record. The first event of importance was the Gladstour Stakes, which resulted in a match between Trombone and Lord of the Mines. The latter, who has won three times this year, was conceding 5 lbs., but Trombone, who at Ascot gave Prince Charlie some little trouble over a five-furlong course, and fairly distanced Siluria, had had the better public trial, and won—more easily than it appeared—by a neck from Lord Aylesford's horse. Six ran for the Filly Stakes, including the high-priced Windermere, bought last year at Doncaster for a thousand guineas, and the high-bred Albani, by Thormanby out of Catherine Hayea. The latter led nearly the whole way, but ran soft when challenged at the finish by Windermere, who won by a neck. There were eight runners for the race of the day—and the week—the July Stakes, but Somerset, Paladin, and Kaiser alone attracted attention, and beat the remainder of the field a long way. The performances of these three and the recent sale of the first named for the large sum of 2,800 guineas must be fresh in the recollection of our readers. Somerset fully atoned for his defeats at Stockbridge by running away from Kaiser, who seemed outpaced the whole way, and also by cleverly beating Paladin, who ran rather green, and will, like Kaiser, be better suited by a longer course. All the performances of Somerset, who is by The Duke out of a daughter of Oxford, seem, on the other hand, to show that he has inherited a fine turn of speed on his dam's side, which will render him very formidable over short courses. At Stockbridge over the T.Y.C. (six furlongs) Kaiser beat him by a length, but the next day over a five-furlong course he beat Mr. Saville's colt by half a length. And now, improved no doubt, and favoured by so exceptionally easy a course as the New T.Y.C., he won the odd game of the rubber and beat Kaiser by four lengths. Kaiser, however, was not persevered with at the finish. He looked the fittest of the three, and is a strong compact horse, but probably staying is more his forte than speed. Paladin, by Fitaroland out of Queen Bertha, is a finer-looking horse than Somerset, and won his first engagement at Ascot in a canter. In the July Stakes, however, he finished rather unkindly, and Somerset had the foot of him for the last two hundred yards. In the Middle Park Plate the pair will meet on different terms, and the longer course will also be a point in favour of Lord Falmouth's horse. The succeeding race furnished a striking example of the difficulty of judging on some of the Newmarket courses, for nine out of ten of those who were closest or directly opposite to the judge's chair thought that Visor had won and that Puritan was second; while, as it turned out, a third, Juliana, who was running wide on the left side of the course, was declared the winner by a head, a like distance separating Visor from Puritan. The rider of Visor evidently thought he had won the race safely enough, or he could have got a little more out of his horse.

On the second day there was an occurrence which caused some momentary excitement. Faraday, who was entered in a selling sweepstake, winner to be sold for a thousand pounds, won, and was duly claimed, according to the conditions, by Mr. Walker, who ran second with Jock of Oran. Hereupon the owner of Faraday refused to part with his horse unless the thousand pounds were paid down on the spot in hard cash. There was no apparent justification for such a demand, for these matters are usually settled by agents, not by the principals; and, further, by the 59th rule of racing the money for a claimed horse need not be paid until "ten o'clock at night on the day of the race." The Turf is by no means in a flourishing condition, and if the few men of wealth and position who still engage in racing are so mistrustful of one another as to refuse cheques, the end cannot be very far distant. Besides, if an owner does not like to part with his horses, what business has he to enter them in races the conditions of which may compel him to lose them? The remainder of the racing on this afternoon was of the quietest description; but the partiality of some horses for particular courses was exemplified by the victory of Lady Masham—for the third year in succession—in the Beaufort Stakes. She had seven opponents, including Flurry, Guadeloupe, and The Quail—the latter receiving 3 st. all but two pounds from Lady Masham for the year. The finish between Guadeloupe, The Quail, and Lady Masham was surprisingly close, and again the spectators, who confidently believed that The Quail had won by a neck or more, were corrected by the judge, who awarded the race to Lady Masham by a head, a similar distance separating the second from Guadeloupe.

Despite Cantinière's 7 lbs. penalty, only two, Cambusier and Visor, out of the forty-seven entries, ventured to oppose her for the Chesterfield Stakes, and, as there is no money in this race for the second horse, they might as well have remained at home, for Lord Ailsbury's filly galloped right away from them, and won by six lengths. It is a sad pity that this brilliant daughter of Stockwell should be a roarer, and we cannot therefore hope for her success as a three-year-old; but she is making the most of her present opportunities, and has many engagements yet to fulfil, at Goodwood, Newmarket, and Doncaster, some of which seem quite at her mercy, and will probably leave her at the end of the year at the head of the two-year-old winners. A good field of thirteen, including Bertram, Enfield, Glancus, Roma, Meteor, and Contraband, contested the Summer Stakes, won last year in such brilliant style by Sterling. Jack Spigot would also have been included among the starters, but fell lame while cantering down to the post. Another splendid finish between three must have been gratifying to the handicapper, and the uncertain Falkirk, Bertram, and Cranbrooke ran an extraordinarily close race home, Mr. Marry's horse winning by a head, and Cranbrooke finishing a head behind Bertram, whose luck this season has hardly been equal to his undoubted merits.

The principal event of the last day's racing was the signal defeat of the hitherto unbeaten Acropolis, whom previous victories at Chester and Epsom had made, presumably, next in order of merit among the two-year-olds to Cantinière. She found, however, the severe six furlongs to the end of the Banbury mile much more difficult to manage than the half-mile courses over which she has distinguished herself, and was so hopelessly beaten in the last quarter of a mile that Cannon did not attempt to persevere with her, and Victoria went on and won by ten lengths. At Epsom Acropolis gave Victoria 5 lbs. and beat her easily, but it is now pretty clear that she cannot stay, nor indeed would her breeding—by Citadel out of Cellina—suggest the probability of her being a stayer. Only Derwent opposed Corisande in the Queen's Plate, and Baron Rothschild's mare won as she pleased. The Newcastle Stakes fell to Glaucus, as last year, the easy new T.Y.C. being much more to the taste of a roarer than the last six furlongs of the Banbury mile, over which he was beaten by Falkirk the day before. Old Reindeer, after being beaten in a match by Ellesmere, took leave, it was understood, of the Turf. Though he never attained to high distinction, he has at various times carried off a fair amount of minor events, and he will be long remembered as a racing curiosity, and as the solitary example, in modern times, of a horse kept in training to such an advanced period of life. As a trial horse he has been found, we believe, for many years both useful and trusty; and altogether he may be said to have well deserved an asylum for the remainder of his days.

REVIEWS.

DE BETHENCOURT'S CONQUEST OF THE CANARY ISLANDS.*

IT would be in the last degree unjust if the mythical claims put forward by a certain class of patriotic advocates were allowed to disparage the substantial facts of maritime discovery due to the early enterprise of France. Whatever may become of the pretensions put forth with so much zeal and learning by M. d'Avezac and similar writers, it cannot be said that France has received anything like her full meed of glory for what her sons are proved to have done by way of exploration, apart from what may still lurk among the unexplored records of the past. A peculiar interest may therefore be said to attach to a work which stands midway between the pretended and the real achievements of French prowess at sea, preceding by thirteen years, if not more, the first expedition of Prince Henry, from which dates the fame of Portugal for exploration by sea. The earliest authenticated voyage of Frenchmen to any distance towards the South was that of De Bethencourt to the Canary Islands at the very beginning of the fifteenth century. Although not made into unexplored latitudes, this group of islands having for centuries had a place in poetic legend and in history, the record of this voyage has rightly been thought worthy of a place among the Hakluyt Society's publications. The narrative of the Siege de Bethencourt's expedition, written by his chaplains, Pierre Bontier and Jean le Verrier, and now appearing for the first time in an English dress, was brought to light out of the family archives after more than two centuries by Galien de Bethencourt, councillor of the Parliament of Rouen, and edited in Paris, 1630, by M. Hérre Bergeron, the original text being carefully reproduced in all its native simplicity and naïveté. Having become aware that M. E. Charton, in his Voyageurs anciens et modernes, had had the advantage of seeing an early MS. which had come by family descent into the hands of Madame de Mont Ruffet, Mr. Major was able to secure, from the friendly and ungrudging hands of M. d'Avezac, the veteran savant, whom he justly terms the Humboldt of France, a collation of the entire MS. with Bergeron's text. A careful bibliographical notice from the pen of M. d'Avezac makes it highly probable that this manuscript, written in 1482 or thereabouts, was the first fair transcript from the original rough draft of Bethencourt's chaplains. The present edition has thus been the means of bringing back the text to the strictest possible degree of authenticity and correctness, and it is given at the foot of the page, below Mr. Major's English version. From the handsome copy of Bergeron's edition, lent by Sir David Dundas, has been derived the portrait of Bethencourt himself, which forms the frontispiece to the volume before us. The urns of the adventurous old voyager, an ape or baboon grimacing, borne upon a shield between two natives of the Canaries, have been photographed from the MS. in the possession of Madame de Mont Ruffet.

The physical aspects of the Canaries have been made familiar to us by the Personal Narrative of Humboldt, and the ethnography of the islands has been treated by Blumenbach and Prichard as fully as the materials available for the subject admit. There can be little doubt on the part of the physical geographer in referring this island group to the Atlas series of African highlands, forming as it does a western prolongation of that chain, severed, it may be plausibly conceived, at no remote period of geological time by the subsidence of the intervening portion of the continent. On the other hand, whatever may be the force assigned to the legendary analogies of "Atlantic" points of analogy and resemblance have been established between the volcanic structure of the Canaries, notably that of the Peak, and the western range of Quilo and Peru, to satisfy us as to a geological affinity superficially concealed by the waters of the Atlantic. Points of this kind were obviously beyond the ken of the observant chroniclers of Bethencourt's settlement. Nor did their knowledge of the distinctions of race sufficiently avail to suggest anything of the connexion which later ethnographers have traced between the islanders and the natives of the mainland. The two fathers were nevertheless precise enough in their observations of persons and manners, of peculiarities of language and of the mummied remains of the dead, to make it clear that at that time the Archipelago was peopled by two distinct races, the Berbers and the Arabs. The Arab tribes, which were in the minority in the western islands, had obtained the superiority in numbers and in political rule in those towards the east. The chaplains describe the natives of Lancerote and Fuerteventura as tall, those of Great Canary and of Palma as of middle stature. The people of Gomera and Ferro are described by Galindo as small, while the mummies of the Guanches of Tenerife show no superiority in height. The natives of Lancerote and Fuerteventura had very brown complexions, while in Canary, Tenerife, Gomera, Palma, and Ferro fair, or even blond, skins prevailed. In Lancerote, and perhaps in Fuerteventura, polyandry existed, many a woman having three husbands, while in the other islands monogamy was strictly maintained by law. The burial customs in each group showed no less distinctive marks of origin, corresponding to which were differences in the form of government. In the east despotism and hereditary right, without distinction of sex, prevailed. In the west women were rigidly shut out from rule, which took the form of family and hereditary privilege, subject to a tribal right, the territory of the tribe forming a sort of common patrimony, of which each member, not unlike the ryot in Bengal, cultivated his own lot, and enjoyed the proceeds, the administration of the whole belonging to the headman or chief.

To go into the question whether the introduction of these races was prior to the possible isolation of their present seats from the mainland, or was effected, as in many well-known cases, by canoes blown off from shore, would carry us beyond the point to which history or scientific knowledge avail us. As early as Homeric times, at least there was the popular idea of the "island of the blest" somewhere towards the setting sun, founded, as Strabo thought most probable, upon the reports of Phœnician voyagers along the coast of Africa and South-west Europe. The glowing accounts of the fertility of these islands, the purity of the air, and the happiness of the people, within historic times, inspired Sertorius, as we learn from Plutarch, with the romantic desire to seek there repose from the strife and turmoil of the world. The two islands mentioned in this curious story were probably Lancerote and Fuerteventura. In the vague itinerary drawn up by Statius Sebosus from the reports of navigators of the time, and preserved by the elder Pliny, five islands under distinct names make up the group of Hesperides. Still more distinct is Pliny's summary of King Juba's narrative, which enables us to identify the foremost of the Insulæ Fortunatæ with the principal islands of the Canary group. For thirteen centuries or more after this nothing has been recovered from history beyond the fact of a vague knowledge current among the Moors of Spain of what were named the islands of Khaledat. These various and scattered threads of tradition and history are woven in Mr. Major's introduction into as connected a form as possible, and carried on into the more authentic age of Portuguese exploration. Among the many notices which his unsparing research has brought together, the newest and most original is that for which we are indebted in the first instance to Boccaccio, and in the second to the industry of Signor Sebastiano Ciampi, by whom Boccaccio's narrative was first brought to light in 1827. It was derived from letters written to Florence by certain Florentine merchants established at Seville in December 1341. In July of that year two vessels had been sent by Don Luis, King of Portugal, armed and equipped for the conquest of the Canaries. The expedition proved abortive, yielding little by way of spoil beyond a stone statue of a man wearing an apron of palm-leaves and carrying a ball in his hand, which the sailors carried away to Lisbon. In 1382 the Spanish captain Francisco Lopes was wrecked at the mouth of the Guiniguada in the Great Canary, where he, with twelve companions, passed seven years peacefully among the natives; but, some mistrust arising between them and their hosts, the Spaniards were put to death. The Canaries were exposed from time to time to frequent ravages from corsairs and adventurers of all kinds. An official document found in the Recueil by M. d'Avezac, embodying the results of inquiries set on foot in 1476 by Queen Isabella of Castile as to the respective rights of pretenders to the possession of the Canaries, declares it to have been from two French adventurers who had made incursions there in company with Alonso Bexerra, a Spaniard, that Bethencourt derived the information which prompted him to the conquest of the islands. This fine old Norman gentleman was of ancient and noble lineage, lord of Granville-le-Teinturier, in the Pais de Caux, and baron in right of his castle of St. Martin-le-Gaillard in the Comté d'Eu, which was taken and retaken several times in the wars with England, its final siege and ruin taking place, writes Monstrelet, in 1419. The history of the family was written with care by Bergeron, and followed up by the antiquarian labours of a recent Norman antiquary, the Abbé Godeau, the only man of his age to show much interest in the past history of the conquest of the Canaries. Of the manner in which the islands were discovered in 1425 while preparing for a further visit to his seat of government, only the most and a vestige or two of masonry remain, nor in the church where he was buried in front of the high altar was any memorial to be found until the pious Abbé erected in 1831 a black marble slab bearing his name.

* The Manuscrits de la Bibliothèque de la Ville de Paris, t. 1, p. 100. Composed by Pierre Bontier and Jean le Verrier. Translated and Edited by the Hakluyt Society. London: H. K. Lewis, 1872.

In the narrative of the adventures of Mœsire Jean de Bethencourt, there is much quaint and picturesque beauty. The simple style of the good friars recalls the pure old French of Froissart or Monstrelet. The title of their book, Le Conquerant, has been rightly restored by the present editor from the text of that drawn up by Galien de Bethencourt in his MS. of 1625, in accordance with the intention of the writers. Eyewitnesses of their master's prowess and wisdom, as well as sharers in his privations, in company with his able lieutenant Gadifer de la Salle, the chaplains give a graphic picture of the islands and their people, with their own progress towards their conversion, including a summary of the faith drawn up expressly for the use of native catechumens. It is sad to think that this simple and interesting race was all but wholly swept away within a century of that date by the deadly disease called the modorra. During the second visit of Bethencourt the "Saracen" King of Lancerote came to be baptized, receiving the name of Alphonso, followed by all his people. The two native Kings of Fuerteventura had already embraced Christianity. But by this time the virtual sovereignty of the islands had been conferred upon Bethencourt by the submission of chiefs and people, his title thereto being recognized on his doing homage to the King of Castile. In his attack upon the Grand Canary he had less success, being repulsed from the shore with the loss of two-and-twenty knights and men. The remaining islands were reduced by him to a state of order and administration, which his chaplains chronicle with infinite praise. In the hope of retaining the island sovereignty in his family for ever, he established his nephew, Maciot de Bethencourt, having no son of his own, in all his rights and dignities. He sailed for Spain in the winter of 1405, and was graciously received by the King, with whose letters commendatory he sought the blessing of the Pope, and obtained from his Holiness a bishop for the Canaries, Albert de las Casas. On his travels he was generally hailed as King of Canary. The later fortunes of the islands on their sale by Maciot, to the time of their finally passing in 1749, after much contention with Portugal, under the sway of Spain, are briefly but clearly traced by Mr. Major, who deserves our thanks for the light he has thrown upon a little known page in the history of maritime enterprise.

AMOS ON JURISPRUDENCE.*

THE systematic study of law is still upon its trial in this country, where the typical barrister is at no pains to conceal his contempt for theory in general and for professors in particular. It was therefore with some anxiety that we opened a new book upon jurisprudence by a professor of the science. Mr. Amos's work will however, we imagine, do little either to popularize or to retard the study of theoretical law, in the history of which its appearance will certainly not mark an epoch. What Mr. Austin did forty years ago was really a great achievement. Equipped merely with the philosophy of Bentham, with a few chance remarks of writers like Hobbes and Locke, and a somewhat superficial acquaintance with the German civilians, he resolutely thought out for himself a logical system which, in spite of gaps and roughnesses of execution, must ever have a permanent value. He determined, in many respects once for all, the "Province of Jurisprudence." With a firm hand he mapped out its boundaries; and, regardless of strangeness of diction or repetition of argument, he elaborated to over-elaboration certain portions of its contents. The limits of the subject having been thus trenchantly drawn by a thinker whose infinite faculty of taking pains approached, as nearly as such a faculty ever can, to genius, it remained for his successors to cultivate methodically and in detail the field which he had enclosed. After the Province of Jurisprudence, the next desideratum was undoubtedly a "Systematic View" of the science; and with this Mr. Amos undertakes to present us. We cannot say that we think the undertaking has been successful, or that Mr. Amos displays those qualities which are essential to success in such a work. To write a systematic view of anything, it is necessary that the writer should possess a systematic mind, and a power of severely restraining it from wandering into irrelevant topics. Such a power of self-restraint is conspicuously absent from the volume before us, more than one-fourth of which is occupied by chapters upon Public and Private International Law, and upon other matters which have but a faint connexion with the main subject of the work. It was doubtless necessary to explain clearly what is meant by international law, but observations upon the Treaty of Paris, the possibility of arbitration, the Geneva Convention, the effect of modern improvements in warfare, the disabilities of women, the exercise of the prerogative of pardon by the Home Secretary, and the French verdict of extenuating circumstances, have hardly a conceivable place in a Systematic View of Jurisprudence.

The surplusage of a few decaltery chapters might however be pardoned if the main body of the book were sound and satisfactory. But what shall we say of a jurist who arranges his subject under the following heads?—(1) Constitutional Law; (2) Ownership; (3) Contracts; (4) Special Classes of Persons; (5) Civil Injuries and Crimes; (6) Procedure. It is true that most of these topics are entitled to separate consideration; but thus to coordinate them is about as logical a proceeding as to divide animals into quadrupeds, horses, men, ponies, and guinea-pigs. Yet this fortuitous scheme of distribution rules the whole book, and necessarily disfigures it. The systematizer who sets to work without having familiarized himself with the use of dichotomous division is doomed to failure. It is impossible to map out a subject logically by selecting first any portion of it which may seem to be susceptible of separate treatment, and then another, and another, till no further group is distinguishable unless it be of a residuary and miscellaneous nature. But apart from the manner in which the distribution of the science is executed, the basis upon which the distribution rests is most unsatisfactory. It is, we are told, "the quality of the acts which the laws affect to control"; or, as we are elsewhere informed, "the social and political purposes for the accomplishment of which the different classes of laws composing a legal system have come into being, and to subserve which they continue to exist, or are from time to time consciously amended." It is not easy to see how these statements are consistent with one another, or to deduce from either of them Mr. Amos's sixfold division of his subject. And it is not a little wonderful that Mr. Amos should deliberately prefer to build upon the shifting "quality of acts," or the "social and political purposes of laws," rather than upon the solid and tried foundation of Rights or Duties. Inconsistent however even in his inconsistency, when he proceeds from the main to the subordinate divisions of law he deserts the test of the "quality of acts," and adopts what he calls "a technical basis, consisting of Rights and Duties conjointly." And it may be remarked that even here Rights and Duties are constantly shifting their places. "In some departments of the system Rights will take the lead, in others Duties." So entire an absence of method is of course fatal to the value of the work as a system. Upon detached points, however, Mr. Amos is frequently unobjectionable, and occasionally instructive, though beset by an ill-suppressed tendency to talk social science rather than law. Adopting the Professor's own order, let us see how he treats of the several topics into which he divides his subject.

What is said of "Constitutional Law" calls for little remark, except that one misses in it any disquisition upon the vexed question whether the State can be said to have any rights against its subjects, and whether, consequently, the duties of the subject to the State are relative to such rights, or are, as some will have them to be, "absolute"; and that here, as elsewhere, several pages containing mere descriptions of the positions which certain topics should occupy in a body of law, strike one as having accidentally strayed into a treatise on Jurisprudence from some sketch of the arrangement of a code. Under the head of "Ownership" we find much more startling matter. Upon many questions in jurisprudence it is open to the jurist to take which of two contradictory views he may choose; but in identifying "Ownership" with jus in rem (which, by the by, he seems to take for a term of Roman law) Mr. Amos is guilty of something far worse than heresy—he makes a serious mistake. The confusion becomes still more astounding when he proceeds to divide ownership into dominium, which is really the Latin equivalent for ownership, and usufruct, possession, &c., where the characteristic fact is that the usufructuary, possessor, &c., is not the owner. It will scarcely be credited that the rights of carriers are here treated as a branch of the law of ownership. While Mr. Amos has so very imperfectly grasped the significance of the terms with which he deals, he goes out of his way to tell us, as if enunciating a universally received axiom, that "it is only at the last climax of civilization that the truth begins to be apprehended that the only justification of proprietary claim is a special call to a more devoted and concentrated service on behalf of those who do not share in it."

The chapter on "Contracts" is the best in the book. Parts of it indeed are admirably done. Mr. Amos uses the term in its narrower sense, as equivalent to what Savigny calls the "obligatory" contract; and he is perhaps right in so doing, especially as his illustrations were to be drawn from English law, to which the wider sense is almost unknown. He has avoided Blackstone's mistake of treating contract as little more than an incident of the acquisition of ownership, but he is quite wrong in attributing this mistake to "the artificial and accidental division of the Institutes of Gaius and Justinian." Mr. Amos must know that in those treatises the topics of acquisition and of contract are kept as wide apart as possible. The topic of "Marriage" is discussed very sensibly, assuming always that it ought to be considered as a contract at all, in the narrower sense of the term.

If the treatment of contract leaves little to be desired as far as it goes, that of the "law affecting particular persons" appears to us to be highly misleading. It is true that while Mr. Amos follows Austin in postponing the "law of persons" to the "law of things," which is practically the whole law less the law which deals with peculiarities of personality, and states the reasons for so doing with much perspicuity, he has the courage to reject Austin's eccentric and inconvenient deduction of the whole of public law from the law of persons; but then he mixes up this topic incessantly with what is really a very different one—the law of Family. The legitimate subject of the law of persons is the variety introduced by differences of personality into the various possible legal relationships; which may, however, exist without such differences. Those varieties in personality which are themselves of the essence of legal relationships are the proper matter of what the Germans call Family-law. Under the head of "Special Personality" Mr. Amos introduces barristers and attorneys, who are no more entitled to such a position than auctioneers are, and takes the opportunity of indulging in a page of un-called-for observations upon the relative status of the two branches of the legal profession; telling us, for instance, how "It is worse than detrimental—it is destructive—to the morality and to the honest aspirations of a great profession, for the State to apportion a different meed of social dignity and appreciation to functionaries of one class from what it apportions to those of another." Corporate bodies "for municipal, ecclesiastical, educational, and eleemosynary purposes," are naturally grouped together as a head of special personality; but Mr. Amos curiously enough does not see that their claim to such treatment rests, not upon the public functions which they discharge, but upon their artificial personality; a reason which should bring companies and commercial corporations of all kinds equally into the class from which they are expressly, though unaccountably, excluded.

* A Systematic View of the Science of Jurisprudence. By Stephen Amos, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law; Reader of Jurisprudence, University College, London; Tutor to the Inner Temple in Jurisprudence, Civil Law, and International Law. London: Longmans & Co. 1872.

The very title of the chapter on "Laws of Civil Injuries and Crimes" prepares one for a confusion between the boundaries of these two conceptions. Here again Mr. Amos errs from perversity. Knowing, but rejecting, the cardinal distinction between public and private law, law treating of the constitution of the State, and its relations to its subjects, and law treating of the relations of those subjects one to another, he is of course blind to the difference between offences against the State and against the individual. This chapter is also disfigured by the natural results of the principle avowed by the author, that some kinds of rights are best discussed as such, while others should only be treated upon the supposition that they have been infringed. He does not, in fact, appreciate the salutary distinction drawn by Austin between rights primary, which are given for their own sakes, and rights sanctioning, which are given merely by way of compensation when the former are violated. The chapter on "Procedure" would be wholly praiseworthy did it not towards the end display that tendency to irrelevancy which, as we have already stated, runs riot in the chapters upon International law and things in general which occupy the remainder of the work.

While turning over the pages of the Systematic View we have encountered sundry references to Roman law, of a sort which fails to inspire us with much confidence in the author's attainments in that direction. Posseio naturalis is not, as it is stated to be, physical contact; a pupil did not stipulate as agent for his tutor, nor were women, as seems to be implied, under tutelage in the later Roman law; no civilian would employ the here constantly recurring phrase, "patria auctoritas"; nor would a scholar of sensitive ear misquote the well-known couplet on the cause of the multiplicity of laws, so as to make it end "crescit in orbe scelus." While, however, we have freely criticized Mr. Amos's book, we are not unmindful of its merits. The author has a true and clear conception of the nature of jurisprudence, or he would not have so happily described it as the "skeleton grammar of law." Another creditable feature of the book is that it is continuous. It has a plan, though one which appears to us to be very objectionable, and it is in obedience to this plan that what with most jurists is the all-important topic of "Rights" is dismissed in a couple of pages; a reason which, however, will hardly account for the extremely brief notice accorded by Mr. Amos to the difficult and interesting subject of "custom" as a source of law.

The author's style is easy and agreeable, though this is not quite an unmixed advantage. It is true that where Austin halts or retraces his steps, Mr. Amos moves smoothly forward, skating over dangerous places in such a way as, one knows not whether by skill or by good fortune, to escape a serious fall. But this sort of writing upon an abstruse subject, though superficially pleasant, is not ultimately satisfactory. In the work before us we find much literary adroitness, many reflections of the light and shade of modern controversy, many allusions to the views of the great teachers of the science; but all is provokingly vague. Hypothesis blends with history. Throughout the volume there is not a single reference to authorities. Upon the whole, we shall be surprised if "the keen-minded members of the author's successive classes" are at all eager to accept the "share in the responsibility or the merit of attempted innovations," which is tendered to them in the preface. A general view of jurisprudence may be got much more quickly from Mr. Amos than from Mr. Austin; but the information obtained from the former will be blurred in outline and loose in texture, and the reader's own mind in obtaining it will remain unstimulated; while knowledge derived from the latter will be perfectly precise, and its very deficiencies will co-operate with the rugged style of the great jurist to develop the student's own powers of sustained reasoning.

AUTHORS AT WORK.*

MR. PEBODY tells us in his preface that, when reading a favourite poem or novel, he has often asked himself how, when, where it was written? In the attempt to answer these questions—and most people of any literary taste must have frequently asked the same—he collected "a mass of personal chit-chat and anecdote which cannot fail," as he thinks, "to be equally interesting to every one as it was originally" to him. We hope that it may, though "every one" is rather a large word. Mr. Pebody writes pleasantly, if not with any surprising power, and though most of his gossip is tolerably familiar to students of the English literature of the early part of this century, it is agreeable to have it brought together in a presentable form. The authors with whom Mr. Pebody deals are Jeffery, Scott, Burns, Lamb, Sheridan, Sydney Smith, Macaulay, Byron, Wordsworth, Moore, and Mackintosh. Mr. Pebody adopts the doctrine which Balzac's celebrated phrase about critics and authors has made familiar; he declares criticism to be, as a rule, poor trash, and thinks that there is scarcely any critic whose works the world would care to peruse. The saying is obviously exaggerated. Criticism is of course a parasitic plant in literature; and men who can do original work will not care to spend much time in talking about other people's. Still many of the greatest of modern writers have shown their powers in criticism, and have left much which is worth preserving. With them, of course, Mr. Pebody does not claim to be ranked; and we ought to be content if he adopts the view of the great men described which finds favour with the most appreciative readers. On the whole, we have not much fault to find with him in this respect. With an exception or two, to be noticed directly, he reports pretty fairly the verdict which will probably be adopted by posterity. It is not, however, chiefly as criticism that this volume claims our attention. It is, properly speaking, a study of the methods of working adopted by eminent writers; and if any general moral could be derived from a series of desultory notes, the youthful aspirant should learn from Mr. Pebody how he ought to divide his time, what are the most propitious seasons for writing, what the degree of polish to be bestowed, and so on. The difficulty, indeed, of drawing a moral would in any case be considerable; for the most conspicuous fact is that no two writers adopted the same methods. Some work best in the open air, and some in a midnight study; some upon gin and water, and others on coffee or cold water; some turn out so many lines a day with the regularity of a machine, whilst others can only work in spasms of passionate effort to be succeeded by long periods of repose. In short, the only rule seems to be that every man should do what is good in his own eyes.

There is another doctrine maintained by Mr. Pebody which, if true, would diminish some of our interest in seeing great authors at work. He seems to think that by some strange perversity of fate great men at home are entirely different from their own selves in public. He gives us various instances, as of course a man may give instances of anything, to prove that we should be grievously disappointed if we could do what he wishes to enable us to do, and see our favourite authors as they were seen by their intimates. This is a very pretty paradox to put in a popular essay, but it is in reality of the flimsiest kind. Running over the list of Mr. Pebody's authors, we feel that there is not one in whom what we know of his private character conflicts with what we should have inferred from his work. The examples which he quotes are merely made to appear strange by tricks of language. What is to be said to such a remark as this?—

No man was more distinguished by his good-breeding and suavity than the author of the Revolt of Islam, and when all England was standing aghast at his most profligate poem, one of his companions tells us, in a phrase which might almost be stereotyped for men of his temperament, that he was the mildest and most tolerant of men, and as perfect a gentleman as ever crossed a drawing-room.

We are quite unable to see the strangeness of the supposed contrast, even though both terms in it are misstated. Would anybody, after reading Shelley's poetry, really expect him to be a swearing, drinking rowdy, as Mr. Pebody seems to fancy? are not sensitive visionaries apt to be suave and gentle in their manners? and, in short, is not the Shelley of the biographer as near to the ideal of Shelley which any reasonable man would have formed from his works as could possibly be expected? Mr. Pebody seems to have caught the trick of paradox from Macaulay and to be applying it with very little reflection. A similar anxiety to be smart rather than thoughtful seriously injures some of his essays on more vital matters. He wants, for example, to describe for us Byron's mode of writing. He begins by quoting with the utmost seriousness some of Byron's affected expressions of contempt for his own works. He fully believes that Childe Harold when written was not intended for publication, and believes it because Byron says so. Of course this strikes him as odd, and he proceeds to show that Byron took the greatest possible care in correcting the very pieces which he declared to have been thrown off at the heat of the moment. Byron, for example, boasts that the Bride of Abydos was written in a week, or, as he says in his Diary, in four nights. To the rough sketch, however, there were added two hundred fresh lines before it appeared to the world, and they included some of the most striking touches in the poem. Mr. Pebody's comment is singular. "Byron as a poet," he says, "and Byron as an artist, formed one of the most striking and perplexing of antitheses"; and he adds afterwards, "It is no part of my business to reconcile the poet with the artist." We should have thought that it was his business; but at any rate the problem seems to be easy.

* Authors at Work. By Charles Pebody. London: Allen & Co.

enough. Byron, it is plain, liked to write in a state of excitement, as might naturally be inferred from his style; but he afterwards corrected, polished, and improved. There is nothing at all singular in this, and the only strange thing is, that he chose to express great contempt for the poems about which he took so much pains. But neither is this a very surprising or unparalleled phenomenon. Part of Byron's objection to the style in which he worked may have been genuine; but undoubtedly a large part of it was simple affectation; and Mr. Pebody must be a very innocent critic if he has now to discover for the first time that poets in general, and Byron above all other poets, have been very much given to sham modesty, and to representing elaborately prepared works as impromptu performances.

Another criticism on Byron seems to err in the opposite direction. Mr. Pebody considers him to be a plagiarist. The proofs which he alleges are that the first scenes in Manfred are "identical" with—we should have rather said have a strong resemblance to—the first scenes in Faust; that English Bards and Scotch Reviewers was modelled upon the Dunciad; that the paraphrase of the Art of Poetry was worked out upon a suggestion of Dr. Johnson's; that the character of Sardanapalus was taken from the portrait of Otho in Juvenal; and that Don Juan is a copy of the page in the Marriage of Figaro. On this showing no poem that ever was written is original. Shakspeare was a gross and systematic plagiarist; Milton borrowed from the Bible; Shelley did not invent the character of Beatrice Cenci; and if Byron borrowed from Goethe, Goethe had himself borrowed Faust from older authors. The originality of a poet does not consist in inventing new themes, but in investing old themes with new charms; and it is no more desirable that he should evolve characters out of his own consciousness than that he should describe thunderstorms or mountains without seeing them. In his essay on Tom Moore Mr. Pebody appears to accept this singular theory. Speaking of Lalla Rookh, he says, "This feat of Tom Moore's is, I believe, the highest feat ever performed by the imagination." The judgment is the more surprising because he afterwards tells us, very truly, that Moore's reputation has vanished, and that but for his songs, of which, we may add, a whole collection is inferior in value to a single vigorous stanza of Burns, "the author of Lalla Rookh would to-day hardly keep his rank as a poet at all." How then can Lalla Rookh be the "highest feat ever performed by the imagination," higher, let us say, than the poetry of Byron, Shelley, Wordsworth, Keats, Milton, Spenser, or Shakspeare? The answer seems to be, that Moore described the valley of Cashmere without seeing it, whereas other poets had seen what they described. But if the description is after all so incomparably inferior that it would scarcely entitle its author to be called a poet, what does it prove? All that it really proves, we take it, is simple enough. It proves that, as Moore was a very fashionable poet for a time, his acquaintances paid him very preposterous compliments, and, amongst them, the very obvious one of declaring that his descriptions of places he had never seen reminded them of the reality. Of course people who had seen Cashmere felt that they had an admirable chance of saying a civil thing, and they said it; but that is not an unprecedented circumstance. Nobody would say, except in a popular essay, that Moore's description of the East, however little founded on observation, shows powers of imagination at all comparable to those which Wordsworth displayed in describing scenery with which he was intimate. To describe badly a thing you have not seen is not really so great a feat as to describe well what you and everybody have seen.

The little tricks of style which are meant to give brilliancy to his essays are rather annoying, but on the whole we have no great fault to find with Mr. Pebody. If he is occasionally commonplace and given to flashy paradoxes, he is amusing, and that is a great virtue. We cannot, however, take leave of him without remarking that he makes mistakes which we should have hardly anticipated in our venerable contemporary, the Gentleman's Magazine, where the essays originally appeared. Thus in the year 1802 Shelley was not at Harrow, for he was never there at all. Dickens, Thackeray, Disraeli, and Lord Lytton, it is true, were "hardly as yet out of their cradles," but for the excellent reason that they had not yet got into them. Richardson and Hume had not been distinguished for their genius "ten or fifteen years before," for Hume had been dead for a quarter of a century, and Richardson forty years. Keats, again, was not, as Mr. Pebody thinks the author of the phrase "the sessions of sweet silent thought," but a still more distinguished poet. And "Burke, Gibbon, and Goldsmith" were not members of the Kitcat Club, inasmuch as it was dissolved before they were born. And, finally, when Mr. Pebody tells us that Mackintosh on his visit to Beaconsfield saw Burke "rolling about the carpet with his children," he surely might have remembered that Burke's closing years were saddened by the death of his only son, which had happened before this visit, and when the son was a good deal too old to roll upon carpets. The mistake is simply that the possessive pronoun is superfluous.

MODERN GREEK LIFE AND FOLKLORE.*

THE judges appointed to award the Rhodokanaki philological prize in the University of Athens did well when they proposed to the competitors the task of comparing the habits, customs, superstitions, and general traditions of the existing Greeks with the records of the habits and superstitions of their forefathers left to us by ancient writers. This subject, embracing obviously all usages relating to birth, marriage, and death, to magic, incantations, and divination of every kind; to dreams and riddles, to ghosts, fairies, and vampires, has called forth an essay by Mr. Politis, who has divided his work under the four heads of modern Hellenic mythology, divination, social customs and rites, and, lastly, of the comparative philology of the modern and ancient dialects. Of these four sections, the first alone is at present published, the great cost of printing at Athens making it necessary to postpone the appearance of the remaining sections. The preface gives, for the amusement perhaps of some readers, the opinion of the judges, who in awarding the prize enter into minute criticisms of clerical and other mistakes found in the essay, and take the author to task, not only for sending an almost illegible manuscript, but for odd phrases such as ἀγνοῶν καλῶς, when he should have said μὴ γινώσκων καλῶς. The answer of Mr. Politis, who defends himself in a series of running comments on the decision, is that time failed him to copy out his essay, and that on many points the examiners are themselves mistaken. But we are concerned here neither with the criticisms nor with the reply to them; and therefore we go on at once to remark that the topics of this portion of the work, comprising the heavens, the earth, the elements, the Olympian divinities, the gods of the sea, and the beings who dwell on the earth (whether as Kalikantzaroi, Nereids, Stoichela, Dragons, or as Stringlai, female spirits who devour children, &c.), cover the field which has been examined by many German and English writers, and most recently by Professor Bernhard Schmidt, whose first volume on the life and folklore of the modern Greeks was noticed not long since (March 2, 1872) in the pages of this Review. Mr. Politis expresses his regret that this volume was published after his own was in type; but as long as any solid results are gained, independence of research obviously increases their value; and the present volume not less than that of Professor Schmidt may be regarded as proving, if proof were needed, not only that the modern Greek folklore contains Slavonic as well as Hellenic elements, but that the latter element vastly preponderates in it. This fact may tempt many persons to think that the imputation of a general Slavism which has made the name of Fallmerayer hateful to modern Greeks is conclusively met. If we can scarcely venture on so broad an inference, we may at least say that this ascendancy of the old mythology, like that of the ancient language, proves that the Hellenes of the middle ages had not lost their old power of enslaving or absorbing their conquerors.

These two points, then, may be looked upon as established—first, that the folklore of the modern Greeks has assimilated some but no large amount of material from Slavonic, Semitic, or other sources; and, secondly, that there has been no break in the continuous life of the Hellenic people, and that in their habits, their superstitions, and general tone of thought, they represent the Greeks of the days of Polybios or of Perikles. But in a country which once at least possessed a mythology so astonishingly rich and varied, the main point of interest is not so much the evidence for the proposition that the new folklore represents the old, as the extent to which the old mythology dwells in the memory of the people. To this question neither Professor Schmidt nor Mr. Politis furnishes any positive answer; but if we are to take the pages of the latter as containing all that is now popularly believed on the matters examined in it, we shall wonder not that so much has been remembered, but that so little has been retained. We are not speaking of the legends which were moulded into an abiding shape by the lyric, epic, and tragic poets of Hellas. These were obviously removed from the influence of the changes which must always be at work in modifying the beliefs and opinions of the people, and therefore were more likely to be forgotten by them. But no one who will go through the old historians and mythographers can rise from the task without the conviction that a vast amount of popular tradition was never appropriated by the poets, and that in the dry pages of Pausanias or Apollodoros we have the skeletons of myths as beautiful as any of those which breathe an exquisite music in the lays of Pindar, or assume a marvellous grandeur in the majestic eloquence of Æschylos. We cannot fail to see that in the tale of Psyche and Eros in Appuleius we have an Hellenic version of the story of Beauty and the Beast, of Urrael, and many another heroine of Eastern and Western tradition; but neither this story nor that of Kephaios and Prokris, or a hundred others that might be named, found their way into the written poetry of the Greeks, and it is a matter of great interest to ascertain how far they have been preserved in the unwritten traditions of the people. If Mr. Politis has given us all that the common folk still say and think about the heaven and the stars, the sun and the moon, the conclusion would seem to be that the most beautiful features of the old myths are just those which have suffered most from the wear and tear of ages, for it may perhaps be doubted whether the introduction of Christianity was the cause of any violent changes. The popular opinion, which Xenophanes put forth as a scientific explanation, that the stars are lamps lit at night and put out in the morning, scarcely belongs to the province of mythology; but if this is all that the people have to say of the nightly heavens, we can scarcely wonder that they remember nothing of Endymion in his dreamless sleep, or of his bride, the moon, who wanders through the sky as Asterodia, attended by her fifty daughters, like Ursula with her legion of virgins. The notion still lives, it seems, that the heaven is a vault or dome, through openings in which the rain is let down from pitchers or sacks; but this again is less a myth than an attempt to account for phenomena on rational grounds. The myth would be the old marriage of Ouranos, who descends each night to the wife over whom he has bent lovingly during the day; but in place of this we have the foreign notion (be its source Semitic or any other) that the heavens are seven in number. As to Helios, the myths of Klymenis and Phaethon, and still more those which sang of the birth of Phoibos in Delos, of his westward wanderings, and of his daily return to the cliffs and hills which he loved, have given way to notions borrowed from the history of the Prophet Elijah, in whom Mr. Polites sees a Semitic sun-god or fire-god.

* Μήτρη τῆς τῆς βίου τῶν νεοτέρων Ἑλλήνων. ἐκ τ. Ν. Τ. Πάρισι. ἐν Ἀθήναις. 1871.

In this case the importation of foreign ideas or names has given rise to a controversy between Mr. Polites and the judges who awarded him the Rhodokonaki prize, which much resembles the controversy of the knights about the two sides of the brazen and silver shield. In his essay Mr. Polites remarks that the mountain tops which in the old times were dedicated to Helios, or the sun, are now dedicated to Elias, a church of St. Elias crowning the summit of almost every hill; and that this identification was the result partly of similarity of sound in the names and partly of likeness of attributes. The judges, on the other hand, assert that the mountain summits were in the old mythology sacred to the Pelasgic Zeus, whose name they see reflected in Θεός as well as in the Latin deus and the Sanskrit devas; and they infer that the likeness of the name Elias to Helios could have nothing to do with the growth of a notion which is sufficiently explained by the solitary sojourn of Elijah on the mountains, and his ascent to heaven in the fiery chariot drawn by the gleaming horses of the sun. If the question be one of any importance, it may perhaps best be answered by referring to other instances in which a Jewish or a Christian saint has been put in the place of an old Hellenic god. We may take St. Nicholas, who in the eyes of the modern Greek is invested with the powers and the features of Poseidon—an identification with which, according to the judges of this essay, the name of the saint had nothing whatever to do. Yet if we look to his acts, we find but little to connect the saint peculiarly with the sea, the story of his quieting a storm being no uncommon feature in Christian hagiography. But his name at once carries us to the myth of Odin, who as Hnikar and Nicor is the Northern water-god; who as Old Nick in sailors' language lives at the bottom of the sea; and whose kinsfolk are the Nixies of our streams and millponds. These names, it is true, spring from the same root with the Greek νήξω, to swim or float; and in this fact we have perhaps the reason of the transference of power from Poseidon to the saint, unless this also is to be set down to Slavic or other foreign influences. This catching at sounds seems to explain the growth of a large class of myths, of which that of the Scottish Columba may be taken as an example. At Iona the prayers of the saint were constantly needed by and offered for seafaring men, and the power which these prayers were supposed to have over the angry waters so invested him with the terrible majesty of the sea deities that mariners invoked him under the name of St. Qualm.

In some cases the resemblance of the ancient to the modern myth may be called more seriously into question. Mr. Polites mentions (p. 45) a popular fancy according to which a newly born maiden, escaping from her cradle, devours her father's horses and then lies down again. In this he sees the old story of Hermes and the theft of the cattle of Phoibos. But we may surely accept the Homeric hymn as giving more trustworthy evidence of the nature of the ancient myth than the dry and comparatively recent compilations of Apollodorus. The latter, it is true, speaks of Hermes as devouring part of the cattle which he stole; but in the hymn the very essence of the story lies in the fact that although Hermes can rub the branches of the forest trees together until they burst into a flame, and though he can kill and cook the meat, yet in spite of a craving hunger he may not taste the savoury banquet whose odour only adds to his misery. Hence the modern story may simply reflect the prosy comments of Apollodorus, and both may betray the process by which the most prominent characteristics of the primitive myths fade gradually away until in the end they may pass clean out of mind.

The same catching at sound which substituted the prophet Elias for the Greek Helios transferred to the saint Dionysos the powers of the wine-god Dionysos; and so the story grew up that, as the Christian saint journeyed to Naxos (the centre, by the way, of the old Dionysiac worship), he saw at his feet a small but beautiful plant, which he wished to carry away with him. Fearing that the heat of the sun might scorch it, he placed it in the thighbone of a bird and went on his way. The rapid growth of the plant soon made it burst out at each end of the bone, and his old bear led him to cast away the bone of the bird, and to take in its stead the thighbone of a lion. This also proved to be too small, and he threw it aside for the thighbone of an ass, which he was lucky enough to find. In this bone he succeeded in bringing the plant to Naxos, where, as the two stuck inseparably together, he was obliged to bury the bone with the plant, which speedily grew up and yielded splendid grapes. Out of these he made the first wine; but to his amazement, when he let the people of the island drink of it, they first sang like birds, then grew as strong and fierce as lions, and lastly became as asses.

But if in the modern mythology generally the finer features of the old myths have been either lost or made to assume a coarser shape, the more recent myths still remain in many instances singularly true to the phenomena which suggested them. In the process of transformation the Nereids have lost in greater or less degree their watery character, until they are confused practically with the nymphs of the old Greek and the Fairies of our Northern mythology. As the Venus of the Horelsberg, or the fairy queen of Ercildoune, bears away Tanhäuser or True Thomas to the forest or the cave, so the Nereid carries to her secret haunts the man whom she chooses to be her mate. But the Nereid becomes further, like Penelope, the weaver; and her net is woven to the exquisite music of her voice—a vivid image of the light summer breeze as it weaves its network of cirri clouds high up in the blue heaven.

In short, Mr. Polites has learnt much by applying to the existing myths of his own country that method of comparison which may fairly be regarded as one of the greatest discoveries ever made; and his readers will have much to learn from him. We might perhaps have wished rather to know the full extent of modern Greek folklore, and thus to ascertain precisely how far the old myths survive; but his book, as all books must be which diligently and honestly bring together scattered or forgotten facts, is a valuable and welcome contribution to the sciences of comparative mythology.

FLEURANGE.*

TIME was when French romance witched the world with noble qualities, and was in harmony with that balance of faith, of valour, and of science which in the seventeenth century gave to the country of Vincent de Paul, Condé, and Descartes the foremost rank among Continental nations. There is always in that country ground for hope of literary revival, even in the domain of yellow-covered story books, thanks to the high standard of style religiously maintained by writers of the first class. We in England hardly appreciate the value of absolute correctness in language, as is shown by Royal Speeches and misunderstood treaties; but the part played in European annals by France is largely owing to the precision of its terms. Exact speech is a precious tradition preserved by the Abdiels of the Academy, through the flood of slang, of "romantic" writing, and of vulgar manners that has inundated Western Europe. The strict rules that governed the dramatists of the seventeenth century have still an indirect influence on French novelists. The neat plot, the rapid action, and unity of composition which distinguish French fiction are wanting in our over-realistic stories. With one or two exceptions, romance has not been treated by our writers as an art; they gratify themselves byrodomontades now moral, now vicious, and English readers indifferent to the ordering of a crowded plot know not the satisfactions of balanced and harmonious art. But since the days of the Regency fiction has necessarily been in France a forbidden joy to well-trained youth, and so a fruitful influence for good was spoiled. Freed from responsibility, the majority of novelists have competed for the prize of superior license. The few and insignificant goody tales produced by French writers have been sicker stuff than we who have not yet fallen into those extremes can well imagine; immoral from morbid religiosity, and about as artistic as the objets de pitié sold outside Paris churches. In vain the wiser chiefs of good society wished for a school of fiction such as was our English romance in the first half of the century. Even the author of Sybil drifted into M. de Camors, and About could not refrain from L'Infâme. It is then an event in French light literature that a novel of society, containing highly dramatic situations and scenes of concentrated, if pure, passion has been produced, which girls may read without consciousness of moral backboards and seminary hygiene, and which scholars can enjoy because of its accurate and finished grace of style. Fleurange, by Mrs. Craven, is worthy of the most precious drawing-room, and yet it has power and "go" enough to satisfy the ogre of the day who bolts his three volumes of criminal mystery in an afternoon.

We have not lately been favoured on either side of the Channel with a romance which ventures with easy grace into the private rooms of Royalty, and, without either snobbish depreciation or snobbish awe, includes the biggest wigs in its dramatic persons. Lords and ladies are abundant in our fiction, but they have been chiefly studied from the Ascot or watering-place points of view, or at best painted in smoking-coat and extreme undress. Readers are introduced by the backstairs to high life, and every element of dignity is got rid of assiduously in the effort to attain a spurious realism. There is always a special charm in pictures of good society, and though the figures in them be not powdered and rouged as in the "Rape of the Lock," we have learnt to be thankful when modern authors dress their puppets suitably. The "nice contrast of a clouded cane" is probably beyond the descriptive powers of any living writer, but it is comforting to meet with refined ladies and gentlemen in the dreamland of creative art. The heroine of Mrs. Craven's book, whose father, a French artist, had given her the Italian name of Fior Angela, or, in his own language, Fleurange, acquits herself with well-bred grace alike in the learned domesticity of a German Professor's home, in the magnificent Florentine palace of a Russian princess, and at the Court of St. Petersburg. The author's knowledge of the European world is rare, and whether we follow her to the Italian convent where Fleurange was trained, or to the presence of the demigod Nicholas, we feel equally well introduced. She is less at home in the Frankfort family than in the Lamianoff palace, and the manners of her two angelic Germans were probably educed from her inner consciousness.

* Fleurange. By Mrs. Augustus Craven. Quatrième édition. Paris: Didier et Co. 1872.

The memoirs of her family, published some years since under the title Le Récit d'une Soeur, explain Mrs. Craven's opportunities for social study. The daughter of M. de la Ferronnays, ambassador at the Russian Court after the Bourbon restoration, Mrs. Craven, when she describes the intrigues of St. Petersburg, is truthful as only a writer conversant with the Czar's interior could be. The wife of a diplomatist, her wide experience of European manners gives a breadth as well as accuracy to her sketches which certainly no English writer with whom we are acquainted has attained. Her Italian Marquis—un de ces hommes qui causent bien de tout, et qui savent intéresser au sujet dont ils parlent, quel qu'il soit, commérage de société, nouvelle politique, ou question sociale et littéraire, et n'ayant d'autre défaut que celui de traiter tous ces sujets avec une importance égale comme si tous lui semblaient d'un égal intérêt;—

is a finished portrait, and distinctly Milanese both in his experiences of abortive conspiracy and in his good sense. The Princess Lannionoff, an undisciplined yet highly polished despot, ostentatious and vain of her good taste even in the selection of her ornamental companion Fleurange, yet keen-witted to play with a certain grandeur her part as great lady, violent almost to blows, yet working towards her ends by intrigue, subject to the vapours of the most advanced civilization, yet enduring as a Cossack, is equally true to her race and her rank in the Slavonic Court. Her son, Count Georges de Walden, Republican from ennui—amorous and inconstant, a slave to his fancy for the dependent heroine until it is proved to be seriously inconvenient; obstinate to his mother, but weak to everyone else; possessed of taste, but not of earnestness—is probably truer to life than the self-contained and patient lover Clement Dornthal, the author's favourite among her studies of young men. She has made him ugly, poor, and German, but redeems his defects by his staunch virtue. He is of super-refined "blood and iron" mingled in due proportions, and the author set herself a difficult task which she has well performed in the elaboration of so uncredited a hero. There is doubtless the charm of a very noble ideal about Fleurange's German cousins, but, notwithstanding financial catalyses and a wicked young banker, it has perhaps too much of that sweet monotony which writers "in society" are apt to attribute to middle-class family life. It is quite true that distance is needed to give enchantment to our idealizations. Mrs. Craven, wishing to draw figures worthy of the golden age, has wisely chosen them of circumstances other than her own. Nor do we disapprove of the creation of imaginary personages, so long as their excellence is, however extraordinary, not unnatural. We have been satiated by feminine analysis of cool captains and Pall Mall Belials, and it is agreeable to have our faith refreshed by the Quixotism of a love such as Clement's, which takes for its device "Garder l'amour et briser l'espoir." The author indeed teaches us that not Quixotism, but a calm will and sober judgment, informed by religion, purified his passion and strengthened the brave man in the unselfish devotion which taught him to live in daily companionship with the woman he loved, "without her, yet for her."

That he had other merits as a son and brother is natural, for virtues multiply by contact not less than vices. Both in him and in the heroine Fleurange self-control, courage, and good sense are prominent traits, and the practical uses of piety are shown with felicity. We have heard much of the enervating influences of conventual teaching, yet Mrs. Craven does not hesitate to make the Italian Superior of the house where Fleurange was trained for the struggle of orphan life a constant source of strength in its crises. We know few nobler passages in modern literature than those in which Mère Madeleine explains to her sore-bested pupil that she must not seek shelter in a nunnery because life is difficult. The worst trials must be met with simplicity and goodwill—qualities that carried the girl safely through entanglements where weakness, however amiable, would have been ruinous. Though capable of a devotion which would follow her lover to Siberia that she might alleviate his exile, Fleurange never fails in judgment. Of a passionate temperament, reticence and womanly dignity preserve her from mistakes in moments of supreme trial. Love is the motive of the book, and the author has not feared to paint its extremes; yet when its current flows the strongest, she ventures to exhibit the superior powers that can turn back the tide on the heart. She does not conceal the after results of bitter stagnation—the arid springs that overflow the waste of life—to be healed only as were the waters of Maru. To prove the temper of Fleurange, the author tries her in the hottest of all furnaces to which woman's nature can be exposed. When her long-restrained love was righteously allowed its course; when utter sacrifice of herself seemed accepted; when her heart throbbed with the energy of fulfilled devotion; when fatigues of body and mind were passed, and the Czar's consent had been obtained to her marriage with the priest Georges de Walden, sentenced to penal servitude in Siberia, she is required to make the saddest of all renunciations, the sacrifice of her sanctities. Another woman, of higher rank, beautiful, and, in the world's estimation, a more fitting wife, usurped her hardly-earned rights, and secured for the egotist Georges pardon and prosperity, which he gladly accepted as the dowry of his influential bride.

The scenes in which Adelardi, his Italian friend, explains to the selfish lover the alternative of exile or marriage with the Imperial maid of honour, are only less admirable studies of character than that in which Fleurange's successful rival, the Countess Véra, suddenly reveals to the brave young girl the sacrifice required of her. Having reached the port of perfect happiness, as she believed, by her very love she was forbidden to enter it. Her conduct under the crushing blow is a beautiful study of womanly strength. Physically broken as the strain on her noble nature leaves her, she retains a dignity before which the Imperial favourite, herself a sufficiently fine character, shrinks. Stung by the sense of her inferiority, even jealous of Fleurange's last service to the man they both loved, la voix de Fleurange était pourtant en ce moment irrésistible, et parlait à son cœur en dépit d'elle-même. Elle hésitait entre ces deux sentiments, lorsque Fleurange reprit:—“Vous avez raison, ce n'est pas à moi en ce moment à vous attendre, car vous n'avez plus rien, je crois, à me pardonner, et moi je vous pardonne tout.” Et tandis que Véra demeurait encore immobile, la tête inclinée, Fleurange se pencha vers elle et l'embrassa.

The author does not hide the pain of Fleurange as the veil was thus stripped from the passion which had assumed in its ascetic self-abnegation an almost religious form; but, however sick at heart, she remained firm in act, and returned to the weariness of a life whence the beautiful idol had been banished without even the poor consolation of letting the prosperous Georges de Walden know what she had been ready to do for him. In her bitterness she wrote to Mère Madeleine, “Ma vie est dépourvue de tout ce qui peut me donner le désir de vivre.” For the second time the wise nun denied her wish to enter a convent, in words so brave that we will quote them:—“Point d'affaiblissement sur vous-même, point de souvenir complaisant de vos desirs trompés, de vos peines souffertes.” Having shown Fleurange in what her love for Georges de Walden had been wanting, she adds:—

Il est un amour de la terre qui, s'il allonge la route pour aller à Dieu, n'en détourne point cependant, et qui même par les vertus qu'il exige, par les sacrifices qu'il impose, par les souffrances dont il est accompagné, seconde souvent les plus nobles mouvements de l'âme.

Ingeniously planned as is the story, the charm of Mrs. Craven's writing is in the healthy nobleness of her conceptions of life and the perfection of her style. Roman Catholic literature is largely indebted to her for her representation of a practical religious power in the life of her hero and heroine while she avoids homilies and cant. Her feeling for natural beauty is in the same equal balance as in the landscapes of Raffaele and Perugino. Without exaggeration of sentiment, Fleurange always rises to the height of her position. The book in its unassuming form is worthy of a writer who possessed the long and brotherly friendship of Montalembert, and who lived in the intimacy of Madame Swetchine and Lacordaire. It is a pleasant surprise to us to learn that of her family memoirs twenty-four editions have been required, while within six months six editions of her latest work have been demanded. Not in vain has its author belonged to that best French world in which echoes of the seventeenth century are not altogether lost. Niece of the Duke of Blacas, grandniece and godchild of the Duchess of Tourzel, she is exceptionally fitted to continue the traditions of old France. A memoir of her father, the colleague of Chateaubriand and De Villèle in the Foreign Office of the Restoration, might in her hands be a useful contribution to the annals of the Drapeau Blanc. Meantime we thank her for a story which possesses merits of style, of plot, and of nobly, yet correct, drawing rarely attained by our novelists. In Fleurange we have a French romance worthy of the elder French literature.

THE COTTON MSS.—APPENDIX XXVII.*

IT would only be a futile endeavour to slay the slain if we were to attempt again to show up the surprising amount of errors committed by the compiler of this Catalogue of the Cotton Manuscripts. We can only regret that the thing was done exactly half a century too early. Had the Catalogue been drawn up in the middle of the nineteenth century, instead of being published at its very beginning, it would no doubt have been entrusted to competent hands; and authors, editors, and Calendarers of State Papers would have been saved an endless amount of labour. The defects of such parts of the Catalogue as refer to the reign of Henry VIII. are no doubt being gradually supplied by the labours of Mr. Brewer and his staff of assistants, who are engaged in drawing up the Calendar of State Papers for this reign. We are not, then, intending now to draw attention to the omissions or mistakes of Mr. Planta, who, after all, did his work quite as well as any other librarian or scribe would have done it who had, during the last few years of the eighteenth century, to devote his leisure time to compiling a Catalogue of such a miscellaneous collection of documents, original and copied, as had found their way into Sir Robert Cotton's possession.

* A Catalogue of the Manuscripts in the Cottonian Library deposited in the British Museum. Printed by Command of His Majesty King George III., 4to. 4s. 6d., in pursuance of an Address of the House of Commons of Great Britain, 1760.

We have on several previous occasions pointed out some of the absurd blunders with which this volume abounds.* Our present object is to notice one of the volumes of this Collection which has received much less attention than it deserves. The volume entitled Appendix XXVII. must from its appearance in all probability have once belonged to the Royal Library. How it found its way into the Cottonian Collection we shall not attempt to decide. That question will perhaps be decided when it has been ascertained how so many documents which ought to have been in the former State Paper Office, and now really belong to the Record Office in Chancery Lane, have been transferred into the same Collection. At present we are concerned only with the contents of this volume. It is described by Mr. Planta fairly enough as Codex Chartaceus, membranis quibusdam præfixis in folio constanti foliis 192. And, to give credit where credit is due, we are bound to say that we have not detected any error in the description of the fifteen different documents of which the volume consists, albeit they are of a very miscellaneous description, and arranged in most admirable disorder—documents ranging from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century being put together with scarcely any attempt at chronological order.

We purpose to notice only two of these documents, which, though they belong to the same period—there being exactly a year's interval between them—occur, one near the beginning, the other towards the end of the volume. Both are of considerable importance for the information they supply as regards the decision of Clement VII. to send a legate to England, and the proceedings of the Legatine Court held by Wolsey and Campeggio in the summer of 1529, in the matter of the divorce of Henry VIII. from Catharine of Aragon. It is almost unaccountable to us how, on a subject upon which so many writers have of late tried their hand, and so many documents have during the last few years been brought to light, no one should have noticed these two important papers. It is not of course surprising that writers of the history of Henry VIII. of the stamp of Mr. J. A. Froude should know nothing about these papers, or any other documentary evidence, but the omission of them from the recently published "Records of the Reformation" must be owing to some inadvertency on the part of the editor of those volumes.

The first of these State Papers is described as 7. Jo. Ant. Mussetella, Caroli V. oratoris apud Pontificem Maximum supplicatio contra divortium Regis Henrici VIII. (transumptum) Viterbi 1528. This is an official contemporary document, and not only has the paper itself never been noticed, but the protest which it contains, of which the original must be at Rome, and of which there are probably other official copies elsewhere, has, as far as we know, entirely escaped the researches of historians. Even the recently published volume of Venetian Records, in which we hoped to have found some confirmation of it, contains not the slightest allusion to any such protest having been made. And the ambassador's name is not so much as once mentioned in the State Papers of Henry VIII.'s reign, published by the Government. Indeed, so unknown to history is the name of Mosetella, that we believe we are correct in stating that it has not once been mentioned in any English history of the period. In the recently published volume of Venetian despatches it appears four or five times, and Mr. Rawdon Browne takes occasion to notice in a note that the papers he has calendared prove that there was such a person who held the office of Emperor's ambassador in the Papal Court during the few months which preceded the month of January, 1529, when Mai was appointed to the place.

The protest is dated July 20, 1528, and is formally made by the Emperor's orator, John Antony Musetella, or Musetulla (for the name is spelt both ways in the course of the document), objecting to the hearing of the cause for divorce in the realm of England, or indeed anywhere beyond the precincts of the Roman Curia, on the ground, which was always afterwards taken by the Queen and her advisers, that the place was not safe, with the addition, which was quite necessary during the lifetime of Cardinal Wolsey, that one of the Judges was not sufficiently indifferent, having been all his lifetime a protégé of the King's and Lord High Chancellor of the Realm, and in all respects a devoted adherent to Henry's interests. What is remarkable in the whole protest is that thus early in the affair of the divorce the Emperor should have so openly taken for granted and alleged his belief that the King's desire was not to have justice done, but to secure the divorce. This object, which became plain enough and was openly spoken of in 1529, was vested in a sort of obscurity as yet. Whatever people may have inwardly thought, it had not yet been avowed that the King's object was at all hazards to repudiate Katharine. The Pope, however, knew very well that this was the King's purpose, and he had, during the preceding month, June 1528, commissioned Wolsey and Campeggio to try the cause in England, never, however, meaning that it should be decided there. The Decretal Commission had been written and secretly entrusted to Campeggio. But six weeks seem to have elapsed before the Emperor understood the dangers with which his aunt, the Queen of England, was surrounded. The protest accordingly avows, and apparently takes quite for granted, that the King's purpose was to get rid of his wife, and Mosetella does not scruple to allege in it his knowledge that Wolsey had written to the Pope, urging him to concede all that the King of England should demand. What is most remarkable about the document is that the Emperor's ambassador should have been so entirely cognisant, not only of the secret motives of Henry and Wolsey, but of the contents of the Cardinal's letters to the Pope, and that he should so openly have avowed his knowledge and suspicions. It is to be noticed, however, that the protest does not fail to warn the Pope of the evil consequences likely to ensue as regards wars, and even the imminent danger of loss of influence to the Apostolical See, if he should consent to the project for a divorce. Lastly, the ambassador, in order to cover the ground completely, protests against any acts into which the Queen of England may be drawn by which she may seem to have compromised the case and accepted the jurisdiction of the Legatine Court.

It must be admitted, we think, that this document is of some importance as illustrating the relations of Henry VIII., Clement VII., and Charles V., at the critical period when Campeggio was about to sail for England on his abortive embassy to try the case for the divorce.

The other document concerning which we have a few words to say is not of so unique a character. It is entered in the Catalogue as—13. Minutes of Examinations taken, concerning the Marriage of Prince Arthur and King Henry VIII. with Catharine of Aragon (A Fragment). The compiler of the Catalogue does not say, as he ought to have said, that the document is an original official transcript of the evidence produced on the trial before the Legates, with the important parts of their depositions taken down in English and interlined in Latin for the benefit of the Pope or Cardinals or others who might not understand English. Neither has he stated that the last three leaves of the document are misplaced, as they refer to evidence taken in the Parliament Chamber on the 30th of June, 1529, whilst the rest of the document belongs to the 14th and 15th of July, when the Court was sitting apud fratres minores. We have said that this document is not unique, but in truth it is almost unique, for it contains more than has ever yet been published of the transactions of the Legatine Court. It is extremely imperfect, and the only other copy of the proceedings of the Court that we have seen, which exists in MS. in the Record Office, is also incomplete, beginning at a leaf which is numbered fol. 187, with the acts of Friday, the 16th of July, 1529, and not comprising any part of the evidence produced in the paper which we are now noticing. Probably Mr. Brewer's forthcoming volume will supply all the information that can be had as regards the mode in which the business of the Court was conducted. Meanwhile we must be content with what we have.

And this paper supplies some additions to the only continuous account which we at present possess, as given in Herbert's History of the Reign of Henry VIII., and the few fragments printed from the Cotton Collection in the Records of the Reformation, as well as a few corrections of mistakes which have been made by Herbert. From it we learn that the articles urged against the marriage were twelve in number, according to the copy printed in the Records of the Reformation, and that every witness was questioned upon every one of them. Upon many of them, of course, the only answer that could be given was testified in the words, nescit deponere. The testimony, upon the whole, agrees tolerably well with that given by Herbert, except as to the order in which the witnesses appear; and whereas there is no evidence either in Herbert or in the fragments published by the editor of the Records of the Reformation as to the Court having sat at all on the 30th of June, this paper shows that the important evidence of Sir William Thomas was given on that day, after that of the Earl of Shrewsbury. This witness's evidence occupies the last four leaves from fol. 155 to 158; the rest of the document, from fol. 138 to 155, being filled with the evidence produced on the 14th and 15th of July. This in no material point varies from that given by Herbert, except in the order of the appearance of the witnesses. In the Record Sir Anthony Willoughby is called into Court immediately before Lords Darcy and Mountjoye and Sir Henry Guildford. Next after these, here varying from Herbert's account, comes the testimony of Thomas Viscount Rochford, the father of Anne Boleyn, not as yet raised to the earldom of Wiltshire. There are a few mistakes in Herbert's account of this person's evidence, but they are scarcely worth noticing. Lord Rochford, however, gives a very curious piece of evidence, the chief value of which must have been to supply a gap in the previous testimony—as to the Prince and Princess having been seen in bed together on the first night after the marriage. No one had as yet testified to more than the fact of Prince Arthur having been conducted to the chamber and the bed where the deponent believed the Princess was lying. Lord Rochford attempts to explain this difficulty by alleging that it is the custom in England for brides on such occasions to be closely veiled and covered, and this with the more secrecy in proportion to their higher rank, till all men shall have left the bridal chamber. The next two witnesses called are Sir Richard Sacheverell and Sir David Owen, and in the middle of the last deponent's evidence the MS. abruptly terminates at the bottom of the second page of folio 154. Herbert usually follows the Records of the time so minutely that it is somewhat surprising he should in this case have admitted of so many variations. We will not dwell further on these, but we think we have shown that the neglected volume, Appendix XXVII. of the Cotton Collection, is entitled to more notice than it has received at the hands of historians.

We do not at present concern ourselves with the other interesting articles contained in it, but it seems worth while to observe that there is a long discussion on the subject of the pronunciation of Greek between Thomas Smith and Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester.

UNDER THE SUN.*

IT is scarcely possible to read Mr. Sala's writings for any long time together without suffering much in the same way as do persons who venture to go down in a diving-bell. They, it is said, are not only troubled by a pressure on the brain while they are in the bell, but also for some days afterwards suffer from a confused noise in their ears. It is even reported that the only way in which they can get rid of this singing, as disagreeable as it is unreal, is by listening to utterances which, while not absolutely devoid of sense, are nevertheless altogether unexciting. Thus it has been noticed that a man who on a Monday had gone down in a diving-bell had been troubled with these imaginary noises till Sunday came round, when, falling asleep while sitting under a preacher of the good old school, he woke up with his mind refreshed and his hearing restored. Another gentleman who sought relief by attending a Social Science Congress did not fare so well, for though at the end of the sitting he had entirely lost the singing in his ear which he had got from the diving-bell, yet he found it replaced by such a confusion of sounds that he vowed he would at once hasten off to the Polytechnic and try whether a fresh descent beneath the water would not restore him to that state which, however intolerable it had once been, now seemed to him not unenviable. Suffering as we did when we reached the last of Mr. Sala's 395 pages, we began to cast about how we should find relief. The Prison Congress was sitting, and we might have sought relief there, had we not known that we should come across the same Babel of tongues that meets us in Mr. Sala's writings, and that while we heard the same thing said in three different languages, we should be reminded of the author whom we were so eager to forget. In our suffering and perplexity we tried a remedy which has answered before. Fortunately a number or two of Addison's Spectator cleared our ears of this echo of big-sounding words. By chance we opened at a passage where we read of "Signor Nicolini's combat with a lion in the Haymarket, which has been very often exhibited to the general satisfaction of most of the nobility and gentry of the kingdom of Great Britain." When we came to study this piece attentively, we found such an extraordinary resemblance between our author and Signor Nicolini's lion, that we cannot help regarding the passage as one of those extraordinary prophecies—half conscious and half unconscious—which are scattered through all literature. It is somewhat more difficult perhaps to say who is the antitype of Signor Nicolini. Perhaps, however, we should be doing no great violence to interpretation if we were to find him in the Editor of some daily paper of vast circulation. There were those "who gave it out in whisper that the lion was a cousin-germane of the tiger who made his appearance in King William's days, and that the stage would be supplied with lions at the public expense during the whole season." At the present time, too, in the great Correspondent who at Versailles dined with emperors, kings, and princes, and after dining sang not at, but of, the dinner, many persons find more than a cousin-germane of our author, while there is no doubt of the supply of these lions being kept up at the public expense, not only during the whole season, but still more during the whole vacation. "The lion," furthermore we read, "was to act a part in High-Dutch and roar twice or thrice to a thorough bass." Mr. Sala no doubt could act a part in High-Dutch if his duties as a Correspondent ever so required him. In the present performance he acts a part in what he calls "Castilian," and while he roars not only twice or thrice, but a great many times indeed, to a thorough bass, he is, we believe, in point of grammatical knowledge of the foreign language in which he roars, scarcely inferior to his prototype the lion. In point of versatility, however, we fear he is by no means his match, for we read that "it has been observed by several that the lion has changed his manner of acting twice or thrice since his first appearance"; while Mr. Sala, whether he is writing what he calls "papers humorous" or what he calls "papers pathetic," whether he is writing, as he sometimes thinks he is, about kings, or whether he is writing, as he always is, about himself, never changes his manner at all.

Mr. Sala tells us that he has called his essays Under the Sun, "for the reason that the majority of them have a direct reference to the hot climates of the lands in which I have wandered." At the same time he takes as the motto of his collection the text "There is no new thing under the sun." Even if there is no absolutely new thing under the sun, there are nevertheless newer things than old essays that "were originally published in the pages of All the Year Round" and other papers, though they reappear in the largest of type with a handsome binding and a foolish preface. Mr. Sala explains that he cannot write unless the weather is very hot, and adds:—

I have been at home now, with brief intervals of Continental travelling, for four years, and I have written nothing worth reading. No original book of mine has seen the light for a long time; and my publisher had to make my life a torment to me ere he could induce me to collect these papers and correct the proofs. If any persons wish me to be industrious, let them combine in demanding that I should be banished very far beyond the seas, and to the hottest climate procurable. A double purpose would thus be served. Those who dislike me personally would be able to get rid of me; whereas those who did not hate me might profit by my absence by communing with me from afar off.

In those hot climates, which would seem, to judge from our author, to be as prolific in words as they are in insect life, Mr. Sala says, "I felt my blood in my veins, and it oozed out of my fingers, and so into my pen's point into red ink." Whether Mr. Sala always writes in red ink when engaged as a Correspondent where bombshells may fall, just as the gentleman who acted Othello blackened himself all over so as to give greater reality to the part, we do not pretend to know. But if a writer can venture to put into his preface, which is as it were a sample of what may be found in his book, such miserable folly as this, we can only suppose that he is, in Addison's words, "complying with the wretched taste of his audience." To those "warm-blooded animals, swarthy and sanguineous souls," whom Mr. Sala "desires to reach," we can only say that if they will read on, they will come to numbers of other passages just as full of sound and just as empty of sense. Mr. Sala writes of himself as having "Creole, Italian, Portuguese, Red Indian blood in my veins," and he may perhaps therefore meet with some indulgence in the strange mistakes he makes in the English and Spanish which oozes out of his fingers for the delight of the "swarthy and sanguineous souls" of his readers. It might have been well, however, if he had stuck to the languages of his forefathers, and had not ventured to play such tricks with two tongues which are in a manner foreign to him. Even a Creole would blush if he were proved to have written such a medley of nonsense as the following:—

There is a picture of the Admiral hung up in the library; a picture painted by a Frenchman, and presented to the chapter by Louis Philippe, in exchange for a choice Murillo. Out of the canvas the mild eyes seemed to look on me reproachfully. I fancied the grave resolute lips moving, and that their speech ran—"What are you doing here? Why don't you go back to Havana?" But it was no fault of mine. I was a teetotum; and to wheel about and turn about was my doom.

Coming out of that strange and fascinating land—the most comfortable and most charming in the world—I sat down one day in the Frescaria at Venice, and said, "I really must go back to Havana." So, taking hold of Old Spain, I cut its throat, and tied a Chubb's patent fireproof safe to its neck, and a couple of fifty-six pound shot to its legs, and, towing the corpse out to the Lido, sank it just under the lee of the Armenian convent of St. Lasaro. It fell with a splash, and sank at once. "Back to St. Mark's," I cried to the gondolier; "and lie there, Old Spain," I continued, apostrophizing two or three ripples which played above the deed that I had done, as though murder were a thing to laugh at—"lie there; and the fishes may feed on you till I need your bones, and dredge you up again." Old bones have their uses.

Mr. Sala may perhaps plead that, if this is nonsense, it is at all events English. We should like to ask him however to what language belong "morriest sight," "numismatic parallels," "tender tints of reflected light and somitones stealing through the diaphanous awnings overhead," "vegetable and pomicultural refuse," "pedal protuberances," "fustal squalling," "annone reader," "caracas the over-sucking leech on his lip," and the rest. A traveller through Spain, Cuba, and Mexico might have learnt how the Spanish word for gentleman is spelt, and not have wavered between caballero and caballero. Any one, even if he had not been so fortunate in his youth as Mr. Sala, who, as he says, knew some young Cubans who "showed me some Castilian," might still learn to copy inscriptions correctly from the signboard over a Spanish shop. So ignorant and so careless is Mr. Sala, however, that in his parade of his knowledge of Spanish, giving the same inscription twice over within thirty pages, he varies the spelling, and yet is both times wrong. In page 74 we find "Mi fama per l'Orbo vuela," and in page 104 "Mi fama per l'orbo vuela." The two inscriptions agree in one thing. They both show a mixture of Latin, French, and Spanish, and so far, therefore, testify to the great breadth of Mr. Sala's studies. We might, however, with the change of a word or two say of his scholarship what he himself says of these inscriptions—"Their signs are very pretty, but methinks they do profess too much." But to such trifling criticism as this so popular a writer will doubtless be indifferent, and will comfort himself with quoting his own Spanish—"Todos mi elogian." Mr. Sala, without perhaps quite intending it, lets us into the secret of the wonderful memory with which he is commonly credited. He is describing at great length a certain cigar merchant whom he met at Havana. He tells us what he wore, on what he sat, how he had "a continuous and diaphanous drapery of grateful incense hanging round." He thinks his readers will like to know something of the person of this cigar merchant, and so he says he was "a lissom, dusky, oily-looking man, if I remember right, with a lustrous, bush-like moustache." We shall not stop to inquire whether what Mr. Sala calls "the innate good-breeding of a caballero" (sic) would not keep a traveller from giving a personal description of a man who receives him kindly, and presents him on leaving with a box "containing one hundred of the superlative cigars known as 'excepcionales.'" Nor shall we stop to reflect on the taste of Mr. Sala's readers, who are supposed to be gratified by a minute description of a man whose only claim to notice consists in his dealing in cigars in Havana and in his once squeezing Mr. Sala's hand. What are we to say, however, to this minute recorder of the most trifling matters when he tells us that a person he meets was "a lissom, dusky, oily-looking man, if I remember right"? Mr. Sala knows that "the wretched taste of his audience" requires personal descriptions. If he can "remember right" the face, figure, and clothes of every one he meets, his description, however imper-

* Under the Sun: Essays mainly Written in Hot Countries. By George Augustus Sala, Author of "My Diary in America in the Midst of War," "Sunlight and Daylight," "Papers Humorous and Pathetic," &c. London: Tinsley Brothers. 1872.

minent, will still be accurate. If he has any doubts about his memory, he will nevertheless give as minute a description, and save his conscience, should it be troublesome, by a qualifying clause. In the same page in which he describes this cigar merchant he tells a story of Dr. Johnson, but though he utterly spoils the story, and makes a wonderful mess in point of chronology, he this time forgets to throw any doubt on the accuracy of his memory. He says:—

You have only to go on brewing barrels of beer, and an ever-thirsty public will go on buying and paying. Dr. Johnson had an inkling of this, when, taking stock, as executor under Thrall's will, of the great brew-house which was afterwards to become Barclay and Perkins's, he told Topham Beauclerk that he had at last discovered the "source of boundless prosperity and inexhaustible riches."

If Dr. Johnson had ever made so commonplace a remark to Topham Beauclerk, Beauclerk, unlike Mr. Sala, would certainly not have taken the trouble to repeat it. What Dr. Johnson did say at the sale of Thrall's brewery every one knows with the exception of Mr. Sala. Mr. Sala, apparently distrusting his memory, tries, like a certain class of witnesses in a court of justice, to hide his want of accuracy beneath greater circumstantiality. Topham Beauclerk is accordingly brought into the story, and by the peculiarity of his name casts an agreeable air of veracity about the whole quotation. Unfortunately for Mr. Sala, Topham Beauclerk happened to have died a year before Mr. Thrall. In fact, it was "at Mr. Thrall's" that Johnson, speaking of his friend, who was just dead, said "that Beauclerk's talents were those which he had felt himself more disposed to envy than those of any whom he had known."

When we come to look into Mr. Sala's trick of writing, and find in his humour an imitation of Charles Lamb, and in his pathos an imitation of Charles Dickens, we are reminded of another saying of Dr. Johnson's. Boswell, in defending "the poems of a pretty voluminous writer," asked, "Is there not imagination in them, sir?" Johnson replied, "Why, sir, there is in them what was imagination, but it is no more imagination in him than sound is sound in the echo."

WAGNER'S TRINUMMUS.*

MR. WAGNER need have offered no apology for putting forth an edition of the Trinummus for English scholars, even if the appearance of Ritschel's new theories and new excursions—which belie in some points the old adage as to second thoughts—did not render it opportune and seasonable. Time, and retouching, and an English printer, might perhaps have combined to turn out a text-book more thoroughly neat and handy and compact as to form and matter; but, considering how few scholars we have amongst us, since the appearance of Hildyard's Menecchmi and Mulharia, who are disposed to make Plautus their chief study, we must be thankful for what this German editor, "who loveth our nation," is kind enough to do for us—namely, to supply an edition of one of the best plays of Plautus, in which no difficulty of metre or interpretation is slurred over, and upon which a very rare knowledge of general and special phraseological and philological research has been bestowed. Many students shirk the vexed question of Plautine metres as one upon which the learned rave and wrangle to no purpose; and it is certainly not reassuring to find the greatest authorities on metre and pronunciation at issue, not only with their neighbours, but with themselves. We think, however, that Mr. Wagner's preface is calculated to give confidence to those who withhold their belief from the panacea for hiatus which Ritschel finds in the final d, affixed not only to ablatives, nouns, adjectives, and pronouns, but also to adverbs, prepositions, and imperatives. Generally Mr. Wagner espouses the contrary view of Corssen, that in the conversational language of Plautus and Terence this final d of ablative nouns had disappeared, and that the authority of MSS. is against it, except in such cases as med, ted, and perhaps sed for se. In the notable case at v. 726 of this very play, where the adverbial form placide might seem to be warranted or needful (and perhaps justifiable on the analogy of facile in the famous Senatus-consultum de Bacanaliis), our editor rightly considers Ritschel's own emendation "placidus" happier and likelier; and we must own that there are fewer difficulties in the way of his theory of the admissibility of hiatus in the cæura, and when the line is divided between two or more speakers, than in the violent demands on our credence which Ritschel and others make in their anxiety to avoid this. One or two of these we may have to notice incidentally; but we are aware that an article devoted to this single aspect of the task of editing Plautus would run a great risk of being "adrem as read"; and accordingly we prefer to touch on the exegetical merits of the edition before us, although it deserves to be remembered that the greatest approach to certainty as regards metrical form is of very considerable moment in the ascertaining of the true text, which obviously should be approximately settled before the interpretation of it is attempted.

If any one desires to understand the immense importance of an accurate text and a clear understanding of the little words and connecting particles, which are apt to get confused and obscured through the phrases and idioms, to the clear apprehension of the point and drift of Plautus, he has but to look at the translations of Thornton, Warner, and others, to see how widely even fair scholars may err through neglecting or losing sight of minutiae. In a review some time since of Mr. Strong's version of the Mostellaria, or "Haunted House," we endeavoured to show that in the comedies of Plautus there is a great bank of plot, wit, and humour upon which modern playwrights may still draw with perhaps greater advantage than upon that of France. A sine qua non, however, to any successful efforts in this direction is an accurate knowledge of what Plautus wrote. And to Mr. Wagner's credit it must be said that a study of the Trinummus in his edition cannot but lead to such an accession of familiarity with, and appreciation of, the ancient dramatist; and his nice points and hits as ought to make itself sensibly felt in translation or reproduction.

The plot of the Trinummus is not intricate. An old Athenian, Charmides, has gone abroad, and left his son Leoboniceus and a daughter under the guardianship of his friend Callicles, with private instructions as to a treasure hid in his mansion. Leoboniceus runs riot in his father's absence, and when at last the family mansion is brought to the hammer, the guardian buys it at a low price, to save the treasure which lay hid there. For doing so he incurs suspicion and animadversions from a certain didactic old gentleman, Megaronides, but his explanations satisfy the audience that Callicles is true to his friend's interests. Meanwhile a friend of Leoboniceus, Lysiteles, a wealthy young Athenian, seeks his sister's hand, and would fain take her without dowry; but Leoboniceus will not hear of this, and proposes rather to part with the remnant of land which yet belongs to him. His slave's interference to frustrate this honourable proposition gives rise to a very amusing scene; and the guardian's plan for giving the girl a portion out of the hidden treasure without revealing the secret of it to the brother brings about another capital situation, when the knave who is hired to pretend to be the bearer of a letter from the absent father to his son, and of a portion for his daughter to be paid over to Callicles, comes in contact with the real Simon Puro, Charmides, actually returned from abroad. From this knave, who calls himself Trinummus from the three pieces of money for which he undertakes the job, the play of course gets its name; and its chief complication is where the hiring Trinummus talks to Charmides of his intimacy with his unsuspected and unrecognized self, and then, when Charmides discovers himself, treats him as an impostor. At last the play ends—as Plautus mostly ends his plays—with the dux pater belying his character and forgiving everybody; but the memorable scene of the whole piece is that to which we have just referred, which, it need scarcely be said, is probably the germ of the well known scene in the Taming of the Shrew in which Lucentio's father, the real Vincentio, comes in contact with the pedant who has been hired to personate him, and is well nigh cast into prison for imposture by the rogue, whose conscience towards his employers dictates that he should act out his part to the end.

In the rendering of such a scene as this there is need of the nicest perception of the force of each Latin word and phrase; and it is in such cases that the greater exactness of modern scholarship opens a field for translators and imitators to turn a knowledge of Plautus to the best account. Indeed we are surprised to observe how slovenly the work of even literal translators has often been in this field. In the course of the amicable contest betwixt Leoboniceus and Lysiteles about dowry or no-dowry, two lines afford a proof of how what is under the surface is apt to escape all but the lynx-eyed. Lysiteles urges (686-7)—

Tantum melius te sororis causa exestatem exsequi
Atque eum agrum me habere quam te tua qui toleres moenia?

Mr. Riley, a competent scholar, translates this in Bohn's series, "And is it so much preferable that for your sister's sake you should incur poverty, and that I should possess that land rather than yourself, who ought to be upholding your own walls?" A knowledge of the text and language of this play taken by itself ought to have led to a better understanding of the italicized words, which Thornton, with an ambiguity which passes for caution in a weak translator, renders "you might repair your shattered fortune." Mr. Riley ought to have seen light in the various reading, "munia," of some editions; but really there is no excuse for missing the fact that "moenia" is i.q. "munia," just as in v. 24 "immoenia" is i.q. "immunis" and just as in v. 354 the line—in which "munus" and "immunis" are various readings, is a facetious definition of one who has not wherewithal to pay his rates and taxes. The word "tolerare," too, might have been perceived from what had gone before (see note on v. 338) to mean to "discharge" or "assist in bearing." Mr. Wagner's labours will make such laches impossible to those who read the Trinummus in his edition, unless it be where he credits his readers with his own familiarity with dramatic idioms. A case of this is to be found in a scene between Philo, the father of Lysiteles, and his son. When the latter has induced his father to approve of the match he is about to make, he throws upon him all the task of propitiating the lady's brother. The father comically remarks,

Is est immoens quod nihil est, qui moenia tangitur suum—

Eccè autem in benignitate repperi negotium (389), and Wagner's note that negotium means "a troublesome piece of work" is good as far as it goes, and showing that "complaisance entail trouble." But it would have been no law to the purpose to draw attention to the comic and dramatic sense of "negotium," which is here very marked. By these two small lines the itself with the words of the last speaker, and means "Ha! here it is again; my complaisance is getting me into trouble"; or "Lo! you, there now! I'm getting into trouble by my good nature." Similar omissions are made at v. 104, where there might have been a note on "in manu," and at v. 287, where "canto" would have been better understood in its peculiar sense for a word of explanation.

* Alfred Plauti Trinummus, with Notes Critical and Exegetical. By Wilhelm Wagner, Ph.D., Editor of the "Anabasis" and of Terence. Cambridge: Bell & Co. London: Bell & Daldy. 1872.

One of the richest passages in the whole play is that in which the slave Stasimus dissuades Philto from accepting the proposed piece of ground (v. 523-44) on his son's behalf, and enumerates its bad points seriatim, with that end in view. Thornton's version will amuse, and the notes of Wagner, to which reference may be desirable, may be read as well with it as with the Latin:—

STAS. First, then, whenever the land is plough'd, the oxen Every fifth furrow drop down dead.
PHIL. Fie on it!
STAS. A passage down to Acheron's in our field.
The grapes grow mouldy, as they hang, before
They can be gather'd.
LEA. He is, I suppose,
Persuading him; though he's an arrant rogue,
To me he's not unfaithful.
STAS. Hear what follows.
When the harvest elsewhere promises most fair,
The yield is here three times less than you're wont.
PHIL. Nay!—then methinks it were a proper place
For men to sow their wild oats, where they would not Spring up.
STAS. There never was a person yet
That ever held that farm, but his affairs
Did turn to bad; some run away, some died,
Some hang'd themselves.—Why, there's my master now,
To what sad straits is he reduc'd?
PHIL. O, keep me
Far from this farm!
STAS. You'd have more cause to say so
Were you to hear the whole. Each second tree
Is blasted with the lightning; my, and more—
The hogs are eat up with the mange; the sheep
P'ne with the rot, all scabby as this hand.
And no man can live there six months together;
No, not a Syrian, though they are most hardy,
The influenza is to all so fatal.—Thornton, vol. ii. pp. 37-8.

Upon the original of this lively passage Mr. Wagner has not been chary of explanatory notes. In the first line the primary sense of olim (h. e. illo tempore) is pointed out and illustrated; in the 7th, postid (cf. antid, v. 546) is shown to be the original form of post, and to have been an old ablative in d, a trace of which survives in the later Latin compound "postidea." Afterwards the curious expression "ad incitum redactust" (v. 537) is identified to a nicety with "checkmate" in chess; the summer fever, which Plautus calls "morbus solstitialis," is described and illustrated by Latin and Greek parallels; and last, not least, a tilt is run at Ritschel in reference to his maintenance, à propos of v. 539, of the strange theory of a nominative plural in as for metrical purposes. The line runs in MSS. "Nam fulguritæ sunt alternæ arbores." Ritschel ignores Wagner's principle of hiatus "before a cretic word at the end of a line," although it is supported by Spanghel and Brix in two passages of the Ménechmei, and resorts to reading alternas for alternæ, justifying this queer and novel nominative plural by "Quot letitias inoperatæ (!) modo mi irreperere in aium," where "letitias" is manifestly the "accusativus expletivus." Common sense must here pronounce on the side of Mr. Wagner.

Another of the happiest passages in this play is also recalled by another of Ritschel's readings, placidus, invented to obviate the hiatus. We agree with Mr. Wagner in thinking that, if any change was needed, Ritschel's first resource, "placidus," was very neat and Plautian. But the passage has a more general interest on account of its being a first-rate sample of the figure τοπος προδομίου, deservedly popular in ancient as in modern burlesque. In it Stasimus, seeing how things are going, and that he and his master have nothing to hope for except by enlisting, breaks out into reflections of mixed gloom and banter. (Video casulam—in tabernaculo, 721-6.) Thornton's rendering is very wide of the mark; but the pith of it is represented in this literal version, which may possibly serve to recommend the humour of the play:—

I see
That I must shortly be a soldier's drudge.
And when my master's taken some monarch's pay,
Methinks mild warriors he will take the lead—
In headlong fights; and spoils will fall to him—
Who shall have faced my master in the fight.
For me—when with a blow I'm strongly smit,
My quiver full of shafts, my hand unceasing
Is belab'ring them—I th' tent—I'll sleep at ease.

Here, as in many instances, the editor's notes leave nothing to be desired.

Had we space, we might draw attention to various happy emendations proposed or adopted by Mr. Wagner of equal merit with his suggestion to read "hæc omnia eximiant," in 287, for "hæc sunt quæ eximiant," to which Spanghel demurs as foreign to Latin usage. "Cum," or "coerceo," which are identical, may, he thinks, have got corrupted into "quæque." A still more certain emendation in the same passage is v. 297, "ut ego hæc mecum facerem," for facies, which is out of place in reference to the context. This indeed is a conjecture which has been subsequently confirmed by the palimpsest. We might dwell also on the notes of difference between Plautus and Terence, which Mr. Wagner points out in several passages, and on the internal evidence of the date of the play which he finds in the allusions to a dearth at this time (v. 32 and v. 424) and to the ascendancy of the aristocratic party (v. 34) as well as to the selling of the Capanees as slaves (v. 545). Both these add to the interest and value of his annotations. We must also mention the rare merit of his explanations and derivations of words, such as dum, quoniam, passum, runsum, similitu, and the like. Since we reviewed Mr. Wagner's Terence he has become more proficient in our language, though he still talks of "ill-demeanour" for "misconduct," of the "affect" for the "feeling" of a speaker, translates "inscitia" a "bévue," characterizes a brother professor as "up to anything," and with an equally charming naïveté translates "inaneum malum" (v. 573) as "awfully bad." Perhaps, however, our native slang is more to blame than the foreigner who does not distinguish the wheat from the tares. At any rate he has made in this edition his best contribution to the service of Latin scholarship, and his Terentius deserves a welcome not only from those who look for a complete edition of Plautus in due season, but also from those who have to depend on future translations for a really trustworthy English counterpart or presentment of the chief of Latin playwrights.

OMBRA.*

CRITICS have a right to be severe in their demands on Mrs. Oliphant. Her powers are not of the kind to be judged by any rule of good-natured tolerance, but rather by as high a standard as is applied to any living novelist; and her fault, therefore, when she fails in the excellence which is possible to her, is great in proportion to the opportunity which she has missed of doing first-rate work. Every now and then, tempted apparently by the dream of haste and facility, she puts forth an inferior production, which probably the reading world, notoriously loyal to a name, accepts in faith as a creditable sample of her skill, but which to the critic accustomed to analysis is a patent mistake. Then she charms the severest reviewer by some short story which recalle Mrs. Gaskell's best method; and then, again, she delights and yet disappoints by such a work as Ombra, which in certain parts is so excellent, so tenderly thought and so delicately touched, that we feel almost personally aggrieved when we come across the weaker portions, or stumble over the pages which have evidently been written in haste, and neither corrected nor reported of at leisure.

Nothing can be fresher or brighter than the three principal female characters of this book. They are quaintly original, and yet entirely natural. Perhaps we might take exception to the action of Mrs. Anderson concerning Ombra's "secret," as not quite in accordance with the kind of woman she is described to be. True, the whole circumstances were difficult, and the opposing lines of interest and inclination many; but we think she would not have given way to such a questionable proceeding as she did, and that conventional propriety would have carried the day over maternal complaisance, even when the daughter was such a one as Ombra. If, too, we view her conduct as an evidence of gratified maternal ambition, we are scarcely better satisfied; for the gratification was of a somewhat qualified kind, all things considered, and though matters came right in the end, they did so by chance more than by deserving. But if this one special action strikes us as being hardly natural to her—and we are not sure that we are absolutely justified in our objection—the whole character is truthfully and delicately indicated, and makes one of Mrs. Oliphant's best portraits. Really kind-hearted and affectionate, yet not indisposed to more demonstrativeness than was quite sincere, even in one of her naturally caressing disposition; worldly, with the half-bitter ambition of a woman who has made a ménage and suffered by it, yet honourable, and with a sense of dignity and self-respect that kept her from sinking into the rank of a well-born adventuress; loving her daughter, yet fearing her moody temper even more than she delighted in her beauty, or took pride in her intellect; loving Kate, her niece, still more, yet taking part in the cruel deception that overwhelmed her favourite with such unnecessary sorrow, and deserting her in a manner that was both unfeeling and unwomanly; still beautiful in her mature airhood, but not coquettish, and unaffectedly maternal, she is one of the best drawn personages of the book. Only a writer of rare discrimination could have delineated a character at once so vivid and so subtle; and if the author of Ombra had done nothing else for her fame, "Mrs. Anderson" would have given her rank among our best character-painters. The mingled feelings that possessed Mrs. Anderson when Mr. Courtenay proposed to her to take on herself the guardianship of his ward are admirably portrayed. Kindness towards her dead sister's child, desire to regain a footing in the family which had discarded her for her marriage, the advantage of the income offered in addition to her own limited means, natural tenderness and artificial needs, with the fear of Ombra pervading all, make up an excellently conceived, and as excellently executed, entanglement of motives—all true to nature. The offensive scene at the railway station, when she kisses and cries over Kate—the cynical old uncle looking on with a half-amused disgust, while Kate sinks in amazement, "Are you sorry? because I am glad, very glad to see you. I could not cry for anything; I am as happy as I can be"—is a charming bit of work all through. The "warm darkness" that surrounded the child, the "pressure of something which held her close," the "voice murmuring and purring over her," and then the release, when she saw a tall, kind, handsome woman with a face like her own, bring the scene bodily before us. But Mrs. Anderson is always visible in her personality, and stands out from the pages firm and solid.

* Ombra. By Mrs. Oliphant. Author of "Chronicle of Carlingford," "Salem Chapel," &c. 3 vols. London: Harst & Blackett. 1872.

The character of Ombra herself is more complex, and therefore more contradictory, than that of her mother. Mrs. Anderson is the woman of happy escapes. She just "saves" this or that dangerous quality; just escapes being a humbug, an intrigante, a schemer, an adventuress. But Ombra is the girl of contradictory extremes; and what between her reticence to-day and her passion to-morrow, her hatred of pretence on the one side and her condescension to practical falsehood on the other, we confess we are rather at a loss how to class her, and do not quite know what is meant to be the result of an hysterical temper or what is grave moral fault. Certain it is that she is very unamiable. Suspicious, selfish, jealous, exacting, but lovely and fascinating, she is one of those women who seem sent into the world to be the torment of all with whom they are associated, and whose fortunes, even when at the brightest, are overclouded by their own painful moods. The cruel dexterity with which she made it appear as if it was the one Bertie with whom she was flirting, while all the while it was the other who was making love—which secret is admirably managed by Mrs. Oliphant—was more clever than admirable; and the outburst which so nearly broke poor Kate's heart was unpardonable, even under the peculiar circumstances existing. Yet for all her faults and inconsistencies, there is something that is both fresh and enchanting about Ombra. Shadow as she is in name, she is also shadowy in drawing and colouring; and her nature is at times in harmony with her seeming. Her thoughts and aspirations in the beginning are all vague and indistinct. No gaiety warms her, no self-abandonment in the early part of the book gives her the thrill or the life of passion. As we see her in the beginning, she reminds us of one of those German spirit-maidens who float away on the moonbeams or dissolve in a cloud; and we can scarcely reconcile the slightly vulgar and vixenish Ombra of the conclusion, full of fierce complainings and a love that was neither tender nor noble, with the cold and vague, but exquisitely truthful and refined Shadow of the cottage, whose pure nature abhorred the very echo of a falsehood, and whose subtle graces worked up a soul in her young cousin, and transformed a pert and troublesome child into a sweet and gracious gentlewoman. And, by the by, nothing is more beautiful than the running description of the influence which Ombra exerts over Kate Courtenay; nothing truer than the half indifference, half dislike, dashed with envy, with which the "Ice-maiden," as old Francesca calls her, receives the enthusiastic love of her turbulent adorer, a love which softens her temper only when it touches her vanity. And yet Ombra is not bad-hearted; she is simply bad-tempered.

It is the cousin, however, this Kate Courtenay, the heiress of Langley Courtenay and the subject of an educational experiment which forbade her to love or to be loved, who is the popular person of the story; and deservedly so. From first to last Kate is delightful and deliciously natural. We would not spare one trait of that interfering, arbitrary, self-satisfied, soulless girlhood of hers, nor see the smallest or the sharpest of her impertinent angles rubbed away. We love her from the first, faults and all; though we acknowledge that in real life she would have been a terrible nuisance, and one that would have required all our philosophy and Christian charity to endure with composure. But as she grows older, and softens and ripens under the fostering care of her aunt, she becomes a creature of exceeding beauty; as generous and transparent, as loving and joyous, as Ombra is the reverse. Her first introduction is charming; and we can perfectly realize the unconscious audacity of this fifteen-year-old chatterbox, as she gives good advice to her cynical uncle, and explains to him her wishes for the present and her views for the future, with the sublime assurance of a young autocrat; for is she not lady of the manor at Langley Courtenay, with more than mediæval notions about her rights as proprietress and the duties of her subjects? The discomfiture which follows, when she is taken off her stilts and sent back to the nursery, and the struggle between her wounded pride as the lady and her longing for the strawberries as a girl, is in Mrs. Oliphant's special manner. Very quaint and charming, too, is that scene in the dell, where Bertie hears her crying, and commits a trespass to come to the rescue; and where the first seeds are sown of the love which afterwards came to such pretty maturity, and with such a delightful dash of sweet imperiousness across its sentiment. For not even in her love can the lady of the manor forget her territorial dignity, or be other than the châtelaine. But indeed Kate is charming all through, and both she and Ombra are witnesses to the fact that to create interest and originality of a high quality no author need necessarily go to crime or sensationalism. Old Francesca, too, is good, but slightly tiresome with her broken English; and Lady Carysfort, though only a sketch, is in excellent keeping with her place in the story and with the story itself. Of the two Berties we cannot speak so favourably. They are women's men, and act as women's men generally do; that is, unlike the real thing. But as to speak of them openly would betray Mrs. Oliphant's secret, and Ombra's, we will content ourselves with this protest, and leave our readers to find out for themselves what it means. In spite, however, of what may be shortcomings here and there, Ombra is a thoroughly delightful book; nevertheless Mrs. Oliphant should not stop short of supreme excellence, as she does. She has it in her, if only she knew how to bring it out; and she ought not to rest contented until she has brought it out, and set herself on the highest place in the literature of fiction.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we decline to return rejected communications; and to this rule we can make no exception.

The SATURDAY REVIEW is duly registered for transmission abroad.

The publication of the SATURDAY REVIEW takes place on Saturday Mornings, in time for the early trains, and copies may be obtained in the Country, through any Newsgent, on the day of publication.

Nearly all the back Numbers of the SATURDAY REVIEW may be obtained through any Bookseller, or of the Publisher, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C., to whom all Communications relating to Advertisements should likewise be addressed.

Now ready, VOLUME XXXII., bound in cloth, price 16s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also, Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsgent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 872, JULY 13, 1872:

The New French Loan.
Lord Granard and the Government. Germany and the Pope.
Governor Eyre. The Ballot Bill. M. Thiers and Marshal MacMahon.
Consular Jurisdiction in Egypt. The Licensing Bill.
The Proportional Representation Crotchet.

Our Criminals.
The Temple of Diana at Ephesus. Mr. Ayrton and Dr. Hooker.
Aachen Revisited. Acrobats. Roman Catholic Prison Chaplains.
Military Education in Austria. The Albert Memorial.
The Theatres. Newmarket July Meeting.

De Bethencourt's Conquest of the Canary Islands.
Amos on Jurisprudence. Authors at Work. Modern Greek Life and Folklore.
Fleurbaey. The Cotton MSS.—Appendix XXVII. Under the Sun.
Wagner's Trinummus. Ombra.

CONTENTS OF No. 871, JULY 6, 1872:

France—The Geneva Arbitration—The Cost of Living—The Ballot Bill in the Commons—Mr. Mill's Motion—Behor Castejar on Republicanism—The Mines Regulation Bill—General Cluseret and the Fenians.

The Study of History at Cambridge—A Romantic Sport—Leodium—Livingstone Interviewed—Count Montalembert on the Jesuits—Duke's Domestic Book—Perils of Life Assurance—Combative Sobriety—The Hartford Collection at Bethnal Green—Sculpture in the Academy.

